Daily Mail. 27. 2. 15.

676/1

6/6

The Government have taken the drastic step of ordering all employers and workers engaged in work for the war to—

1. Stop all strikes at once.
2. Secure full and regular work and output.
3. Abolish all restrictive trade rules or customs.
4. Stop haggling about piece-work prices by an agreement that high earnings in war work shall not involve any lower scale of pay for the men after the war.
5. If necessary get women to work on shells and fuses, work which they can suitably execute.
6. Prevent any stoppage of work by immediate reference to the Government tribunal.
7. Give, in the case of firms, a guarantee to the workers that nothing shall prejudice individuals or trade unions after the war.

At present there is a strike of engineers on the Clyde, and an even wider strike in the shipbuilding industry is threatened. With regard to the Clyde the following statement was issued by the Government yesterday:—

CHIEF INDUSTRIAL COMMISSIONER'S DEPT., Old Palace-yard, Friday.

The strike of the engineers in the Clyde district has been under the consideration of his Majesty's Government and by their direction the following letter has been sent to-day by Sir George Askwith, Chief Industrial Commissioner, to the Engineering Employers' Federation on behalf of the employers, and to the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, the Steam Engine Makers' Society, the United Machine Workers' Association, the Amalgamated Society of General Tool Makers, and the Scientific Instrument Makers' Trade Society on behalf of the men:—

Feb. 26, 1915.

Sir,—From inquiries which have been made as to the position of the dispute in the engineering trade in the Glasgow district, it appears that the parties concerned have been unable to arrive at a settlement. In consequence of the delay the requirements of the nation are being seriously endangered.

I am instructed by the Government that important munitions of war urgently required by the Navy and the Army are being held up by the present cessation of work and that they must call for a resumption of work on Monday morning, March 1.

Immediately following the resumption of work arrangements will be made for the representatives of the parties to meet the Committee of Production in Engineering and Shipbuilding Establishments for the purpose of the matter in dispute being referred for settlement to a Court of Arbitration, who shall have power to fix the date from which the settlement shall take effect.—I am, yours faithfully,

G. R. ASKWITH,
Chief Industrial Commissioner.

The men's committees met last night, and meet again to-day and to-morrow. A mass meeting is hardly possible before Monday or Tuesday.

It is semi-officially reported that the employers will be asked to concede a certain sum and the Government will guarantee the balance. The men asked 2d. an hour extra and the employers offered ¾d.

SHIPYARD CONFERENCE FAILS.

Sir George Askwith presided at a conference between shipbuilding employers and workers in London yesterday on the men's demand for 6s. a week increase or 15 per cent. on piecework. No settlement was reached. A joint conference of unions involving 100,000 men affected will be held at Newcastle on Tuesday, when notices to cease work expire.

EVIL OF BROKEN TIME.

Late last evening the Government statements embodying the wider orders described above were issued as follows:

Sir George Askwith, Sir Francis Hopwood, and Sir George Gibb report that irregular time-keeping in shipyards is a chief cause of failure to reach the maxi-should not be used as a means of lowering rates of wages, and we think the rates in question should be protected." This can be done by a guarantee that in fixing piecework prices war earnings shall not be considered as a factor, so that all apprehension of a reduction will be removed.

WOMEN'S WORK ON SHELLS.

"We recommend to increase the output that there should be an extension of the practice of employing female labour under suitable conditions in the production of shells and fuses." If there is any difficulty the matter must be referred to the tribunal.

THERE MUST BE NO STRIKES.

"There can be no justification whatever for a resort to strikes or lock-outs under present conditions when the resulting cessation of work would prevent the production of ships, guns, equipment, stores, or other commodities required by the Government."

The Government have therefore concurred in issuing the following both to contractors and the trade unions for their adhesion:—

Avoidance of Stoppages on Work for Government Purposes.

With a view to preventing loss of production caused by disputes between employers and workpeople, no stoppage of work by strike or lock-out should take place on work for Government purposes. In the event of differences arising which fail to be settled by the parties directly concerned, or by their representatives, or under any existing agreements, the matter shall be referred to an impartial tribunal nominated by his Majesty's Government for immediate investigation and report to the Government with a view to a settlement.

GUARANTEE TO WORKERS.

"In order to safeguard the position of the trade unions and of the workpeople concerned we think that each contracting firm should give an undertaking, to be held on behalf of the unions, in the following terms:—

To his Majesty's Government.

We hereby undertake that any departure during the war from the practice ruling in our workshops and shipyards prior to the war shall only be for the period of the war.

No change in practice made during the war shall be allowed to prejudice the position of the workpeople in our employment or of their trade unions in regard to the resumption and maintenance after the war of any rules or customs existing prior to the war.

In any readjustment of staff which may have to be effected after the war, priority of employment will be given to workmen in our employment at the beginning of the war who are serving with the colours or who are now in our employment.

Name of firm .....
Date ....."

This guarantee has already been accepted by a number of firms.

FRENCH EXAMPLE.

A fine letter by a British officer whose work throws him much into contact with the French troops is printed in Page 6. It concludes:

"From time to time one reads of labour troubles, threatened strikes, and so forth. Troubles of this kind in a French factory are as unlikely as a mutiny in a French or British regiment, and the degree of possibility of their occurring in England is the measure of our failure to realise our responsibilities at a time when every man's energies are needed every day."

GET ON WITH THE NATION'S WORK!

The country will applaud the vigorous and even-handed tone of the Government's orders to all employers and workers engaged in the production of war material. Munitions of war needed, and needed without a moment's delay, by both the Navy and Army have been held up during the past week on the Clyde because of a difference of opinion as to the wages of the men engaged in manufacturing them. While employers and employed have been haggling over an extra penny or twopence an hour the vital requirements of the country in this supreme crisis of its history have been left to look after themselves. In such a situation, so fatal to our fighting efficiency, so prejudicial to our national good name, the Government was bound to intervene.

The Government has intervened in the right way. It has issued injunctions to both employers and employed on the Clyde to see to it that work is resumed on Monday. It has further called upon all parties concerned in the manufacture of war material to take every possible step so as to increase the output. It has given a pledge that the cause of labour and the trade unions shall not be prejudiced in peace by waiving during the war any restrictions found necessary in the men's interest or by permitting the more general employment of women in the production of ammunition. So grave a call in so grave an emergency will not go unheeded, nor will either employers or employed fail to realise the vital need of reconsidering their position. The Government is certain to be obeyed because it speaks for the nation and because in this matter the very existence of the nation depends on prompt and cheerful obedience.

sideration of his Majesty's Government and by their direction the following letter has been sent to-day by Sir George Askwith, Chief Industrial Commissioner, to the Engineering Employers' Federation on behalf of the employers, and to the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, the Steam Engine Makers' Society, the United Machine Workers' Association, the Amalgamated Society of General Tool Makers, and the Scientific Instrument Makers' Trade Society on behalf of the men:—

Feb. 26, 1915.

Sir,—From inquiries which have been made as to the position of the dispute in the engineering trade in the Glasgow district, it appears that the parties concerned have been unable to arrive at a settlement. In consequence of the delay the requirements of the nation are being seriously endangered.

I am instructed by the Government that important munitions of war urgently required by the Navy and the Army are being held up by the present cessation of work and that they must call for a resumption of work on Monday morning, March 1.

Immediately following the resumption of work arrangements will be made for the representatives of the parties to meet the Committee of Production in Engineering and Shipbuilding Establishments for the purpose of the matter in dispute being referred for settlement to a Court of Arbitration, who shall have power to fix the date from which the settlement shall take effect. —I am, yours faithfully,

G. R. Askwith,
Chief Industrial Commissioner.

The men's committees met last night, and meet again to-day and to-morrow. A mass meeting is hardly possible before Monday or Tuesday.

It is semi-officially reported that the employers will be asked to concede a certain sum and the Government will guarantee the balance. The men asked 2d. an hour extra and the employers offered ¾d.

SHIPYARD CONFERENCE FAILS.

Sir George Askwith presided at a conference between shipbuilding employers and workers in London yesterday on the men's demand for 6s. a week increase or 15 per cent. on piecework. No settlement was reached. A joint conference of unions involving 100,000 men affected will be held at Newcastle on Tuesday, when notices to cease work expire.

EVIL OF BROKEN TIME.

Late last evening the Government statements embodying the wider orders described above were issued as follows:

Sir George Askwith, Sir Francis Hopwood, and Sir George Gibb report that irregular time-keeping in shipyards is a chief cause of failure to reach the maximum output. If one of a squad is absent the squad is "broken," and the others do not begin. They advise that the Government should intimate—

"It is essential that the employers and workpeople should agree on and establish within ten days an arrangement for dealing effectively with the question of 'broken' squads."

Employers and the Boiler-makers' Union will meet on Wednesday to consider this, and the Government have empowered their new tribunal to deal with any cases of this kind.

NEED OF MORE SHELLS.

Sir G. Askwith, Sir F. Hopwood, and Sir G. Gibb report that the Admiralty and War Office insist that the production of shells and fuses must be increased rapidly.

"There is no reason to doubt that all sections of the community and not least the workpeople will desire that everything possible shall be done to maintain and accelerate adequate supplies of ammunition. Restrictive rules or customs (in the trade) should be suspended during the war, with proper safeguards to protect the workers and their trade unions."

As an example, the tribunal refers to the workers confining their earnings to time and half, due to a desire to protect the peace rates: "We agree that the war matter shall be referred to an impartial tribunal nominated by his Majesty's Government for immediate investigation and report to the Government with a view to a settlement.

GUARANTEE TO WORKERS.

"In order to safeguard the position of the trade unions and of the workpeople concerned we think that each contracting firm should give an undertaking, to be held on behalf of the unions, in the following terms:—

To his Majesty's Government.

We hereby undertake that any departure during the war from the practice ruling in our workshops and shipyards prior to the war shall only be for the period of the war.

No change in practice made during the war shall be allowed to prejudice the position of the workpeople in our employment or of their trade unions in regard to the resumption and maintenance after the war of any rules or customs existing prior to the war.

In any readjustment of staff which may have to be effected after the war, priority of employment will be given to workmen in our employment at the beginning of the war who are serving with the colours or who are now in our employment.

Name of firm .....
Date ....."

This guarantee has already been accepted by a number of firms.

FRENCH EXAMPLE.

A fine letter by a British officer whose work throws him much into contact with the French troops is printed in Page 6. It concludes:

"From time to time one reads of labour troubles, threatened strikes, and so forth. Troubles of this kind in a French factory are as unlikely as a mutiny in a French or British regiment, and the degree of possibility of their occurring in England is the measure of our failure to realise our responsibilities at a time when every man's energies are needed every day."

of war material to take every possible step so as to increase the output. It has given a pledge that the cause of labour and the trade unions shall not be prejudiced in peace by waiving during the war any restrictions found necessary in the men's interest or by permitting the more general employment of women in the production of ammunition. So grave a call in so grave an emergency will not go unheeded, nor will either employers or employed fail to realise the vital need of reconsidering their position. The Government is certain to be obeyed because it speaks for the nation and because in this matter the very existence of the nation depends on prompt and cheerful obedience.

The Daily Chronicle
26/01/15

War Work.

Compulsory arbitration is the leading note of the Munitions of War Bill. This method of settling industrial disputes is not loved by the British working-classes, and they only accept it under the stress of war and the strong impulsion of patriotic feeling. When the country is in danger is no time for strikes or lock-outs. In addition to swallowing their repugnance to compulsory arbitration, the labour leaders have consented to abrogate, for the duration of the war, rules and regulations having a restrictive tendency on output. These rules and regulations for the most part are the result of two generations of struggle. Hardly won, they are not to be lightly sacrificed. It is much to the credit of the trade union leaders that they are willing to suspend them during the war. That sacrifice, for it is a sacrifice, they owe to their country in this time of peril, and to their gallant comrades in the battle-line in Flanders and Gallipoli. We hold it to be supremely important that the ante-bellum status and practices of the trade unions should be restored with the least possible delay after the war has ended. It would be a national calamity were our standards of labour and of life permanently lowered as the result of this war. Mr. Lloyd George, always a good friend of Labour, has been careful in his Bill to protect the working-classes against this peril. It is expressly stated in the schedule that "any departure from the practices ruling in the workshops, shipyards, and other industries prior to the war shall only be for the period of the war." Labour rights are also safeguarded in other directions. For example, it is provided that semi-skilled workers engaged on highly skilled work are to be paid "the usual rates of the district for that class of work"; and, further, that the relaxation of the restrictions on the admission of semi-skilled or female labour "shall not affect adversely the rates customarily paid for the job." The effect of these salutary provisions is that there will be no financial inducement to the employer to give preference to semi-skilled or female labour, and that where these are employed they will get good wages.

Labour has made concessions. What about capital? Sacrifices must be reciprocal. They must not all be on one side. It would be monstrous if the effect of additional zeal on the part of the workers was to mean greatly-enhanced profits for the employers. The Munitions Bill quite properly limits the profits of capital in all "controlled" establishments, and interferes in other ways with capital's freedom of action. Its authors genuinely desire to establish parity of sacrifice as between employer and employed. The divisible profits are not to be more than one-fifth in excess of the average of the net profits for the last two corresponding periods of the pre-war era. In other words, where in 1914 a company paid a dividend of 5 per cent., it must not in 1915 pay more than 6 per cent. We foresee trouble in calculation of profit where new capital has been brought in recently. The Munitions Tribunal set up by the Bill is a disciplinary court with power to fine for bad timekeeping and such like offences, but without power to imprison. Such a tribunal may be of real service. Labour will be directly represented upon it. We do not like clause 13, which enables a court of summary jurisdiction in certain circumstances to fine a man £5 a day and alternatively send him to prison. This and some other provisions will have to be carefully scrutinised. Regarded as a whole, the Bill is a very good one, and it has obviously been framed with a sincere desire to preserve the permanent interests of Labour unimpaired. It will be surveyed in the House of Commons by

676
676/2

The Morning Post
17/01/15

SUPPLY OF MUNITIONS.

ORGANISATION OF INDUSTRY.

COMING GOVERNMENT BILL.

(BY OUR POLITICAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Mr. Lloyd George's conference with the Trade Union leaders, resumed yesterday, resulted in agreement on a Bill which will be introduced in the House of Commons early next week and pressed forward with all possible speed. The conference lasted a couple of hours, and the Minister then left the Board of Trade offices while the Trade Unionists debated matters among themselves. At three o'clock he met them again, and late in the afternoon a Cabinet Council was called at which, it is understood, the draft of the Bill was considered and approved.

Strikes and Lock-outs Prohibited.

It will be remembered that so long ago as last March an agreement for expediting work and increasing the mobility of labour was arrived at between the Government and the leaders of the Trade Unions mainly concerned; but in practice considerable difficulty has been found in putting this agreement into force. The Bill deals with this and other still more important matters and gives statutory effect to the wider agreement now come to between the Minister of Munitions and the industries represented at yesterday's conference. So far as can be ascertained, the principal objects sought to be attained are these:

If the Board of Trade certifies that cessation of labour at a munition factory would be prejudicial to the national interest a strike or lock-out at such works will be prohibited by the Bill; and all questions of wages and conditions of employment are to be settled compulsorily by the tribunal contemplated in the agreement to which I have just referred.

No Compulsion: A Roll of Volunteers.

The Bill, it is understood, contains no provision of any sort for compulsion, or even for a compulsory registration of the male population (whether the latter is not possible under powers already possessed by the Government is a moot point), but it enables the opening of rolls of volunteers who are prepared to work in any "controlled establishment" to which they may be sent, for a period of six months. It will probably be found that power is given to the King by Order in Council to extend this period should the national emergency continue; and it will be also open to the men themselves to engage for a longer period. Breaches of the undertaking will be punishable by fines imposed by the Munitions Committees.

Limited Profits and Suspended Working Rules.

The expression "controlled establishment" used in the preceding paragraph means a factory engaged in the supply of munitions of war which has been so declared by the Minister of Munitions. In all these establishments the profits of the employers are to be limited, and all restrictive rules and practices of Trade Unions to be suspended. This latter provision is accompanied by a clause giving statutory force to the promise made by the Government last March that at the end of the war the Trade Union restrictions and working rules are to be re-imposed and have effect precisely as was the case before.

The Munitions Committees—bodies representing in equal proportions employers and employed—will be given power to inflict fines for offences such as bad timekeeping, deliberate slackness, and the like. There may be other clauses designed to prevent workmen leaving factories engaged on munition work for the Government without good cause; and, of course, there must be power to deal with employers in the event of breaches by them of any of the regulations made by and agreements entered into with the Munitions Committee or other bodies exercising authority under the Bill.

The Trades Represented.

An official statement was issued last night announcing the fact of the further conference between Mr. Lloyd George and "representatives of a number of workmen's societies." The tale of societies represented is interesting as showing how wide will be the scope of the Bill whose general provisions I have outlined. The from the practices ruling in the workshops, shipyards, and other industries prior to the war shall only be for the period of the war." Labour rights are also safeguarded in other directions. For example, it is provided that semi-skilled workers engaged on highly skilled work are to be paid "the usual rates of the district for that class of work"; and, further, that the relaxation of the restrictions on the admission of semi-skilled or female labour "shall not affect adversely the rates customarily paid for the job." The effect of these salutary provisions is that there will be no financial inducement to the employer to give preference to semi-skilled or female labour, and that where these are employed they will get good wages.

Labour has made concessions. What about capital? Sacrifices must be reciprocal. They must not all be on one side. It would be monstrous if the effect of additional zeal on the part of the workers was to mean greatly-enhanced profits for the employers. The Munitions Bill quite properly limits the profits of capital in all "controlled" establishments, and interferes in other ways with capital's freedom of action. Its authors genuinely desire to establish parity of sacrifice as between employer and employed. The divisible profits are not to be more than one-fifth in excess of the average of the net profits for the last two corresponding periods of the pre-war era. In other words, where in 1914 a company paid a dividend of 5 per cent., it must not in 1915 pay more than 6 per cent. We foresee trouble in calculation of profit where new capital has been brought in recently. The Munitions Tribunal set up by the Bill is a disciplinary court with power to fine for bad timekeeping and such like offences, but without power to imprison. Such a tribunal may be of real service. Labour will be directly represented upon it. We do not like clause 13, which enables a court of summary jurisdiction in certain circumstances to fine a man £5 a day and alternatively send him to prison. This and some other provisions will have to be carefully scrutinised. Regarded as a whole, the Bill is a very good one, and it has obviously been framed with a sincere desire to preserve the permanent interests of Labour unimpaired. It will be surveyed in the House of Commons by some critical eyes, for it is a sharp departure from our old ways; but not a critic will be unfriendly. The House of Commons has only one overmastering desire, and that is to pile up the munitions of war, so as to provide our magnificent soldiers with every requisite for victory. For that great end we are all of us ready and eager to make sacrifice, none more so than the working classes, whose toil in our yards and workshops will be given without stint in this time of their country's need.

sented at yesterday's conference. So far as can be ascertained, the principal objects sought to be attained are these:

If the Board of Trade certifies that cessation of labour at a munition factory would be prejudicial to the national interest a strike or lock-out at such works will be prohibited by the Bill; and all questions of wages and conditions of employment are to be settled compulsorily by the tribunal contemplated in the agreement to which I have just referred.

No Compulsion: A Roll of Volunteers.

The Bill, it is understood, contains no provision of any sort for compulsion, or even for a compulsory registration of the male population (whether the latter is not possible under powers already possessed by the Government is a moot point), but it enables the opening of rolls of volunteers who are prepared to work in any "controlled establishment" to which they may be sent, for a period of six months. It will probably be found that power is given to the King by Order in Council to extend this period should the national emergency continue; and it will be also open to the men themselves to engage for a longer period. Breaches of the undertaking will be punishable by fines imposed by the Munitions Committees.

Limited Profits and Suspended Working Rules.

The expression "controlled establishment" used in the preceding paragraph means a factory engaged in the supply of munitions of war which has been so declared by the Minister of Munitions. In all these establishments the profits of the employers are to be limited, and all restrictive rules and practices of Trade Unions to be suspended. This latter provision is accompanied by a clause giving statutory force to the promise made by the Government last March that at the end of the war the Trade Union restrictions and working rules are to be re-imposed and have effect precisely as was the case before.

The Munitions Committees—bodies representing in equal proportions employers and employed—will be given power to inflict fines for offences such as bad timekeeping, deliberate slackness, and the like. There may be other clauses designed to prevent workmen leaving factories engaged on munition work for the Government without good cause; and, of course, there must be power to deal with employers in the event of breaches by them of any of the regulations made by and agreements entered into with the Munitions Committee or other bodies exercising authority under the Bill.

The Trades Represented.

An official statement was issued last night announcing the fact of the further conference between Mr. Lloyd George and "representatives of a number of workmen's societies." The tale of societies represented is interesting as showing how wide will be the scope of the Bill whose general provisions I have outlined. The list is as follows:

National Advisory Committee on War Output, Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, Management Committee of the General Federation of Trade Unions, National Amalgamated Union of Labour, British Steel Smelters, National Union of Railwaymen, Amalgamated Society of Carpenters and Joiners, National Union of Boot and Shoe Operatives, Steam Engine Makers' Society, United Kingdom Society of Coachmakers, Amalgamated Toolmakers, Scientific Instrument Makers, London and Provincial Coachmakers, West of Scotland Brass Finishers, National Amalgamated Sheet Metal Workers and Braziers, Sheet Metal Workers (Birmingham), Amalgamated Union of Upholsterers, National Amalgamated Furnishing Trades Association, Iron and Steel Federation, National Amalgamated Society of House and Ship Painters, General Union of Carpenters and Joiners, Amalgamated Society of Engineers, National Federation of Women Workers, Friendly Society of Ironfounders, National Society of Brassworkers and Metal Mechanics, Gasworkers and General Labourers, Boilermakers and Iron and Steel Shipbuilders, Workers' Union, Liverpool Shipwrights' Association, United Brassfounders and Finishers, Scottish Painters, Associated Blacksmiths, Electrical Trades Union, United Kingdom Society of Smiths and Strikers, United Machine Workers' Association, Amalgamated Wood Cutting Machinists, Scottish Brass Moulders' Union, Operative Plumbers' Association, United Patternmakers' Association, Shipconstructive and Shipwrights' Association, and General Union of Textile Workers.

The Spectator
5/7/15

On Monday the House of Commons again discussed the Ministry of Munitions Bill. The debate was notable for the fine spirit in which the Labour Members as a whole promised their support in producing ample munitions. Nothing could have been better. Mr. Houston, Unionist Member for West Toxteth, Liverpool, said that he felt so strongly on the failure of the late Government to produce a proper supply of munitions that he had come to the House in defiance of his doctor's orders. We cannot help remarking that he would have done better to obey his doctor. The truth, the whole truth, we want, but not speeches in a lachrymose and depressing tone. These give an entirely false impression abroad of the determination of the British people to win the war, and of their confidence that they will win it in spite of all delays or setbacks. The British people are braced by the truth even when the truth is ugly. It is easy for a speech, however, while saying only what may for the most part be literally justified, to mislead outsiders in the most unfortunate manner as to the temper of the nation. Such a speech, in our opinion, was Mr. Houston's.

Mr. Hobhouse denied that the situation was "desperate," as Mr. Houston had said. When the Cabinet resigned the supply of ammunition to the Army in the field had increased by over two hundred per cent. since last August, and this without taking into account our supplies to the Navy and to our allies. If it were true that the French had increased their supplies by six hundred per cent., our own—all included—did not fall far short of that figure. Mr. Hobhouse then suggested dangers in the Ministry of Munitions Bill. He feared Mr. Lloyd George, with his autocratic powers, might injure trade, and the financial condition of the country after all depended on its trade. Mr. John Hodge, Acting Chairman of the Labour Party, spoke most earnestly, and with the obvious approval of his party, of the desire of Labour to help. Strikes, he said, were inconceivable. Trade Union sacrifices might be great, but they were as nothing to the sacrifices of the men who were laying down their lives in order that people at home might enjoy their liberties. "Far better," he said, "to give up some privileges now than to have no liberties at all, as would be the case if Germany were successful." The speech made a great impression on the House. Other Labour Members spoke quite as strongly.

Sir John Simon replied for the Government. The employment of a considerable number of women, where hitherto their work had been prevented by Trade Union regulations, was contemplated, and if a woman did as good a day's work as a man she must be paid a man's wage. He repeated the promise that after the war Trade Unionism should enjoy all the "old traditions" which it was now being asked to forgo. The Munitions Courts to deal with workmen would have no power of imprisonment. They would have power to inflict fines only. As regards munition volunteers, the statement that the Government had secured all the men they wanted was "a dangerous misapprehension." They must get a great many more volunteers than they would be able ultimately to employ, because there must be discrimination. They must avoid taking men who were engaged on really important work outside the manufacture of munitions.

Mr. Snowden in a rasping speech asserted that the representatives of Labour did not speak for the rank-and-file. He was informed that at the recent Conference one-third of the delegates voted against the proposals in the Ministry of Munitions Bill. Here Mr. Hodge interrupted with: "I speak with the full authority of my Trade Union." Mr. Snowden went on to say that the civil and industrial liberty of the people was at stake. Mr. Churchill had told the country that he had been charged to have the Navy instantly ready for war. Lord Haldane had said that for five years Sir John French had been preparing for such a war as this. But the late Government having been convicted of unreadiness and inefficiency, an attempt was now made in this Bill to put the blame on the workers. Mr. O'Grady informed Mr. Snowden that he evidently knew little of Trade Union movements. The one-third minority at the recent Conference voted, not against this Bill at all, but against compulsory arbitration in all disputes. Letters came from Trade Unionists in the trenches appealing for support. When these men came home they would say that the willingness to forgo privileges temporarily was the greatest work Trade Unionism had ever done. The Bill was read a second time.

676

The Financial News
20/5/15

676

THE MUNITIONS BILL.

HOW EXCESS PROFITS WILL BE DEALT WITH—EMPLOYMENT CONDITIONS.

The main features of the Munitions of War Bill, which was issued yesterday, will have been gathered from the speech of Mr. Lloyd George in the House of Commons on Wednesday last. Following are the more important provisions of the Bill:—

If any difference exists or is apprehended between employer and employed, or between classes of employés, it must be settled either between the parties concerned or reported to the Board of Trade, who may: (1) Refer the matter to any existing body set up by agreement between employers and employed; or (2) submit it to (a) the Committee on Production, or (b) a single arbitrator, or (c) a court of arbitration with an equal number of representatives of both sides sitting under an independent chairman. Not only shall the award thus obtained be binding, but it may also be retrospective. Either a strike or lock-out is only permissible in cases where the Board of Trade has failed to refer the dispute for settlement in accordance with this plan.

As to controlled workshops, the first of the provisions laid down states that "any excess of the net profits of the controlled establishment over the amount divisible under this Act, as ascertained in accordance with the provisions of this Act, shall be paid into the Exchequer." Under Clause 5 the divisible profits are taken to be "an amount exceeding by one-fifth the standard amount of profits," and the standard is fixed at the average of the amount of the net profits for the two corresponding periods completed next before the outbreak of war. Power is given to the Minister of Munitions to take an average of a number of establishments belonging to the same employer either separately or jointly, or to substitute an agreed amount, or refer the matter to a referee or board, whose decision shall be conclusive.

Controlled workshops are subject also to the following conditions:—(1) No change to be made in wages without the permission of the Minister of Munitions, and if consent is withheld the matter shall be determined in the same way as other disputes are to be settled. (2) Any rule, practice, or custom not having the force of law which tends to restrict production or employment to be suspended. (3) The owner to undertake (a) that such suspension shall be for the period of the war only; (b) that men shall not be prejudiced thereby after the war; (c) that priority of employment shall be given after the war to men who left to serve the colours, or were employed when the workshop became a controlled workshop; (d) rates for semi-skilled men shall be the usual rates of the district for the class of work performed; (e) introduction of female labour not to prejudice the wages of the men; (f) record to be kept of all departures from usual conditions; and (g) notice of changes to be given to workmen wherever practicable. (4) Employés to comply with any regulations of the Minister of Munitions necessary for efficiency. (5) Owners empowered to do the same, notwithstanding any Act, Order, or deed under which they are governed.

Workmen are required to undertake to work in whatever establishment is selected for them. It is an offence for employers to endeavour to dissuade any man from so doing. The employment of persons who have left work in munition factories is prohibited unless he holds a certificate to the effect either (a) he left with consent, or (b) that consent was unreasonably withheld.

MINERS' OBJECTIONS.

Mr. Robert Smillie (President of the Miners' Federation) last night said miners were anxious to do everything necessary to assist the nation in the present crisis, but under the Munitions Bill the Trade Union Acts would be practically suspended. Mr. Lloyd George had expressed himself that he would not insist on the miners being included, but he had appealed to them to give some guarantee that the output of coal would not be interfered with by strikes or lockouts. It was hoped that to-day's conference between South Wales owners and miners would result in their being able to give Mr. Lloyd George their promise to do everything in reason to secure continuous and, if possible, increased output.

The Times
8-7.15

THE MANUFACTURE OF MUNITIONS.

An Order in Council, which appears in a Supplement to the London Gazette of last night, makes it lawful for the Admiralty or the Army Council to regulate the work of any factory or workshop, or the employment of any of the workmen, or to remove the plant "with a view to maintaining or increasing the production of munitions" in other factories or workshops. The same authorities may also control the supply of metals and materials that may be required for any articles for use in war.

New Times 18/6

MR. CHARLES DUNCAN, M.P. for Barrow-in-Furness, put a question to Dr. Addison, Under-Secretary to the Munitions Department, dealing with the condition of things at a factory in Summer Street, Southwark. He asked whether the girls employed "were lectured by the manager on German atrocities until they became hysterical; whether they were told that if they did not do their utmost the deaths of our soldiers would be at their door, and whether, owing to the dismissal of a forewoman, the girls refused to work, were ejected from the works by the police and had to walk the streets all night?" Dr. Addison professed extraordinary ignorance as to the first of the questions, and appeared to know very little of the rest. He admitted that there had been trouble over the dismissal of a forewoman, and stated that the girls were compelled to leave the factory, having committed a serious breach of the Munitions Act. He denied knowledge as to whether or no they were ejected by the police, or if they had to walk the streets all night. Now, obviously, the matter cannot be left in its present state; either the girls were informed that they were personally responsible for our soldiers' safety, or they were not; either the police did throw them out, or did not. If the latter is the case it reveals a grave and serious condition of things which should not for a moment be tolerated; if the statements have no basis in fact a gross injustice has been done to the manager of the Summer Street factory. It is impossible to leave the point unsettled, and in default of Dr. Addison's report as to the true state of affairs, we would urge Mr. Duncan to return to the charge. The increasing employment of women in munition factories calls for a reassurance as to the conditions under which they work, and demands that the Government should safeguard their interests and protect them from injustice.

The Yorkshire Observer
21/9/15

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Inspection of Factories.

A London coroner, who informed a jury that for the time being the usual inspection of factories was suspended, seems himself to have been insufficiently informed, and anyone acting upon his declaration would be ill-advised. It is quite true that there has been some relaxation of the provisions of the Act with regard to the number of hours that workpeople may be engaged, but this only applies to special cases. Section 150 of the Factory and Workshop Act, which deals with this matter, provides that "in case of any public emergency the Secretary of State may by order, to the extent and during the period named by him, exempt from this Act any factory or workshop belonging to the Crown or any factory or workshop in respect of work which is being done on behalf of the Crown." What has happened is that under this section employers have been allowed, after obtaining the necessary order from the Home Office, to extend the hours of labour beyond those allowed in times of peace. The "public emergency" of the past twelve months or more has warranted the issuing of such orders. It may be stated that the extension ultimately found necessary was much less than that for which provision was originally made in the orders, which were accordingly altered. In all other respects the administration of the Factory Act remains as before.

Daily News & Leader
26/10/15

WOMEN & MUNITION WORK.

THE SUPPLY COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS.

By MARY R. MACARTHUR.

It is generally recognised that the rapid influx of women into many branches of industry—a process which will possibly go on with increasing force for months to come—creates a number of problems which require careful handling and adjustment. Since factory laws in many establishments in the present abnormal circumstances have been modified or set aside it is essential, for instance, that standards should be insisted upon such as will help to maintain in the days ahead of us the health and efficiency of the women workers.

To put the matter on no higher ground (though in a very real sense the whole future of the nation and its children is involved) it is bad industrial economy to squander wastefully our human resources by giving no thought to the physical capacity and endurance of wage-earning women. The old lady of the fairy legend who tried to get all the golden eggs at one gathering was not more foolish than those firms which expect permanently to increase output by prolonged and continuous overstrain on the workpeople. What does follow a long spell of overwork is increased sickness, broken time, a slackening of energy, and a nervous and mental reaction which renders far more precarious and unstable the maintenance of industrial peace.

The £1 Minimum.

If workers are to give of their best, if they are to work month after month at practically the top notch of their physical capacity, the question of good wages becomes a matter of the first importance. It is against reason to expect good and sustained workmanship from an underpaid and underfed girl. She cannot possibly return the energy which she has never been allowed to receive. With food prices at their present high level, with coal and many other commodities advancing in price, with rents rising in the munition areas, the whole question of the remuneration of labour, especially of poorly paid labour, must be honestly faced unless we are prepared for the quantity and quality of work to suffer.

Let us be quite clear, at any rate, that the industrial efficiency of a woman in a munition factory will not be of the highest order if her usual dinner has to be bread and pickles.

These problems, in so far as they affect transferred labour, have been engaging the attention of the Munitions Labour Supply Committee, whose recommendations regarding the employment and remuneration of women on certain classes of war work have just been issued by the Ministry of Munitions. These recommendations, though striking and significant, do not in themselves go very far, and only include women engaged on such classes of munition work as before the war was done by men. Statements to the effect that all women employed on munition work are now to receive a minimum wage of £1 a week have been made, but are entirely misleading and can only lead to trouble and disappointment. I earnestly wish that these statements were true.

Equal Pay for Equal Work.

It has been repeatedly affirmed by the engineers that equal wage for equal work was the only principle on which they could accept the introduction of women into classes of work which previously was the exclusive preserve of men. To this principle, which the engineers considered equally necessary in the interests of women and in their own, lip service at any rate was given on all sides and it was confirmed in the Crayford Agreement in November, 1914, in the Shell and Fuses Agreement in March, 1915, and in a modified form in the famous Treasury Agreement.

The principle was supposed to find legal expression and legislative sanction in the Munitions Act, but here its only safeguard is found in the somewhat vaguely expressed phrase, Section ii. 5, that the "admission of semi-skilled or female labour shall not affect adversely the rates fied form in the famous Treasury Agreement.

The principle was supposed to find legal expression and legislative sanction in the Munitions Act, but here its only safeguard is found in the somewhat vaguely expressed phrase, Section ii. 5, that the "admission of semi-skilled or female labour shall not affect adversely the rates customarily paid for the job."

Now it is not too much to say that in the munition works this principle of equal pay for equal work between men and women has so far been more honoured in the breach than the observance. Yet we have the evidence of several large engineering employers that on many processes women can do the work as well as men, and on some processes more deftly than men. Instances there are, of course, where women are being paid the same rates as men for the same work, and we have members of the National Federation of Women Workers who earn from £3 to £4 per week.

Let it be remembered, however, that this wage means a seven days week, with all the strain that that involves, and that it includes extra allowance for overtime and night shifts and applies only to a limited number of skilled women.

On the other hand, the rates paid to women on time or premium bonus systems have not even remotely approximated to those formerly paid to men for the same or similar work.

"An Honest Effort."

Of course it must be remembered that coincident with the introduction of women the method of production is often changed, and comparison as between the new and old processes difficult to make. This was illustrated at a conference which took place in August of representatives of the men and women workers engaged in the shell and airship factories in Barrow. It was found that one process, that of gauging shells, formerly performed by semi-skilled men for 28s. a week, had been split up into 17 different processes when the women were introduced. The rate paid to the women was 15s. per week net, but the workers had not the necessary data to compare the output per individual on the different systems. Two processes which had formerly been "debatable ground" between the skilled engineers and the semi-skilled men, and for which the engineers' rate had been 43s. per week, were being performed by the girls at a basic rate of 15s. Instances could be multiplied indefinitely.

The recommendations are an attempt to apply in practice the theory of equal wage for equal work, and though in my opinion the attempt falls short in several vital respects it is at least a sincere and honest effort to deal with the problem. Where they are adopted the recommendations will guarantee a time wage of £1 for a normal working week to all women of 18 who are learning to do any part of a job previously done by men, or employed on piecework or the premium bonus system in cases where their earnings fail to reach the standard amount. The recommendations will also ensure for night or Sunday work a time rate of 25s., 30s., or even £2, according to the custom of the district for men. Women engaged on piece work or on the premium bonus system will be paid exactly the same as men for the same quantity of work, though their time rate guarantee will be less. These proposals, though far from adequate, mark a distinct advance as compared with the present position, and if they are honestly carried out will distinctly improve the conditions of a large number of working women and girls.

676/7

The Manchester Guardian — 20.11.15.

The Munitions Act.

THE extensive powers over employers and employed which the Government enjoys under the Munitions Act have been found so far valuable that a considerable extension is contemplated. Not only the direct production of munitions, but subsidiary processes such as building, the supply of power or of materials for munition works, become, as the pressure of the war increases, of almost equal urgency, and it is understood that the Government intends to bring these services within the scope of the Act. To the employers that will mean, pecuniarily, the taxation of their profits; to the workmen it means restrictions on liberty of movement. The latter is the more keenly felt, and, as our London correspondent showed on Thursday, the extension of the Act will have, in effect, to be purchased by amendments removing the principal grievances of labour. It is one of the risks which we run by curtailing publicity of discussion that no one knows the precise extent or depth of the feeling roused by the Munitions Act. The most definite thing generally known is that when the Act came up against collective and determined opposition in the South Wales miners it collapsed. There would, of course, be no way of enforcing it upon the concentrated opposition of skilled men, and for this reason if for no other it is wise to understand the reasons why the workmen dislike it. Nor is this difficult. The Act suspends the mobility of labour and the right to withhold work. For this suspension there are strong public reasons which the workmen perfectly understand. What the public perhaps does not understand quite so clearly is that the Act deprives the workmen of the chance of obtaining the full price for that monopoly value which the war has conferred upon his skill. The country faced with war is "caught short" in its supply of skilled men. The lack of them limits on all sides the employment of half-skilled and unskilled. Left quite free to bargain, they could obtain a very high price. In many cases, doubtless, the price they have obtained is much above the normal. None the less, they are in fact debarred from selling their work to the employer who will make the highest bid for it, since they cannot leave work in a controlled establishment without a certificate. Now this restriction is in the public interest, and we do not think the workman complains of it taken by itself. But he notes that there are other classes whose wares also command a monopoly value—farmers, for example,—and that nothing is done in their case to protect the community. He was told somewhat roughly last spring that the Government could not control prices, and therefore could not arrest the increase in his cost of living. But it can and does prevent him from taking full advantage of the circumstances that would tend to raise his wages.

This reflection underlies a good deal of the sense of grievance which the Act has notoriously excited. But it is not the point to which indignation is especially directed, or on which reform is demanded. What the workman feels most is that, while he is no longer free to leave his employer, the employer is at liberty to discharge him. It is a one-sided contract. Nor is this all. In order to obtain employment elsewhere a man who leaves a "controlled" workshop must obtain a certificate of discharge from his employer. By withholding the certificate the employer may condemn a man to a period of unemployment. The workman's remedy is to appeal to the Munitions Tribunal. This tribunal consists of a chairman appointed by the Munitions Ministry, and two assessors representing employers and employed. Now the Munitions Ministry is, so to say, a super-employer. It is for the Ministry that the employer himself works. The chairman is, therefore, hardly an impartial third party, but represents authority. There should be a stronger tribunal to deal with all offences under the Act, and it should be one giving more weight to the labour element. But the whole principle of this portion of the Act is unjust. The workman's right to leave his employment is restricted. It can be exercised only by the consent of the Munitions Tribunal. The employer's right of dismissal is not similarly restricted. In case of dismissal all that the trbunal can do is to grant a certificate. There is no adequate excuse for this inequality, and, in our view, the best step would be to go as far as possible to the restoration of freedom. The employer, we should say, should be free to dismiss and the workman to depart, subject in each case to an appeal to the strengthened Munitions Tribunal. This would adequately meet the original object of the clause, which was to prevent workmen being enticed away by offers from other firms. In any such case the employer could appeal to the tribunal, which could withhold its consent. It would also give the workman a security of tenure to compensate for his loss of the right to seek the best market, while it would leave the employer free to dismiss him for incompetence or insubordination—cumbrous machinery, no doubt, but in the wisdom of our legislators we have been committed to the mechanical regulation of these matters, and the best that can be done is to grind as much justice out of the machine as may be.

It is often said that complaints of the one-sidedness of the Act leave out of consideration the four-fifths tax on profits. Unfortunately this tax leaves a good deal to the imagination. It is hedged about—quite necessarily—with so many provisions and limitations that the workman remains cold when he is assured that, private profit being in substance eliminated, he is now working for the State. To make him believe this it would have been necessary to nationalise the munitions works, retaining the present owners and employers as caretakers and managers for the period of the war. In the wisdom of the authorities this course was rejected, and the workman was left tied down to a private employer for the sake of the public utility of his work. We foresaw that he would not like it, and we believe that it can only be made tolerable to him in the long run by careful attention to the practical grievances that have arisen and by rigid determination to apply rules and regulations restrictive of traditional liberty to both parties alike.

67

Morning Post.

30. 11. 15.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN MUNITION WORKERS

The Women's Local Government Society have sent to Mr. Lloyd George, as Minister of Munitions, a memorial saying: "We respectifully urge that the Munitions of War Act, 1915, may be so amended as to provide for the formation of a panel of women having knowledge of trade conditions or other special qualifications, and that in every case in which the conditions of female labour or the right of a female to leave her employment are or is involved, one of such women shall be appointed as an additional assessor, and that if in any such case there shall be no such woman available to act as an assessor, the female party or parties to the dispute shall be entitled to require that a female factory or insurance or sanitary inspector shall be nominated to act in that capacity."

Daily News & Leader.

30. 11. 1915.

WOMEN MUNITION WORKER'

The Women's Local Government Society, has sent a memorial to the Minister of Munitions, urging that the Munitions Act be amended to provide a panel of women, so that one of them may be appointed as an additional assessor where the rights of women workers are involved.

If one of these assessors be not available, the female party to the dispute, it is suggested, should be entitled to require that a woman factory, insurance, or sanitary inspector be nominated to act in that capacity.

676/9

67

Daily News & Leader - 1. 12. 1915.

AMENDMENTS TO THE MUNITIONS ACT.

MR. LL. GEORGE MEETS TRADE UNIONISTS.

MEN'S PROPOSALS.

NO DISMISSALS WITHOUT CERTIFICATES.

The following official statement was issued last night:

PRESS BUREAU, Tuesday Night.

An important conference was held to-day in the Wesleyan Central Hall, Westminster, which was attended by the Minister of Munitions and representatives of the trade unions whose members are affected by the Munitions of War Act, 1915.

The object of the conference was to suggest amendments to the Munitions of War Act, in view of the Amendment Bill shortly to be introduced by the Government. There were 55 trade unions (a list of which is given below) represented at the conference.

The Right Hon. A. Henderson occupied the chair, and Mr. Lloyd George was accompanied by Dr. Addison, Dr. Macnamara, Sir H. L. Smith, Mr. Beveridge, and Mr. Wolff. Mr. Clynes, M.P., and Mr. F. S. Button addressed the conference in criticism of the Act.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S REPLY.

Mr. Lloyd George, who had a cordial reception, in the course of his reply to these criticisms, said that he was in favour of the principle of many of the proposals which had already been presented to him by the representatives of the trade unions; he promised that those to which he could not agree would have his close and sympathetic consideration. The Government desired the Act to work smoothly and satisfactorily.

In the speeches that had been made it appeared to have been overlooked that while the Munitions of War Act interfered to some extent with the liberties of the workman, the Minister of Munitions possessed extensive powers over controlled establishments which cut quite as deeply into the rights of private employers as any provision affecting workmen. He presumed that there was no desire on the part of the trade unions to repeal the part of the Act affecting employers. One chief object of the Act was to give State control over unlimited competition, a principle that many Labour men had been advocating for a long time, and during the progress of this war more things had been done to further the principles of the Labour movement than the propaganda of a generation had been able to secure.

It might seem hard that a workman could not leave one shop to go to another, but the same restriction applied to the soldier who objected to storm the Hohenzollern Redoubt, but would prefer to go to some place behind the fighting line. If this war was a just war, if we were fighting for humanity and for the overthrow of the domination of a military caste in Europe, it was not for men to stand out at such a time for the right to leave one shop to go to another when the whim seized them.

He noticed that most of the amendments were in the direction of what might be called reciprocity. There was a feeling that if a workman could not discharge his employer without a certificate from a tribunal, the employer ought not to be able to discharge the workman without a similar certificate. He had a good deal of sympathy with that, and the point would be considered.

There were also matters affecting the powers of the Ministry in enforcing recommendations upon controlled establishments. The constitution of Munitions Tribunals was also a matter worthy of consideration He could only state that when the deputation appointed by the conference met him in the evening with the conference's recommendations they would seriously consider how best the wishes expressed might be met.

THE EVENING MEETING.

The proposals of the conference were brought before the Minister the same evening by a committee elected by the conference, consisting of the following representatives:

Mr. A. Henderson,	F. Sharp.
A. Wilkie, M.P.,	F. Button.
C. W. Bowerman, M.P.,	F. Chandler.
J. Hill.	W. F. Dawtry.
F. Smith.	Miss M. R. Macarthur.
W. Thorne, M.P.,	W. Mosses.

a full discussion taking place on the more important proposals agreed to at the afternoon's conference.

Mr. Lloyd George promised a full consideration of the various points submitted to him, and it is understood that a further conference with the committee will be held before the final draft of the Amendment Bill is decided upon.

THE SOCIETIES.

The societies represented at the conference were:

Amal. Socy. Engineers	Nat. Union Stove Grate Workers
Assoc. Ironmldrs. (Scot)	Ldn. Saddle and Harness Makers.
Fly. Socy. Ironfounders	Sheet Metal Workers
Shipconstructors and Shipwrights Socy.	Utd. Machine Workers
Nat. Union Railwaymen	Liverpool Shipwrights
Gaswks. & Gen. Lab. U.	Iron & Steel Federation
Gas Municipal and Gen. Workers	The Workers' Union
Nat. Amal Furn. Trades	Scottish Brassmoulders
Amal. Carpenters and Joiners	Scientific Instrument Makers
Gen. Union Carpenters and Joiners	Boilermakers Society
Dock, Whf., Riverside, and Gen Wkrs. Union	Assoc. Blacksmiths Socy.
W. of Scot. Brassfinishers	Smiths and Strikers
Amal. Socy. Toolmakers	Nat. Union of Clerks
Ldn. & Prov. Coachmkrs.	Operative Stone Masons
U.K. Socy Coachmakers	Nat. Painters' Society
Brit. Lab. Amalgamation	Scottish Painters
Nat. Amal. U. of Labour	Amal. Wire Drawers
Ldn. Glass Blowers.	Electrical Trade Union
North. Utd. Enginemen	Machine & Gen. Lab'rs.
Nat. Amal. U. Enginem'n	Steel Smelters
Nat. Fed. Women Wkrs.	Nat. Fed. of Enginemen
Manchester & District Women's Trade C'cil	Boot Operatives
Assoc. Socy Loco. Engineers and Firemen	Steam Engine Makers
Utd Operatives Plumb'rs	United Brassfounders
Nat. Fed. Blast Furnacemen	Upholsterers
	National Brassworkers
	Assoc. Brassfounders
	Sheet Iron Workers
	Wood Cutting Machinists
	Nat. Steel Wkrs. Assoc.

WOMEN WORKERS' APPEALS.

Miss Gertrude Tuckwell and Miss Susan Lawrence (Women's Trade Union League), Miss Mary Macarthur and Miss M. Bondfield (National Federation of Women Workers), and the leading officials of a number of other women's organisations, have asked Mr. Lloyd George to amend the Munitions Act so as to secure that whenever cases of women employees are considered by the tribunals one of the assessors shall be a woman.

676/10

676

The Standard.
1. 12. 15.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WOMEN AND THE MUNITIONS ACT.

To the Editor of "The Standard."

Sir,—The undersigned have been strongly impressed with the importance of securing that whenever cases of women employees are considered by the munitions courts, provision should be made for the presence of a woman. In view of the proposed amendment of the Munitions Act, and the conference with the trade unions, it is urgently necessary that amendments with this object should be put forward.

The need for the presence of a woman in the munitions courts is easily seen. Many cases will arise in which women will apply for leaving certificates. In some of these the grounds for leaving will be such as women are very reluctant to state in a court composed of men. One such case has already arisen, of which we know, because the women concerned are trade union members. There are probably many others. It is clear that in these cases it is essential to have a woman whose duty it is to consult with the applicant before the case is heard, find out the real facts, and put forward her application before the court. If the munitions court, therefore, is to deal fairly with women there must be a woman assessor or a woman to help the workers to state their case.—We are, yours, etc.,

GERTRUDE TUKEWELL,
Women's Trade Union League.
A. SUSAN LAWRENCE, L.C.C.,
Women's Trade Union League.
MARY R. MACARTHUR,
National Federation of Women Workers.
MARGARET BONDFIELD,
National Federation of Women Workers.
MARY LONGMAN,
Women's Labour League.
ADA SALTER,
Women's Labour League.
MARGARET LLEWELYN DAVIES,
Women's Co-operative Guild.
E. WEBB,
Railway Women's Guild.
ELLEN SMITH,
Fabian Women's Group.
SOPHY SANGER,
International Association for Labour Legislation, British Section.
J. J. MALLON,
Anti-Sweating League.

Liverpool Journal of Commerce,
1. 12. 15.

MUNITIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Important Conference.

LONDON, Tuesday.

The following official report of the conference held to-day, at the Central Hall, Westminster, between trade union representatives and Mr. Lloyd George, was issued this evening by the Ministry of Munitions:

An important conference was held to-day in the Wesleyan Central Hall, Westminster, which was attended by the Minister of Munitions and representatives of the trade unions, whose members are affected by the Munitions of War Act, 1915. The object of the conference was to suggest amendments to the Munitions of War Act, in view of the Amendment Bill shortly to be introduced by the Government. There were 55 trade unions represented at the conference.

The Right Hon. A. Henderson occupied the chair, and Mr. Lloyd George was accompanied by Dr. Addison, Dr. Macnamara, Sir H. L. Smith, Mr. Beveridge, and Mr. Wolff. Mr. Clynes, M.P., and Mr. F. S. Button addressed the conference in criticism of the Act.

Mr. Lloyd George, who had a cordial reception, in the course of his reply to these criticisms, said that he was in favour of the principles of many of the proposals which had already been presented to him by the representatives of trade unions. Those he could not agree to he promised should have his close and sympathetic consideration. The Government desired the Act to work smoothly and satisfactorily. In speeches that had been made it appeared to have been overlooked that while the Munitions of War Act interfered to some extent with the liberties of the workmen, the Minister of Munitions possessed the extensive powers over controlled establishments which cut quite as deeply into the rights of private employers as any provision affecting workmen. He presumed that there was no desire on the part of the Trade Union to repeal the part of the Act affecting employers. One chief object of the act was to give State control over unlimited competition a principle that many labour men had been advocating for a long time, and during the progress of this war more things had been done to further the principles of the Labour movement than the propaganda of a generation had been able to secure. He could only state that when the deputation appointed by the conference met him in the evening, with the conference's recommendations they would sit down and seriously consider how best the wishes expressed might be met.

The proposals of the conference were brought before the Minister the same evening by a committee elected by the conference, consisting of the following representatives:—The Right Hon. A. Henderson, A. Wilkie, M.P., C. W. Bowerman, M.P., J. Hill, F. Smith, W. Thorne, M.P., F. Sharpe, F. Button, F. Chandler, W. F. Dawtry, and Miss M. R. MacArthur.

676/11

676.

The Daily Chronicle — 1.12.15.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE & WAR WORKERS.

HIGHER WAGES BAD FOR THE STATE.

MEN IN TRENCHES CANNOT GET DISCHARGE CERTIFICATES.

A conference of trade unions engaged in the production of war munitions was held yesterday at Central Hall, Westminster, under the chairmanship of Mr. A. Henderson, President of the Board of Education.

The conference was called to hear a statement from the Minister of Munitions regarding the proposed Bill to amend the Munitions Act. Fifty-five trade unions were represented.

The proceedings opened with a lengthy statement from two Labour representatives—Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P., and Mr. E. Button, of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers—who urged that the Act was working very unsatisfactorily from the workmen's standpoint.

Mr. Lloyd George replied in a speech that occupied an hour. His remarks were frequently greeted with cheers, and there were roars of laughter when he made a palpable hit. On the whole, however, his address was of a serious nature.

The Minister of Munitions said he had considered fully the amendments which had been submitted by the trade unions. To some of them he was frankly sympathetic. To others he had strong objection. There were three interests involved in the working of the Act—the State, the employer, and the workman. Each approached the position from divergent points. They, the delegates of the trade unions, might claim to represent one million workers, but he, as a responsible Minister, represented the State with its 45 millions. The interests of a class were subordinate to the interests of the State as a whole.

CHIEF BUSINESS TO WIN THE WAR.

The representatives of the workers must remember that the present business was to win the war, and any hardship which might fall on the workers at home was little compared with the dangers and difficulties experienced by the men in the trenches. There were three million men in the Army, and a million of these were undergoing the horrors or war at the front.

The question, continued Mr. Lloyd George, had been raised as to the onerous position involved when a workman desired to leave his employment to better his position—either owing to an obnoxious foreman or to the opportunity of proceeding to a new situation which would provide him with increased wages. He could understand that there were cases of real hardships with which he would be prepared to deal. But he would not hold out any hope that he could accept the proposed amendments relating to this matter, nor could he associate himself with the sentiment which underlay their proposals.

A soldier in the trenches could not appeal for his discharge certificate. He could not say that the position in the trenches was so dangerous that he wished to go back three or four miles to the rear out of the way of danger. Nor, in his opinion, should the workman be entitled to leave unless there were circumstances of a compelling nature.

NOT A TIME FOR HIGHER WAGES.

Dealing with the wages aspect of the question, Mr. Lloyd George made it clear that the Government could not sanction a general transfer of workmen, however much the employers were anxious to obtain supplies of skilled labour. The manufacturers, he said, were not the ruling factors. Large increases in wages did not affect them so much as they did the State as a whole. They could probably pay substantial increases in order to secure the most able men, but the State could not afford, at this time, to allow wages to advance according to the ordinary law of supply and demand. It was essential to the interests of the nation that the greatest economy should be pursued in the life of the nation, and continued increases in wages defeated that object.

The proposals of the conference were brought before the Minister of Munitions last night by a committee elected by the conference and consisting of the following representatives:—

The Right Hon. A. Henderson, A. Wilkie, M.P., C. W. Bowerman, M.P., J. Hill, F. Smith, W. Thorne, M.P., F. Sharp, F. Button, F. Chandler, W. F. Dawtry, Miss M. R. Macarthur, and W. Mosses.

A full discussion took place on the more important proposals agreed to at the afternoon's conference. Mr. Lloyd George promised a full consideration of the various points submitted to him, and it is understood that a further conference with the committee will be held before the final draft of the Amendment Bill is decided upon.

Women's organisations have asked Mr. Lloyd George so to amend the Munitions Act as to secure that whenever cases of women employees are considered by the tribunals one of the assessors shall be a woman.

COMMENTS ON DISCHARGE CERTIFICATES.

One of the amendments which it is understood Mr. Lloyd George will make to the Munitions Act is that leaving certificates must not bear any comment.

Yesterday an assistant foreman labourer at a Newcastle shipbuilding yard complained that the company in a certificate of discharge had made a false statement for the purpose of evading the Munitions Act, namely, "Unsatisfactory." It was contended that it was not a certificate but a reference of character and prevented complainant obtaining employment elsewhere. The firm agreed to give complainant a clean certificate, and the summons was withdrawn.

The Times – 1. 12. 15.

WORKING OF THE MUNITIONS ACT.

TRADE UNIONS AND MR. LLOYD GEORGE.

"RIGHTS" IN WAR TIME.

Mr. Lloyd George yesterday met representatives of the trade unions, who suggested various amendments to the Munitions of War Act. Later in the day the proposals were considered by a Committee of the conference, and the Minister of Munitions promised a full consideration of the points submitted to him. It is understood that a further conference will be held before the final draft of the Amendment Bill is decided upon.

The following is the official report of yesterday's conference:—

An important conference was held yesterday in the Wesleyan Central Hall, Westminster, which was attended by the Minister of Munitions and representatives of the trade unions, whose members are affected by the Munitions of War Act, 1915.

The object of the conference was to suggest amendments to the Munitions of War Act, in view of the Amendment Bill shortly to be introduced by the Government.

There were 55 trade unions represented at the conference as follows:—

Amal. Soc. of Engineers, Assoc. Ironmoulders (Scotland), Friendly Soc. of Ironfounders, Shipconstructors' and Shipwrights' Soc., Nat. Union of Railwaymen, Gasworkers' and Gen. Labourers' Union, Gas, Municipal, and Gen. Workers, Nat. Amal. Furnishing Trades, Amal. Carpenters and Joiners, Gen. Union of Carpenters and Joiners, Dock Wharf Riverside, and Gen. Workers' Union, West of Scotland Brassfinishers, Amal. Society of Toolmakers, London and Provincial Coachmakers, United Kingdom Society of Coachmakers, British Labour Amalgamation, Nat. Amal. Union of Labour, London Glass Blowers, Northern United Enginemen, Nat. Amal. Union of Enginemen, Nat. Fed. of Women Workers, Manchester and Dist. Women's Trade Council, Assoc. Soc. of Locomotives Engineers and Firemen, United Operative Plumbers, Nat. Fed of Blast Furnacemen, Nat Union of Stove Grate Workers, London Saddle and Harness Makers, Sheet Metal Workers, United Machine Workers, Liverpool Shipwrights, Iron and Steel Fed., the Workers' Union, Scottish Brassmoulders, Scientific Instrument Makers, Boilermakers' Soc., Assoc. Blacksmiths Soc., Smiths and Strikers, Nat. Union of Clerks, Operative Stone Masons, Nat. Painters Soc., Scottish Painters, Amal. Wire Drawers, Electrical Trade Union, Machine and General Labourers, Steel Smelters, Nat. Fed. of Enginemen, Boot Operatives, Steam Engine Makers, United Brassfounders, Upholsterers, Nat. Brassworkers, Assoc. Brassfounders, Sheet Iron Workers, Woodcutting Machinists, Nat. Steel Workers' Assoc.

The Right Hon. A. Henderson occupied the chair, and Mr. Lloyd George was accompanied by Dr. Addison, Dr. Macnamara, Sir H. L. Smith, Mr. Beveridge, and Mr. Wolff. Mr. Clynes, M.P., and Mr. F. S. Button addressed the Conference in criticism of the Act.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE, who had a cordial reception, in the course of his reply to these criticisms said that he was in favour of the principle of many of the proposals which had already been presented to him by the representatives of the trade unions; those he could not agree to he promised should have his close and sympathetic consideration. The Government desired the Act to work smoothly and satisfactorily. In the speeches that had been made it appeared to have been overlooked that while the Munitions of War Act interfered to some extent with the liberties of the workman, the Minister of Munitions possessed extensive powers over controlled establishments which cut quite as deeply into the rights of private employers as any provision affecting workmen. He presumed that there was no desire on the part of the trade unions to repeal the part of the Act affecting employers. One chief object of the Act was to give State control over unlimited competition, a principle that many labour men had been advocating for a long time, and during the progress of this war more things had been done to further the principles of the Labour movement than the propaganda of a generation had been able to secure.

It might seem hard that a workman could not leave one shop to go to another, but the same restriction applied to the soldier who objected to storm Hohenzollern Redoubt, but would prefer to go to some place behind the fighting line. If this war was a just war, if we were fighting for humanity and for the overthrow of the domination of a military caste in Europe, it was not for men to stand out at such a time for the right to leave one shop to go to another when the whim seized them. He noticed that most of the amendments were in the direction of what might be called reciprocity. There was a feeling that if a workman could not discharge his employer without a certificate from a tribunal the employer ought not to be able to discharge the workman without a similar certificate. He had a good deal of sympathy with that, and the point would be considered.

There were also matters affecting the powers of the Ministry in enforcing recommendations upon controlled establishments. The constitution of Munitions Tribunals was also a matter worthy of consideration. He could only state that when the deputation appointed by the Conference met him in the evening with the Conference's recommendations, they would sit down and seriously consider how best the wishes expressed might be met.

[illegible] the Conference were brought to [illegible]

Act. Later in the day the proposals were considered by a Committee of the conference, and the Minister of Munitions promised a full consideration of the points submitted to him. It is understood that a further conference will be held before the final draft of the Amendment Bill is decided upon.

The following is the official report of yesterday's conference :—

An important conference was held yesterday in the Wesleyan Central Hall, Westminster, which was attended by the Minister of Munitions and representatives of the trade unions, whose members are affected by the Munitions of War Act, 1915.

The object of the conference was to suggest amendments to the Munitions of War Act, in view of the Amendment Bill shortly to be introduced by the Government.

There were 55 trade unions represented at the conference as follows :—

Amal. Soc. of Engineers, Assoc. Ironmoulders (Scotland), Friendly Soc. of Ironfounders, Shipconstructors' and Shipwrights' Soc., Nat. Union of Railwaymen, Gasworkers' and Gen. Labourers' Union, Gas, Municipal, and Gen. Workers, Nat. Amal. Furnishing Trades, Amal. Carpenters and Joiners, Gen. Union of Carpenters and Joiners, Dock Wharf Riverside, and Gen. Workers' Union, West of Scotland Brassfinishers, Amal. Society of Toolmakers, London and Provincial Coachmakers, United Kingdom Society of Coachmakers, British Labour Amalgamation, Nat. Amal. Union of Labour, London Glass Blowers, Northern United Enginemen, Nat. Amal. Union of Enginemen, Nat. Fed. of Women Workers, Manchester and Dist. Women's Trade Council, Assoc. Soc. of Locomotives Engineers and Firemen, United Operative Plumbers, Nat. Fed of Blast Furnacemen, Nat Union of Stove Grate Workers, London Saddle and Harness Makers, Sheet Metal Workers, United Machine Workers, Liverpool Shipwrights, Iron and Steel Fed., the Workers' Union, Scottish Brassmoulders, Scientific Instrument Makers, Boilermakers' Soc., Assoc. Blacksmiths Soc., Smiths and Strikers, Nat. Union of Clerks, Operative Stone Masons, Nat. Painters Soc., Scottish Painters, Amal. Wire Drawers, Electrical Trade Union, Machine and General Labourers, Steel Smelters, Nat. Fed. of Enginemen, Boot Operatives, Steam Engine Makers, United Brassfounders, Upholsterers, Nat. Brassworkers, Assoc. Brassfounders, Sheet Iron Workers, Woodcutting Machinists, Nat. Steel Workers' Assoc.

The Right Hon. A. Henderson occupied the chair, and Mr. Lloyd George was accompanied by Dr. Addison, Dr. Macnamara, Sir H. L. Smith, Mr. Beveridge, and Mr. Wolff. Mr. Clynes, M.P., and Mr. F. S. Button addressed the Conference in criticism of the Act.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE, who had a cordial reception, in the course of his reply to these criticisms said that he was in favour of the principle of many of the proposals which had already been presented to him by the representatives of the trade unions; those he could not agree to he promised should have his close and sympathetic consideration. The Government desired the Act to work smoothly and satisfactorily. In the speeches that had been made it appeared to have been overlooked that while the Munitions of War Act interfered to some extent with the liberties of the workman, the Minister of Munitions possessed extensive powers over controlled establishments which cut quite as deeply into the rights of private employers as any provision affecting workmen. He presumed that there was no desire on the part of the trade unions to repeal the part of the Act affecting employers. One chief object of the Act was to give State control over unlimited competition, a principle that many labour men had been advocating for a long time, and during the progress of this war more things had been done to further the principles of the Labour movement than the propaganda of a generation had been able to secure.

It might seem hard that a workman could not leave one shop to go to another, but the same restriction applied to the soldier who objected to storm Hohenzollern Redoubt, but would prefer to go to some place behind the fighting line. If this war was a just war, if we were fighting for humanity and for the overthrow of the domination of a military caste in Europe, it was not for men to stand out at such a time for the right to leave one shop to go to another when the whim seized them. He noticed that most of the amendments were in the direction of what might be called reciprocity. There was a feeling that if a workman could not discharge his employer without a certificate from a tribunal the employer ought not to be able to discharge the workman without a similar certificate. He had a good deal of sympathy with that, and the point would be considered.

There were also matters affecting the powers of the Ministry in enforcing recommendations upon controlled establishments. The constitution of Munitions Tribunals was also a matter worthy of consideration. He could only state that when the deputation appointed by the Conference met him in the evening with the Conference's recommendations, they would sit down and seriously consider how best the wishes expressed might be met.

The proposals of the Conference were brought before the Minister the same evening by a committee elected by the Conference, consisting of the following representatives :—The Right Hon. A. Henderson, A. Wilkie, M.P., C. W. Bowerman, M.P., J. Hill, F. Smith, W. Thorne, M.P., F. Sharp, F. Button, F. Chandler, W. F. Dawtry, Miss M. R. Macarthur, and W. Mosses, a full discussion taking place on the more important proposals agreed to at the afternoon's conference.

Mr. Lloyd George promised a full consideration of the various points submitted to him, and it is understood that a further conference with the committee will be held before the final draft of the Amendment Bill is decided upon.

The Morning Post.

1. 12. 15.

Representatives of several Women's Labour leagues and guilds have signed a declaration pointing out that whenever cases of women employees are considered by the Munitions Courts provision should be made for the presence of a female assessor to help the workers to state their case. The Munitions Act, it is urged, should be so amended as to secure this reform.

Votes for Women

3. 12. 15.

THE MUNITIONS ACT

An important memorial has been sent to the Minister of Munitions by the Women's Local Government Society, urging that the Munitions Act should be so amended as to provide for the formation of a panel of specially qualified women, one of whom shall be appointed as an additional Assessor when the conditions of women's labour, or their right to leave their employment, are in question. The memorial further asks that if no such woman is available, the women shall be entitled to require that a woman factory, or insurance, or sanitary inspector, be nominated to act in that capacity. The memorial is very extensively signed by well-known men and women, including the Bishop of London, Sir William Chance, Mrs. Sidney Webb, Mrs. Humphry Ward, Sir Norman Lockyer, and many distinguished Suffragists.

676

The New Statesman. 11.12.15.

The Munitions Act Amendment Bill may possibly have been formally read a first time before this appears, but it will not be circulated until next week. This time there can be no pretence of any Trade Union Agreement. The Government will concede the demand pressed on it from all sides of the House that cases affecting women should not be tried without the presence of a Woman Assessor, but refuses to give either this or any other Assessor any real membership of the Munitions Tribunal, in which the lawyer-chairman (to whom the Minister of Munitions admittedly circulates confidential instructions) is to remain sole judge. The Government refuses, moreover, to permit any appeal from his decision, but offers the quite illusory concession of power to state a case to the High Court on points of law only. This in a tribunal where neither party is usually represented by any barrister or solicitor competent to take such a technical objection! The Government also, we understand, refuses to fulfil the definite Ministerial pledge that there should be no imprisonment under these unsatisfactory tribunals, taking refuge in the plea that imprisonment can never be part of the sentence, but follows only from non-payment of fine imposed by a Munitions Tribunal "of the first class." But this was the very contingency that the Ministerial pledge was made to avert, as is proved by the terms of the words inserted in the Act (Sec. 4, Clause 4) in apparent fulfilment of it. If the Government fails to carry out this definite Parliamentary bargain—one of those "understandings" upon which the smooth working of the House depends—it will be treating the Labour members in a way that it would not dream of treating the members of any other Party.

* * *

With regard to the material amendments desired by the workmen, we understand that nearly all of them have been "turned down" by the employers, to whom they were submitted; and that the Government refuses to press them. Mr. Lloyd George improves the arrangements for discharge certificates, but fails to secure the payment of continuous wages for the time that the employer keeps the workman bound. The Minister of Munitions gave it to the Bristol Congress as one of the terms of his bargain with the Trade Unions that he fixed the wages in the controlled establishments. He has not done so; and he now agrees to take power to prescribe a minimum only in the case of women, and for such of these only as are employed on men's work. If we are correctly informed on this point, it amounts to an intolerable breach of faith, about which we hope that the Prime Minister will interfere. There can be no more ground for protecting from sweating the women employed on "men's work" (a very illusive and disputable expression) than the other women in munition factories, who are equally prevented by law from striking, and equally prevented from leaving the employment even of the most "sweating" employer. The public, we are sure, has not yet grasped the fact that adult women, by the thousand, are actually being thus compelled by law to work in controlled establishments at 2½d. and 3d. per hour, and that Mr. Lloyd George, at the instance of the employers, is refusing to take power even to ensure them a pound a week. We hope the Labour Party will take all possible measures to induce the House of Commons to refuse to lock these women in the sweater's den.

676/15

Daily News & Leader – December 14

LONG HOURS & LOW WAGES.

SWEATING OF WOMEN MUNITION WORKERS.

AMENDING BILL.

PROPOSED PENALTY FOR EMPLOYERS

Women munition workers are deeply concerned with the Bill amending the Munitions Act, the second reading of which Mr. Lloyd George is expected to move in the House of Commons to-morrow.

The text of the Bill, which has been the subject of prolonged negotiation, was issued yesterday. Its most important clause relating to women provides that where female labour is employed in a controlled establishment > the Minister of Munitions shall have power to require the owner of the establishment to comply with any directions given to him by the Minister as to the rate of wages or conditions of employment of the women so employed, and if the owner of the establishment, or any contractor or sub-contractor employing labour therein fails to comply with any such directions he shall be guilty of an offence under the principal Act, and shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £20, and to a fine not exceeding £1 in respect of each woman for each day on which the offence is continued after conviction therefor.

Some of the remarkable facts which have rendered necessary the immediate passage into law of such an amending clause were supplied yesterday to "The Daily News" by the Women's Trade Union League, of which Miss Mary Macarthur is secretary.

Nation's Future Health.

The investigations of the League show that the health of large bodies of women, and, therefore, the future health of the nation, is being seriously undermined by the long hours worked and low wages paid in certain munition factories. The object of the new clause is to force these sweating houses to mend their ways.

Threepence an hour—a rate heartily condemned in a recent speech by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—is still a fairly common wage for women in a variety of branches of the munitions industry. Women have recently been engaged on Government work at 1¾d., 2d., 2¼d., 2½d., and 2¾d. an hour. In the neighbourhood of London one factory has just raised its rate for fuse-making from 2d. to 2¼d. an hour.

One of the very largest firms is paying women 2½d. to 3d. an hour for labour connected with telephone making, with extra "war wages" of four-ninths of a penny. In this instance the rate of pay for women is the same for night as for day work, although the night rate for men formerly engaged on this class of job was 35s. a week. Each woman has to look after twelve machines.

In all such cases the women's unions are fighting for a minimum of 4d. per hour, anything below this being regarded by competent authorities as a sweating wage under present economic conditions.

Below Subsistence Level.

A provincial firm engaged in the manufacture of aeroplanes has been paying 1½d. an hour to girls under 18 and 1¾d. to girls above that age for a working week of 55 to 60 hours. As a result of arbitration, the scale has been raised, but is still well below the subsistence level.

In the same district girls are making bombs for 10s. a week of 55 hours. Girls belonging to a trade union applied for work, but refused it on being told the wages, whereupon the manager remarked: "Never mind, we can get soldiers' wives to do it."

A big firm in the North is working its women the full maximum of 72 hours a week allowed by the law as it stands, i.e., 12 hours a day for six days in the week; but this necessitates nearly all the women being away from home for 96 hours a week, as only certain trams from the residential quarter may be used.

London is a centre of sweated munition labour. A certain firm known to the authorities has been working its girls 75, 77, and even 80 hours a week. As they kept bad time—which under the circumstances was not remarkable—a shift was taken off, and the girls lost a day's pay. This particular factory appears to have been run under perpetual threats of appeals to the Munitions Court, which overawed the workers.

Mercury Dangers.

Where a process requires the employment of mercury firms are working girls the full five hours at a stretch allowed by law, with the result that in one case at least the girls, who left home an hour before beginning work, were in the habit of bringing food with them and eating it secretly—a proceeding most dangerous to health.

In powder factories—where the wages sometimes rule as low as 10s a week—the sheds are not infrequently very cold, damp, and ill-ventilated.

Many of the women who are working terribly long hours for a pittance are quite young girls, according to the reports of the league's investigators. Fainting is frequent, and the health of many of the girls is being permanently undermined to a degree, and in a manner, which must gravely affect the future stamina of the race.

Terribly inadequate arrangements are too often made for providing the women with food, but it is noteworthy that where proper canteens have been arranged the firms have noticed a marked improvement in the workers' output. "It pays," is the comment of those establishments that have instituted reasonable hours and an adequate commissariat.

What the Women's Trade Union League is steadily working for is the universal establishment of eight-hour shifts. Where the plan has been adopted excellent results have been achieved. From one factory in North London which recently adopted it comes this report: "Going on very satisfactorily, with steady improvement in health and output."

It is hoped that the Minister of Munitions may so administer the new clause as to make it a real Women Munition Workers' Charter. The fact that some women are earning as much as £3 a week in munition factories can be no excuse for the sweating of their less fortunate sisters.

676/16

Daily News & Leader - 14. 12. 15.

LONG HOURS & LOW WAGES.

SWEATING OF WOMEN MUNITION WORKERS.

AMENDING BILL.

PROPOSED PENALTY FOR EMPLOYERS

Women munition workers are deeply concerned with the Bill amending the Munitions Act, the second reading of which Mr. Lloyd George is expected to move in the House of Commons to-morrow.

The text of the Bill, which has been the subject of prolonged negotiation, was issued yesterday. Its most important clause relating to women provides that where female labour is employed in a controlled establishment

> the Minister of Munitions shall have power to require the owner of the establishment to comply with any directions given to him by the Minister as to the rate of wages or conditions of employment of the women so employed, and if the owner of the establishment, or any contractor or sub-contractor employing labour therein fails to comply with any such directions he shall be guilty of an offence under the principal Act, and shall be liable to a fine not exceeding £20, and to a fine not exceeding £1 in respect of each woman for each day on which the offence is continued after conviction therefor

Some of the remarkable facts which have rendered necessary the immediate passage into law of such an amending clause were supplied yesterday to "The Daily News" by the Women's Trade Union League, of which Miss Mary Macarthur is secretary.

Nation's Future Health.

The investigations of the League show that the health of large bodies of women, and, therefore, the future health of the nation, is being seriously undermined by the long hours worked and low wages paid in certain munition factories. The object of the new clause is to force these sweating houses to mend their ways.

Threepence an hour—a rate heartily condemned in a recent speech by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—is still a fairly common wage for women in a variety of branches of the munitions industry. Women have recently been engaged on Government work at 1¾d., 2d., 2¼d., 2½d., and 2¾d. an hour In the neighbourhood of London one factory has just raised its rate for fuse-making from 2d. to 2½d. an hour.

One of the very largest firms is paying women 2½d. to 3d. an hour for labour connected with telephone making, with extra "war wages" of four-ninths of a penny. In this instance the rate of pay for women is the same for night as for day work, although the night rate for men formerly engaged on this class of job was 35s. a week. Each woman has to look after twelve machines.

In all such cases the women's unions are fighting for a minimum of 4d. per hour, anything below this being regarded by competent authorities as a sweating wage under present economic conditions.

Below Subsistence Level.

A provincial firm engaged in the manufacture of aeroplanes has been paying 1½d. an hour to girls under 18 and 1¾d. to girls above that age for a working week of 55 to 60 hours. As a result of arbitration, the scale has been raised, but is still well below the subsistence level.

In the same district girls are making bombs for 10s. a week of 55 hours. Girls belonging to a trade union applied for work, but refused it on being told the wages, whereupon the manager remarked: "Never mind, we can get soldiers' wives to do it."

A big firm in the North is working its women the full maximum of 72 hours a week allowed by the law as it stands, i.e., 12 hours a day for six days in the week; but this necessitates nearly all the women being away from home for 96 hours a week, as only certain trams from the residential quarter may be used.

London is a centre of sweated munition labour. A certain firm known to the authorities has been working its girls 75, 77, and even 80 hours a week. As they kept bad time—which under the circumstances was not remarkable—a shift was taken off, and the girls lost a day's pay. This particular factory appears to have been run under perpetual threats of appeals to the Munitions Court, which overawed the workers.

Mercury Dangers.

Where a process requires the employment of mercury firms are working girls the full five hours at a stretch allowed by law, with the result that in one case at least the girls, who left home an hour before beginning work, were in the habit of bringing food with them and eating it secretly—a proceeding most dangerous to health.

In powder factories—where the wages sometimes rule as low as 10s a week—the sheds are not infrequently very cold, damp, and ill-ventilated.

Many of the women who are working terribly long hours for a pittance are quite young girls, according to the reports of the league's investigators Fainting is frequent, and the health of many of the girls is being permanently undermined to a degree, and in a manner, which must gravely affect the future stamina of the race.

Terribly inadequate arrangements are too often made for providing the women with food, but it is noteworthy that where proper canteens have been arranged the firms have noticed a marked improvement in the workers' output. "It pays," is the comment of those establishments that have instituted reasonable hours and an adequate commissariat.

What the Women's Trade Union League is steadily working for is the universal establishment of eight-hour shifts. Where the plan has been adopted excellent results have been achieved. From one factory in North London which recently adopted it comes this report: "Going on very satisfactorily, with steady improvement in health and output."

It is hoped that the Minister of Munitions may so administer the new clause as to make it a real Women Munition Workers' Charter. The fact that some women are earning as much as £3 a week in munition factories can be no excuse for the sweating of their less fortunate sisters

670/17

Daily Mail - 16. 12. 15.

WOMEN'S TRIUMPH.

THEIR SHELLS THE ENVY OF THE MEN.

FINE WORK & HIGH WAGES.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE ON PROFITS.

By OUR PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATIVE.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Wednesday.

Important additions to the powers of the Minister of Munitions are made by the Munitions of War (Amendment) Bill, which was to-day read a second time.

Not only are factories and works producing actual munitions of war to be converted into controlled establishments but power is now given to "control" the following undertakings where necessary:—

Mercantile shipbuilding,
Building of munition factories,
Power stations,
Lighting stations,
Water works.

Power is also taken to examine the books of firms supplying munitions so that the Government may see that they are not being overcharged.

These, it was admitted by the Government, are "great inroads upon private rights and industrial liberties."

Mr. Lloyd George, the Minister of Munitions, is deferring until Monday his long-expected statement on the full work which has been accomplished by his new Department.

Dr. Addison, the Under-Secretary, who moved the second reading of the Bill to-day, referred to the work which had been done as "complete and colossal," and warmly commended the patriotic spirit which had animated both employers and employed. With the relaxation of trade practices to which trade unionists had consented, the "dilution of skilled labour" (supplementing skilled workers with unskilled) was proceeding apace. Without it it would have been utterly impossible to obtain the munitions required. Most of the complaints against the working of the Munitions Act referred to the limitations on the movement of labour.

LEAVING CERTIFICATES.

The Bill introduced the following changes, based on the provision that a man cannot obtain other munitions work without a certificate from his late employer:—

Where a workman is dismissed he shall be given a leaving certificate, unless he has deliberately misbehaved

Where a man is suspended for more than three days he shall be entitled to a certificate.

Every case in which a man is dismissed without a week's notice or wages in lieu of notice shall be reported to the Munitions Tribunal.

A man who shows that he can obtain more highly skilled work shall be entitled to a leaving certificate.

There is to be nothing in the nature of a character note on the certificate.

THE ENVY OF THE MEN.

Referring to women as munition workers, Dr. Addison said everybody concerned had been exceedingly impressed by the amount of the work as well as the character of the work turned out by women in munition factories. Women were making shells, fuses, and parts of shells, handling machines, and earning money at piecework rates which was the envy of some of the men.

Steps were being taken to secure the women adequate wages. "Eighty per cent. of the work which women are now doing on munitions is not work which was previously done by men and it is not covered by the main Act. These women are working in controlled establishments, and they cannot leave without a leaving certificate. If you force women into employment which they cannot leave and which they are tied down to for at least six weeks, you must take power to secure that they are paid a reasonable wage. In large factories all over the country women are earning good wages, but there is a considerable number of cases where they are being very improperly paid."

On the subject of the examination of Exchequer." If this firm, on the other hand, was dealt with under the Excess Profits Tax the State would receive £53,900. "The levy on employers under the Munitions Act is a very considerable levy, and it prevents the possibility of the suspension of trade union regulations being exploited by employers for their own benefit." Workers must recognise that there could not be one-sided coercion. It was perfectly true that some of the powers of the original Munitions Act had been modified, but it was a mistake to suppose that the Act had not succeeded. This had been the effect:

Strikes at munition works have been all but unknown.

No strike has affected more than one establishment at a time.

No strike lasted more than five days.

In each case strikes ceased after proceedings had been taken under the Munitions Act and fines imposed.

Many strikes have been avoided by calling attention to the powers of the Munitions Act.

In many cases there has been an undoubted increase of output, particularly in Admiralty work.

THE RIGHT OF THE STATE.

In a great emergency, when the life of the nation depended upon it, the State ought to have the right to the services and the wealth and the resources of every citizen. (Cheers.) He did not recede by so much as a syllable from what he said on that point in June. "But the Munitions Act is not the carrying out of that," he continued. "Why is there no Munitions Act in France? Because in a perfectly democratic State they have taken the wider view that they have the right to commandeer every resource, every power, life, limb, weapons, and everything else, for the interests of the State. Here the Munitions Act is the alternative. It is purely an expedient, because we have not got the wider principle. It is the only way in the absence of a general organisation of the State in which you can possibly carry on the work. It is an interference with liberty! So is every law! The only point is whether it is essential in the interests of the State at the moment, and I have not the faintest doubt that it is absolutely essential."

Next Mr. Lloyd George dealt with those who had said that he ought to have appealed more to the patriotism and the good will of the workers. "Nobody has done more than I have," protested Mr. Lloyd George. "I have depended far more on persuasion than on the exercise of power. This is not a question of dealing with the majority of the workmen. It is dealing with the minority." Among 1,000,000 to 1,500,000 workmen there had been only 2,000 or 3,000 prosecutions. Finally, Mr. Lloyd George expressed his gratitude to the Labour leaders for their assistance (in particular Mr. Hodge) and their courage in dealing with the men. "The greatest risk a public man takes is to oppose his own friends," he remarked.

SWEETENING THE PILL.

Mr. Charles Duncan declared that a good deal of the trouble with workmen had been deliberately manufactured. Some of those who had excited the men were opposed to recruiting, opposed to the war, and would be opposed to everything until they controlled the country themselves. He thanked Mr. Lloyd George for his illustration of the demand the Act made on the employer. If that could be circulated among the men it would sweeten the pill so far as the Act dealt with the workmen. By martial law Germany had been able to outdistance this country in the production of munitions, but with good will he thought the voluntary plan would enable us soon to surpass their output.

Mr. Outhwaite grumbled that the only right the employers had yielded was the right to "plunder the community"; but Mr. Booth promptly informed him that employers felt that in relinquishing the right to the lock-out they had resigned one of their most cherished possessions. Business men would bear extra taxation more gladly than they would part with the right to full control of the business they had built up by their own industry. Mr. Lloyd George's example of profits was not an extravagant one. "I know firms that will beat that record," he said.

Sir Arthur Markham commended to the attention of the Minister of Munitions the fact that 8s. to 9s. a to royalty was being paid on the ore from which our steel was being made. One royalty owner was receiving no less than £150,000 a year.

While Sir Arthur was speaking, Mr Harold Smith moved "that the question be now put." "We are not here to talk. It is a disgrace," he remarked.

The proposal was passed by the Deputy-main Act. These women are working in controlled establishments, and they cannot leave without a leaving certificate. If you force women into employment which they cannot leave and which they are tied down to for at least six weeks, you must take power to secure that they are paid a reasonable wage. In large factories all over the country women are earning good wages, but there is a considerable number of cases where they are being very improperly paid."

On the subject of the examination of books, Dr. Addison mentioned a case in which they were convinced they were being overcharged. As a result of examination of the books the price of the commodity was reduced from £30 to £20 a ton, and this would result in a saving of a half-million pounds in a very short time.

RED TAPE THAT WANTS CUTTING

Labour members generally accepted the Bill as one likely to remove many grievances and causes of friction.

Sir Alfred Mond complained of the slow release of skilled workers from the Army. It seemed to depend much more on the view of the colonel of a particular regiment than on the decision of Whitehall. What was the good of insisting that a soldier returned for work in a chemical factory must wear his uniform? It was spoiled in the first forty-eight hours! (Laughter.) Some of the red tape under which that was possible needed cutting. (Cheers.) He mentioned that 4,000 new processes had been devised in this country since the war, and paid a warm tribute to the unremitting toil and skill of those who had devoted themselves to this work. He pleaded for organisation of the fuel supply, declaring that the scarcity was causing serious apprehension to many manufacturers of munitions

Mr. Anderson complained of the decisions of some munitions tribunals. Workmen who had done seventy hours a week ought not to be penalised for not working on a Sunday. He knew of a man who had worked eighty hours in a week being punished for losing a quarter. There had been far too much scolding and far too much meddling with the working men

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S £15,000 000.

Mr. Lloyd George replied to a number of points in the debate. In the only cases of imprisonment inflicted by munitions tribunals the workmen had refused to allow their fines to be paid. They copied Suffragette methods. (Laughter and Voices: "Passive resistance.") "Well, it was in the apostolic succession to passive resistance." (Laughter.) Labour exchanges had already supplied 500,000 men for munition work, he said in answer to Sir A. Mond, and his suggestion for the formation of a company of emergency workers ready to go anywhere had been anticipated. The Department had powers not merely to control works but also to take over works entirely, and by their use of these powers he claimed that at least 10 millions sterling, or perhaps 15 millions, had been saved to the State.

Mr. Tyson Wilson, a Labour member, intervened with a reference to employers being able to go on holiday.

Mr. Lloyd George: I should be sorry to see employers take a long holiday. It would be impossible to carry on the work without them in many cases. If my hon. friend does not know what a difference it makes whether you have a particular employer at the head of a business or not I should like him to come to the Munitions Department for a week or two. Then he would see. (Cheers.)

HOW PROFITS TAX WORKS.

Then Mr. Lloyd George turned to deal with critics who had said that the Government's restriction of profits was a "pure sham." To show what was possible with a controlled firm under the Munitions Act, he cited the example of a firm which before the war was making £12,000 a year profit and in the first year of the war made £120,000. "You would add one-fifth to the standard profit," said Mr. Lloyd George, "and that firm would be allowed £14,400. The rest of it would go to the Exchequer. But that firm would be entitled to say, 'We have increased our output enormously by our exertions.' In that case the Minister of Munitions has full power to make an allowance to that firm in respect of increased output. It is a discretionary allowance.

"They cannot have both. They cannot have the increased one-fifth profit and the allowance for increased output. If you were to give them an allowance of £5,000, then the total they would get would be £17,000, and all the rest would go to the

Sir Arthur Markham commended to the attention of the Minister of Munitions the fact that 8s. to 9s. a to nroyalty was being paid on the ore from which our steel was being mad. One royalty owner was receiving no less than £150,000 a year.

While Sir Arthur was speaking, Mr Harold Smith moved "that the question be now put." "We are not here to talk. It is a disgrace," he remarked.

The proposal was ignored by the Deputy-Speaker.

Sir Arthur Markham: When the hon. member has been a little longer a member of the House perhaps he will not start to lecture people who were here many years before—probably before he was born. (Laughter.)

Mr. Smith: You are old enough to know better.

The second reading of the Bill was agreed to.

The Leicester Daily Post.

December 16th. 1915.

Watching the Interests of Women.

Miss McArthur, we are glad to note, has carried her point for sex representation on the tribunals when cases affecting women workers come up for decision. At such times one of the assessors will be a woman. Power is also taken for the Ministry of Munitions to regulate wage rates and conditions of employment of women. Miss McArthur undoubtedly made out a good case for such a course on her recent visit to Leicester. One statement of Dr. Addison, in moving the second reading of the new Bill, will cause misgiving as well as satisfaction. "About seven weeks ago," he said, "the department were satisfied they were paying too much for certain munitions. £30 a ton was the price charged, and, as the result merely of threats to examine the prices contracts were offered at £20 per ton, resulting in a saving of half a million in a short time." The satisfaction will be at the perspicacity of the Department's expert who detected the excess in this particular case; the misgiving at the obvious illustration it affords of the Munitions Act being defective, so long as it does not make disclosure of profits a condition of all contracts for war supplies placed in non-controlled establishments. In controlled establishments the temptation to exploit the nation's needs is scotched; in non-controlled firms only the Excess Profits tax applies, and every extra pound they can squeeze out of the Government on munitions' contracts yields 10s. (less income tax) extra profit for the contractors.

676/19

676.

Daily Telegraph – 16. 12. 15.

WAR MUNITIONS.

THE AMENDING BILL.

WORKMEN'S CERTIFICATES.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

Dr. ADDISON (Secretary to the Ministry of Munitions), in moving the second reading of the Munitions of War (Amendment) Bill, said the task which had occupied the time and energy of Mr. Lloyd George during the last few months had been of so complex and colossal a character that only those who had been working in close association with him could have any adequate realisation of it. In respect of some of the criticism which had been levelled against the Munitions Act and its administration, the critics had too often lost sight of what had been accomplished and of the enormous difficulties which had had to be surmounted and had attached an altogether undue importance to the relatively few cases in which there had been substantial grounds for complaint. He was convinced that without the Munitions Board it would have been impossible for his right hon. friend to obtain the enormously increased output of munitions which had been obtained, and which would be obtained in far greater volume in the near future.

The representatives of both employers and employed had rendered his right hon. friend the greatest assistance, and had approached the consideration of the amendment of the Act in a patriotic spirit.

There had been no attempt to set aside the main principles of the original Act. These principles were three in number:

First, that there should be a limitation of the profits which were made out of the manufacture of munitions of war;

Secondly, that there should be a relaxation of any trade practices which were found to stand in the way of an increased output of munitions.

Thirdly, that there should be a limitation both on employers and employed as to what they could do in their factories, and how they could dispose of their labour.

Most of the complaints had centred round the limitations on the movement of labour, and in the bill they had endeavoured to meet the sound causes of complaint. Under the Act as it stood, if a man were dismissed from his employment without a certificate he might find himself in the position of neither being able to find other employment nor being able to obtain a certificate. This was an inequitable position, and it was remedied under Clause 4 of the bill, which provided that where a workman was dismissed he should be given a certificate except in exceptional cases where it could be shown that men had deliberately misbehaved in order to be dismissed.

GRANT OF CERTIFICATES.

In some places it was found that men had been suspended from their work without pay for a number of days. It was, therefore, provided that where suspension took place for a period of more than three days a man should be entitled to a certificate. In order to ensure that a man should have a reasonable opportunity of obtaining other employment it was provided in the bill that if a man was dismissed without a week's notice, or wages in lieu of that notice, the case should be reported to the munitions tribunal, who could award the man a certificate, and reasonable compensation.

Another important modification had been intro-was the chairman giving his casting vote only if the representatives of employers and workmen disagreed. It was a hardship on munition workers that they could not leave for better employment in less than six weeks, though they could be dismissed on a week's notice, or suspended for three days. Excessive hours had been injurious to the output of the works and the health of the workers. The Labour members had not been captious critics of the Ministry of Munitions. They had done their best to "help through." (Hear, hear.)

Sir A. MOND (R., Swansea Town) congratulated Mr. Lloyd George on the way in which the bill had been received, but he regretted that it did not go further. It would have been better to make every factory producing munitions a controlled establishment. Something more vigorous might be done to obtain the return of skilled labour from the Army. In France it seemed to be infinitely easier than was the case here to get men returned from the front. On the whole, the Minister of Munitions must be satisfied with the way in which controlled establishments had been worked. In many districts the question of fuel supply was causing serious apprehension to manufacturers. The Minister of Munitions ought to be in a position to regulate the disposition of industrial fuel in this country, so that those working for him might make certain that they would get the amount required.

PENAL PROVISIONS.

Mr. PRINGLE (R., Lanarkshire, N.W.) said the majority of the relaxations proposed were thoroughly approved by critics of the original Act. He still regarded the whole system of a penal code as a mistake. He did not believe it had added to the production of a single shell—(hear, hear)—and he did not believe the compulsory powers had done anything to increase production in the slightest degree. On the other hand, he believed that in many parts of the country the irritation caused by the penal and compulsory provisions had retarded production and had dried up and sterilised the voluntary effort which would otherwise have been available. He urged the Minister of Munitions even now to consider the advisability of parting with the compulsory provisions.

Mr. CHAPLIN (U., Wimbledon) said they had been told that the work of the Munitions Department was colossal, and he had no doubt it was. He rejoiced that a Minister of Mr. Lloyd George's energy and industry was at the head of that department. Everybody was anxious to know as much as possible of the progress of the great work entrusted to the right hon. gentleman and as to its cost. If the right hon. gentleman found it possible to answer the question he would like to know what progress had been made in the quantity of munitions produced since the department was established.

The SPEAKER said these matters were hardly relevant to the bill.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE: I propose on Monday to make a statement on these very points.

REAL RECIPROCITY.

Mr. WILKIE (Lab., Dundee) said if the Government had endeavoured to work out the question of munitions by means of partnership between Labour and capital instead of by compulsion, labour leaders would have been more completely with them. The same blemishes appeared in the amending bill as in the Act. What the Labour party asked was that there should be real reciprocity and equity between employers and employed.

Mr. G. TERRELL (U., Chippenham) expressed the opinion that the House was not acting with the greatest wisdom in relaxing penal clauses of the Act. The obligation to give notice should be made mutual and extended to the workmen. With regard to the issue of medals to war workers after the war, he thought it would act as a great encouragement to the men if the right hon. gentleman would settle rules based on the average hours which the men worked and on the continuity of their work.

Mr. ANDERSON (Lab., Attercliffe) said there was need for this amending bill. In some places there had been a great deal of dissatisfaction about the working of the Munitions Act. He thought the clauses with regard to women workers would give general satisfaction, but he desired to see something substantial done in connection with overtime, fatigue, and Sunday labour. (Hear, hear.) It was surely wrong to penalise men who in many cases had worked themselves to a physical standstill. (Hear, hear.) In addition to that, he desired to see something in the nature of arbitration courts representative equally of employers and workmen.

In regard to the original Act, the power of imprisonment ought to be taken away altogether. On the Clyde that provision had done more harm than any good it had achieved. It was a mistake to introduce all sorts of new regulations without consulting the workers. There had been far too much scolding, far too much moral lecturing, and far too little real understanding of the working classes.

profits during the two years preceding the war were £12,000, and whose profits during the first year under the Munitions Act went up to £120,000. What would happen in that case? You would add one-fifth to the standard profits, and the firm would be allowed £14,400. The rest would go to the Exchequer. But that firm would be entitled to say, "We have increased the output enormously by our exertions." In that case the Ministry of Munitions has full power to make an allowance to the firm in respect of the increased output. But the firm cannot have both the one-fifth increase of profit and the allowance for output. If you gave them an allowance of £5,000 the total they received would be £17,000. The rest, £103,000, would go to the Exchequer.

Under the excess profits duty £53,900 would go to the Exchequer, so that where the profits are very considerable the Munitions Act makes a larger levy than the excess profits duty. Take another case, a case where the profit has risen from £1,500 a year to £3,000. One-fifth added to the £1,500 would make £1,800, and the £1,200 would go to the State. Take the 50 per cent. excess profits tax, and £750 would go to the State.

The Munitions Act means a very considerable tax on employers, and it prevents the possibility of the suspension of regulations being exploited by employers for their own benefit.

But if there are compulsory powers applicable to employers which are being exercised from day to day, you cannot complain if there are also compulsory powers applicable to the workmen. I have seen hundreds of trade union representatives from these works, and when the proposition was put to them whether they wanted one-sided compulsion they practically all repudiated the idea.

SUCCESS OF THE ACT.

It is perfectly true we are modifying some of the powers. We have profited by experience.

But it is a mistake to say that the Munitions Act has not succeeded. (Cheers.)

Quite the reverse. Since the passing of the Munitions Act there has been no strike affecting more than a single establishment at a time. There have been only three strikes of any importance, lasting more than five days, and in each case the strikes ceased on the day after proceedings were taken under the Munitions Act and fines imposed. One in an Admiralty yard threatened to be a very serious one. Prosecutions were instituted, fines were imposed, and the men went back to work.

It is asked, "Has an additional shell been turned out in consequence of the Munitions Act?" It is not alone a question of shells. I could give cases where, in consequence of the Munitions Act, there has been undoubtedly an increase in the output of Admiralty work.

I still say that the State ought to have the right in any great emergency, where the life of the nation is at stake, to command the services and the resources of every citizen. (Cheers.) But the Munitions Act is an alternative to that.

Why is there no Munitions Act required in France? Because they have taken the wider view that they have the right to commandeer every resource for the interest of the State. The Munitions Act is purely an expedient because you have not adopted the wider principle. It is an interference with liberty! So is every law. (Cheers.) The only point is: Is it essential in the interests of the State at this moment? I have not the faintest doubt that it is absolutely essential, and that it is impossible to carry on the work of the State without powers of this kind.

APPEAL TO PATRIOTISM.

I agree with my hon. friends who say that when you talk about the majority of the workmen of this country it is far better to appeal to their goodwill and patriotism. Nobody has done more than I have in that way. I have appealed to workmen with every power I have got. Most of what I have done has been appeal. I am still continuing to appeal. Next week I am going to see the workmen on the Tyne and the Clyde, with many of whom I have had some disagreement. When I meet them I am depending far more upon persuasion than coercion. But as my hon. friends know very well it is not a question of dealing with a majority of the workmen, but with a minority. These workmen unless they are dealt with by other means dislocate the whole of the machinery and interfere with workmen who are anxious to do their work.

Let us consider the question of those men who are wearing out their strength by overwork. You have got myriads of them in this country. A committee has condemned Sunday labour. We have already sent a circular round to the controlled establishments and called upon the employers to get rid of Sunday labour to the utmost possible extent.

OVER ONE MILLION WORKMEN.

The minority who are not doing their work are the people responsible for the overwork of the majority; they are adding to their burdens. What suspension took place for a period of more than three days a man should be entitled to a certificate. In order to ensure that a man should have a reasonable opportunity of obtaining other employment it was provided in the bill that if a man was dismissed without a week's notice, or wages in lieu of that notice, the case should be reported to the munitions tribunal, who could award the man a certificate, and reasonable compensation.

Another important modification had been introduced.

Where a man could show that the work he was seeking would make better use of his skill than the work in which he was at present engaged he would be entitled to his certificate. (Hear, hear.)

Certificates were to be of a strictly uniform character, and nothing was to be entered on them which was in the nature of a character note. (Hear, hear.) A good many cases had been brought before the Ministry of Munitions pointing to inequality in some of the decisions of munitions tribunals, but the Minister of Munitions did not think they would be likely to get equality of decision or uniformity of action by adopting the suggestion that the number of assessors should be four instead of two.

It was provided in the bill, however, that the chairman of the tribunal must consult the assessors, and in cases where women workers were concerned it was laid down that there should be a woman assessor. (Hear, hear.)

Moreover, a tribunal was set up to which appeals might be made on points of law.

EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

Another important section dealt with the employment of women. Those who had had an opportunity of examining the records had been deeply interested in the amount of the work, as well as in its character, which had been turned out by women in munition factories. (Hear, hear.) Women were doing now in munition works a great many skilled operations—turning out shells, fuses, parts of shells, and other things, some of which at least were not previously made by women at all. There was nothing in the principal Act which secured that the women the Government were forcing into munitions work—because the Government were forcing open wider and wider the door through which they might enter—should receive an adequate time rate. Eighty per cent. of the work women were doing on munitions was work that was not previously done by them at all, and therefore it was not included in the principal Act.

There was a considerable number of cases in which women were being very improperly paid—(hear, hear)—and these would be dealt with under the powers acquired in this bill.

A further section of the bill extended the operation of the principal Act. In the first place, it would be decided that a Government establishment employed in the production of munitions should be a controlled establishment, and should have applied to it the rules and regulations which applied to controlled establishments. The building of such merchant ships as the Admiralty might specify would be treated as war work, and the definition of munitions would be extended to take in certain materials such as those necessary for the manufacture of explosives. It was also extended to works of construction.

Thus the building of munition factories and so on would be regarded as war work.

Further, the principal Act was extended to power stations and lighting stations and to the supply of water and other things which were an essential part of the machinery of large factories. The Minister of Munitions would have power to call for the accounts and books necessary to establish the cost of production in a factory of munitions of war. He was afraid that the provisions he had indicated, together with the extension of the definition of munition work, constituted great inroads which the State was making for its own protection on private rights, and on individual and industrial liberty.

SPLENDID LOYALTY.

In this bill they were engaged in an endeavour to adjust differences fairly, to make rough places plain, and to hold the balance as evenly as possible between this class and that. But considerations which arose in connection with those matters would not make them forget that there were thousands of employers and hundreds of thousands of workmen who all the time, without making any complaint, without perhaps any acute sense of any ground of complaint, with industrious, patient, and splendid loyalty, had gone on with their work making munitions for the Armies by day and by night. If they felt the limitations imposed upon them, they accepted them loyally because they knew that any restraints and sacrifices, either personal or financial, we might impose upon ourselves were as nothing when compared with the voluntary surrender of individual liberty, security, and comfort made by those brave men who, enduring all manner of privations, were fighting our battles on land and sea. (Cheers.)

LABOUR MEMBERS' HELP.

Mr. HODGE (Lab., Gorton) said there were some good features in this bill which were long overdue. It was unfair, however, that a workman upon whose services the Munitions Department had a lien for six weeks should be liable to dismissal with only one week's notice. Many of the Tribunals had worked badly in the past because the chairman absolutely ignored the assessors. What they desired to see [illegible] sentative equally of employers and workmen.

In regard to the original Act, the power of imprisonment ought to be taken away altogether. On the Clyde that provision had done more harm than any good it had achieved. It was a mistake to introduce all sorts of new regulations without consulting the workers. There had been far too much scolding, far too much moral lecturing, and far too little real understanding of the working classes.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S REPLY.

PERSUASION AND COERCION.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I certainly have no reason to complain of the tone of the debate or of the criticisms which have been directed either against the original Act or against the amending bill before the House. In fact, most of the criticisms have been in effect, if not in form, speeches in support of the bill. Perhaps I had better take the general criticism first, before I come to the details.

Take the question of imprisonment. There has only been one case of imprisonment, and that took place in Glasgow. Why did it take place? It was not because the workmen could not pay. On the contrary, the fines were tendered and paid for the other workmen. These workmen refused to allow their fines to be paid for them, and deliberately chose imprisonment. It was really a sort of episode you have been accustomed to in another agitation during the past nine or ten years. They copied Suffragette methods.

An HON. MEMBER: Passive resistance. (Laughter.)

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE: As my hon. friend points out, they were in the apostolic succession to the passive resisters. As to the criticisms of Sir A. Mond, there is a good deal in what he said with which I am in complete sympathy, but when he complains that the Labour Exchanges have not helped to the extent that they might in furnishing workmen for munition works, I am bound to point out that during the present war the Labour Exchanges have supplied through their agencies 500,000 workmen to munition works, and that they are doing at the present moment the very thing the right hon. gentleman suggested they should do.

At the present moment, whenever anyone goes to them and suggests he is a fit and proper person, and that he has the necessary qualifications for munition work, they do their best to find employment for him. A misconception has arisen in this country. The right hon. baronet knows perfectly well that there are certain classes for which you must get specialists. Take the case of machine-guns. We have had machinery standing idle, though we have had thousands of skilled workmen whose services we could tender to the firm in question, because they wanted a certain number of special men to set up the machinery. It is no use sending ordinary engineers for that purpose. They must be men with long training and special aptitude for that particular class of work. These are the scarcest men in the world to get hold of. We find very often we cannot avail ourselves of the services of other skilled men because the machinery has not been set up by that class of men.

We are organising a company of emergency men who can go from one works to another to set up machinery lying idle for the lack of such men.

LIMITED COMPULSION.

Why do we stand by compulsion to the very limited degree that we do? I will tell the House quite frankly. You cannot have one-sided compulsion; and I ask my hon. friend whether he would be prepared to compel the employer to the extent we do, not merely in the Munitions Act, but in the Defence of the Realm Act, and have no compulsion of any sort or kind for the unwilling or recalcitrant workman? That was not the view taken by the trade union leaders.

Mr. W. THORNE (Lab., West Ham, S.): The employers are not imprisoned.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE: That is because they pay their fines.

There is exactly the same law for the employer as for the workman. (Hear, hear.)

The only difference is that the fines for the employer are heavier. We have taken powers, not merely to control works required for munition purposes, but also full power to take over works. What more did we do? We took full powers to take over the whole of the machinery. Those powers have been exercised, and we have removed machinery from works to other parts of the country where it was more required. We took full powers to take over all material, and we have used those powers to the full.

By means of those powers we have kept down the price of material.

The Metals Department of the Munitions Board has saved at least £10,000,000 or £15,000,000, and perhaps £20,000,000, by the power they have exercised in taking over the whole metal trade of the country.

RESTRICTION OF PROFITS.

I am told that the power to restrict profits in controlled establishments is a pure sham, that it is not a reality; and it has been said that the excess profits tax is more severe. Let me tell the House what it really means. The facts are that where the profits are large the Munitions Act drops much more heavily on the employer. Where the profits are small the excess profits tax drops more heavily on the employer. Take the case of a firm whose standard [illegible]

Let us consider the question of those men who are wearing out their strength by overwork. You have got myriads of them in this country. A committee has condemned Sunday labour. We have already sent a circular round to the controlled establishments and called upon the employers to get rid of Sunday labour to the utmost possible extent.

OVER ONE MILLION WORKMEN.

The minority who are not doing their work are the people responsible for the overwork of the majority; they are adding to their burdens. What you want is to equalise the burdens, to get them all to take their share.

There have been two or three thousand prosecutions in all. There are between 1,000,000 and 1,500,000 workmen. These prosecutions were essential and there is no Court against whose decisions you cannot put up some sort of argument. But these prosecutions are a very small item in the coercion of industry. There are hundreds of the cases against employers. If there are more against workmen than employers it is because there are a thousand times more workmen than employers.

I ask my hon. friends to help us to make this Act thoroughly satisfactory. It is quite true, as Mr. Hodge says, that I have no captious critics amongst his friends. I heartily thank him, and I thank them. I have never appealed to them for assistance without getting it. They have taken risks. (Cheers.) I know the greatest risk a public man has got to take. It is not facing political or industrial enemies. The greatest risk a public man takes is facing his own friends. And there is no greater penalty that a man can face than to quarrel with his own friends. But he is not worthy of the nation to which he belongs, and the struggle it is taking part in, if he does not face these things like a man. And let me say this to my hon. friend—there is no man of whom it is more true than him. It is easy to misrepresent, but he need not fear. His action is straight and honourable, and in the long run the people of this country are a just people, and they will honour him all the more for the course which he has taken. He tells me his friends are not captious critics. I agree. I have never had anything but co-operation from them. His criticisms to-day have been fair and helpful, and when we go into Committee I will consider them in the spirit in which he has advanced them. He, his friends, and I have but one end—we are working together to seek victory for our country when it is standing as champion for the cause of humanity. (Cheers.)

Mr. DUNCAN (Lab., Barrow-in-Furness) said that the union with which he was connected had tens of thousands of men working under the Act, and whereas dispute and victimisation pay used to cost thousands of pounds a week, it had, since the Act came into operation, dropped to £5 a week, and even less than that. The essence of the smooth working of the Act was largely the speedy settlement of all disputes. The amending bill would, he believed, be an improvement of the Act.

Sir F. BANBURY (U., City of London) said that wise expenditure by this country would be a large factor in terminating the war, and he urged that the department should not spend money wildly or extravagantly.

Sir A. MARKHAM (R., Mansfield) argued that the iron-ore mines of Cumberland should have been declared controlled establishments. At the present time the State was paying a royalty of not less than from 8s to 9s for every ton of stone which was raised for the purpose of making steel. One royalty owner alone was receiving £150,000 a year in royalties on this stone.

GETTING TO BUSINESS.

While the hon. member was speaking,

Mr. H. SMITH (U., Warrington) moved "that the question be now put," but the Deputy Speaker declined to accept the motion.

Sir A. MARKHAM: The hon. member is always a very energetic supporter of the Government, right or wrong. In this case he does not get the support of the Deputy Speaker.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Whitley): Order, order!

Mr. H. SMITH: We want to get to business in wartime; it is a disgrace.

Sir A. MARKHAM: The hon. member talks about disgrace. He has only been a short time a member of this House. When he is a member for a little longer perhaps he will not speak in such a fashion to people who have been here for many years, some of us before he was born, about the procedure of the House of Commons.

Mr. H. SMITH: You ought to know better in that case.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order!

The bill was read a second time.

The House rose at five minutes past eleven.

676/20

676

The Standard – December 18th 1915.

IN PARLIAMENT.

POWERS OF MUNITIONS MINISTRY.

PROTECTION OF WORKERS.

PROVISION FOR SOUND INSPECTION.

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

WESTMINSTER, Friday Night.

A Friday sitting is such a rare event since the guns broke loose that one must suppose that members enjoyed it. At any rate, they mustered in considerable force to-day to talk about the Bill to amend the Munitions Act, and they were so keen at their work that the Government representatives had one of the busiest times of their lives.

Chiefly, the Bill seeks to correct certain defects that have been revealed in the original Act by experience of its working, and, for the most part, the corrections are designed to remove the grievances of the workpeople engaged in making munitions. The measure does other things—for instance, it adds to the almost illimitable powers possessed by the Minister of Munitions the right to schedule water and gas supplies, and the right, also, to cause to be erected houses for the accommodation of munition workers. Naturally the trade union stalwarts turned up in great force.

The Minister of Munitions "led" for the Bill in person. He had the assistance of Dr. Addison, Dr. Macnamara, the Secretary of the Admiralty, and Sir F. E. Smith, the Attorney-General, and he had to deal with eleven pages of amendments. Fortunately, most of them were merely verbal and were easily disposed of. But some of them raised points of first-class importance. For instance, the Bill enacts that when a man has been suspended for three days for causes other than misconduct, he can compel his employer to give him a certificate of discharge. The Labour men declared three days to be too long a period. They wanted one day, and as the discussion progressed, the still wider question of whether a workman should be paid during his period of suspension was raised. Mr. Dillon came to the aid of the Labourites, who were very ably led by Mr. John Hodge, and in the end Mr. Lloyd George had to bow to the storm. He held out two days instead of three as an olive branch, and eagerly promised to consider the question of pay, with due regard to the customs of the trade. Somewhat reluctantly the critics accepted this, and the peril passed.

A SPICE OF HUMOUR.

It was a dull debate, and it bristled with technicalities. One felt grateful for the whimsical Mr. Joseph King, who had put down a whole sheaf of amendments, the great majority of which were of no importance whatever. Mr. King moved each amendment with imperturbable gravity, and in each case he declared it to be of great importance. Then, with equal gravity, he withdrew, while members laughed merrily. His finest effort to add the much-needed spice of humour came when the Attorney-General invited him to explain one of his amendments. Mr. King smiled with childlike blandness. "I am sorry," he said. "I have made notes and I cannot explain. I will withdraw." Members laughed heartily at this. Obviously they were grateful to the member for North Somerset.

The dour Labour men stuck grimly to their task, however. They secured promises of careful consideration for suggested improvements in the condition of women munition workers, and they elicited from Dr. Addison a very full assurance that the Department will keep a watchful eye on the provisions made for the comfort and health of the workers in all new factories. Also, they pinned the Government down to a pledge that inspectors of munition factories shall be properly qualified. "Some of them are pawnbrokers!" declared Mr. Tyson Wilson.

They had, as a matter of fact, good reason to be satisfied with their day's work. The other side—that of the employers, which was represented by Mr. Barclay Dounlas and Mr. Holt—did not fare so well. In these days the "master" is not quite so good as the man—especially when it comes to munitions! But the member for Hexham did succeed in depr[illegible] man who is discharged, except for misconduct, or who left his employment on the ground that he had been suspended without wages for more than three days, should be entitled to compensation if refused a leaving certificate.

Mr. EDMUND HARVEY moved an amendment to remove the limit upon the period of suspension.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that he could not agree to the removal of the limitation, because in many cases men were suspended for short periods while waiting for material or repairs to be effected to machinery.

Mr. HODGE and Mr. DILLON (N., Mayo, E.) contended that workmen who were required to stand by should be paid for their time.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that opened up a very large question, but it did not arise on this subsection. That issue would have to be decided by arbitration, and if it decided that all workmen should be paid when standing by it would create a revolution in the customs of certain trades.

After further discussion the amendment was withdrawn, and Mr. Lloyd George consented to a reduction of the period of suspension to two days, promising to reconsider the question on the report stage, with a view to safeguarding customs of the trade.

On the question that the clause stand part of the Bill,

Mr. PRINGLE (L., Lanarkshire, N.W.) moved that it be omitted from the Bill, submitting that the restrictions that it imposed on workmen were causing a great deal of friction and discontent.

Dr. ADDISON, in opposing, said that there would be no value in the Bill if the clause were taken out.

The clause was then added to the Bill.

WOMEN WORKERS.

On Clause 5 which empowers the Minister of Munitions to fix the rate of wages to be paid to women employed in munition work, and arrange the conditions of their employment,

Mr. ANDERSON (Lab., Sheffield, Attercliffe) moved an amendment that the same protection should be given to semi-skilled or unskilled workers.

Dr. ADDISON (Secretary, Munitions) could not accept the amendment. The principal Act provided competent machinery to deal with these cases.

Mr. Hodge and Mr. C. Duncan (Lab., Barrow-in-Furness) supported the amendment, which was negatived.

Mr. E. HARVEY moved an amendment, with the object of making the clause apply to all women engaged in munitions work.

Dr. ADDISON could not accept the amendment. It would apply to establishments where only a small quantity of munition work was being turned out. That was impossible.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. ANDERSON moved an amendment to Clause 5, to provide that the Minister of Munitions should be empowered to regulate not only wages but the hours of labour of women and girls employed in munition factories, and the sanitary accommodation, heating, lighting, and ventilation of work places.

Dr. ADDISON pointed out that the clause gave the Minister of Munitions power to regulate the conditions of employment, which would cover all the matters mentioned by Mr. Anderson. The department were taking care in all new factories to make provision for the health of workers, and they were doing the same in the controlled establishments. They had arranged with the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give full consideration to expenditure on canteens in computing profits for excess profits duty, and this had had the effect of speeding up the provision of canteens. In establishments where large numbers of women and girls were employed they were arranging for the engagement of matrons or women supervisors.

The amendment was withdrawn, but it was agreed that the Minister of Munitions should have power to regulate hours of labour of women.

PENALTIES FOR FALSE STATEMENTS.

Clause 8, which sets out punishments for false statements for the purpose, among other things, of evading the provisions of the Act, and Clause 9, which imposes an obligation on owners of establishments to supply information as to cost of production, etc., were carried.

Mr. HOLT (L., Hexham) objected to the last-named clause, which he said was one of the most outrageous proposals that he had ever listened to.

Mr. PRINGLE said that he thought that the most complete security should be forthcoming that the information obtained would be treated as strictly confidential.

Dr. ADDISON replied that the clause was necessary. In some cases it had been found that too much was being paid for munitions. If it were necessary to put in words in the clause which would make the intention of the Government clearer, it would be done on report. The gentlemen who would conduct inquiries would be specially appointed, and the information that they obtained would be treated as confidential.

On Clause 10, which specifies the powers of the inspectors to obtain information in connection with the supply of munitions such as the inspection of books, wages sheets, etc.,

Mr. TYSON WILSON (Lab., Westhoughton) moved an amendment to provide that the inspectors should be properly and technically qualified to discharge their duties. Pawnbrokers, barbers, butchers, and bakers were now employed as inspectors. Such appointments were, of course, ridiculous.

Dr. ADDISON replied that if the amendment were accepted it would place upon the depart[illegible] this new court being now formed, when there were courts already in existence at considerable cost to the country.

The amendment was carried.

Clause 12, which empowers the Minister of Munitions to arrange with any other department for the performance of any of his powers which he thinks can be more conveniently performed by that department, was carried without debate.

On Clause 14, which protects a member or officer of a munitions tribunal, or any other person acting under the authority of the tribunal, from civil or criminal proceedings if he acts in good faith and with reasonable care,

Mr. KING, who had a number of amendments on the paper designed to mitigate the severity of the clause, promised not to move them if, as he hoped, the clause would be dropped.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE offered to drop the clause, and it was accordingly taken out of the Bill.

TRIBUNAL FOR WOMEN.

After Clause 15, which allows costs to defendants in vexatious proceedings, had been agreed to,

The Committee proceeded to deal with new clauses.

The first, proposed by Mr. Lloyd George, was to establish a special arbitration tribunal for women, which should comprise one or more women, to deal with differences as they arose, and give advice to the Minister of Munitions as to the nature of directions that he should issue.

Mr. LEIF JONES (L., Rusholiffe) said that he thought that this clause left too much power in the hands of the Minister of Munitions, and that they should have an assurance that he would not go behind the backs of the tribunal and decide cases without their assistance.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that there were certain questions which would have to be decided by the Government, such as the question of a minimum wage for women, and there ought not to be a compulsory resort to the tribunal in such cases.

Mr. ANDERSON said that he thought that the Committee had a right to understand this proposal, which only appeared on the paper that morning, and had since been altered by the Minister.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that if his hon. friends did not want the proposal he would withdraw it.

Mr. ANDERSON protested that the Minister was adopting an attitude which was not fair (hear, hear).

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that his hon. friends should make up their minds whether they wanted the tribunal or not.

Mr. ANDERSON said that they all desired machinery to be set up, but they did not want it rushed through before they understood it (hear, hear). There was no guarantee that a representative of the working women would be upon the tribunal.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that if the Committee accepted his proposal as drafted he would confer with his hon. friends on the matter before the report stage.

The clause was then read a second time and added to the Bill.

NON-PAYMENT OF FINES.

Mr. GOLDSTONE moved a new clause with the object of preventing a munitions tribunal from imposing imprisonment as punishment in the case of non-payment of fines. He said that this was in accordance with the recommendation of Lord Balfour's Commission, with reference to a case on the Clyde, where three workmen had gone to prison.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE pointed out that the three men referred to went to prison deliberately, although the fines were tendered. It would show weakness to abolish this power of ordering imprisonment.

Mr. PRINGLE said that they did not want men to go to prison. They became martyrs in such cases, and aroused sympathy. In the Clyde case the men on coming out of prison were presented with £8 apiece and diamond bracelets for their wives (laughter).

The clause was negatived.

ARBITRATION IN DISPUTES.

Mr. ANDERSON moved a new clause to provide that workpeople—who were not free to go on strike—should have power to claim arbitration when a dispute arose.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that there were cases in which differences were manufactured by a small section of workmen who were anxious to give trouble. He thought that the Board of Trade should have power to restrict arbitration proceedings to cases which were bona fide. If his hon. friend was prepared to agree to that restriction he would submit words on the report stage which would secure his object.

Mr. Anderson withdrew his amendment.

The committee stage was concluded, amid cheers, and the House adjourned at half-past seven o'clock.

tion factories shall be properly qualified. "Some of them are pawnbrokers!" declared Mr. Tyson Wilson.

They had, as a matter of fact, good reason to be satisfied with their day's work. The other side—that of the employers, which was represented by Mr. Barclay Denniss and Mr. Holt—did not fare so well. In these days the "master" is not quite so good as the man—especially when it comes to munitions! But the member for Hexham did succeed in drawing from Dr. Addison an assurance that all inquiries into returns as to cost of production and so forth supplied by employers would be undertaken by "gentlemen specially appointed" (whatever that may mean), and that the information obtained would be regarded as strictly confidential.

Labour was insatiable, however, and Mr. Lloyd George was compelled to set his face resolutely against an amendment the object of which was to make the workmen assessors attached to a Munitions Tribunal members of that body. It seemed rather a trifling point. But the Labour men were truculent, and it was not until they had a division and were beaten by 43 votes against ten that progress became more rapid. Altogether it had been a busy day. It made it clear, at all events, that our legislators like to legislate.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

The Speaker took the chair at Noon.

The House went into Committee on the Munitions of War (Amendment) Bill.

On Clause 1, which gives the Minister of Munitions power to declare Government factories in which munition work is carried on to be controlled establishments,

Mr. HODGE (Lab., Gorton Division) moved an amendment that where part of an establishment was turning out munition work that establishment should be deemed for all purposes to be a controlled establishment. He wished to include railway shops where munitions were made, where female labour was being employed, and where the companies were taking advantage of the Treasury agreement between the trade unions and Minister of Munitions in what had been called the ill-usage of labour.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that he agreed with the object in view, but considered that the amendment went further than was necessary. He had full power at present to take over these establishments. It was purely a matter of administration. He would, however, consider the matter before the Report stage.

The amendment was withdrawn, and the clause was added to the Bill.

Clause 2 was also added to the Bill. It provides that an employer who discharges a workman who has become a munition worker within a period of six weeks after the workman has entered into an undertaking with the Minister of Munitions shall be guilty of an offence against the principal Act, and be liable to a fine unless he proves that he had reasonable cause for dismissing the workman. The clause also declares that no contract made by a workman with his employer shall prevent him from carrying out his undertaking to become a munition volunteer or make him liable for an action for damages.

Clause 3 was carried after a short debate. It provides against the failure of an employer to comply with the provisions of an undertaking that he has made in the case of workers who have been temporarily released from naval or military service.

CERTIFICATE OF DISCHARGE.

Clause 4 amends the principal Act in order to make the issue of a certificate of discharge compulsory upon the employer when he dismisses a workman or suspends him for more than three days, unless the tribunal is of opinion that the workman was guilty of misconduct in order to secure dismissal. It also provides that when an employer dismisses a workman without at least a week's notice the tribunal may award compensation to the workman, unless it considers that the circumstances are such as to make the omission to give such notice reasonable. It further declares that a munitions tribunal shall, in deciding whether a certificate shall be given to a workman, take into consideration the question whether the workman has left his former work for the purpose of undertaking any class of work in which his skill or other personal qualifications can be employed with greater advantage to the national interest.

Mr. EDMUND HARVEY (L., Leeds, W.) moved an amendment with the object of giving a munitions tribunal power to award compensation to a workman in respect of any time during which he was prevented from earning wages by the failure or the unreasonable refusal of the employer to grant such certificate and also to award an allowance for expenses and loss of working time, such sums to be payable by such persons as the tribunal might decide.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE replied that he considered the clause covered cases where certificates had been unreasonably withheld. He would, however, further consider the points raised before the Report stage.

The amendment was thereupon withdrawn.

On subsection 2, which provides that a workman shall be entitled to a certificate of discharge if he has been in employment for a period of not less than six months, Mr. TYSON WILSON (Lab., Westhoughton) moved an amendment to provide that the inspectors should be properly and technically qualified to discharge their duties. Pawnbrokers, barbers, butchers, and bakers were now employed as inspectors. Such appointments were, of course, ridiculous.

Dr. ADDISON replied that if the amendment were accepted it would place upon the department a greater responsibility than they could bear. Seeing that there was such a great variety of munitions work, it would be impossible to set up a technical standard to govern appointments. The department was doing its best. They would have no hesitation in getting rid of those who were not properly qualified.

Mr. HODGE said that he hoped that the Minister would clear out all the incompetent men in his department. It was only a qualified man who could properly examine a shell. If shells were to win the war, our men should be supplied with the very best they could get.

GARDENER AS INSPECTOR.

Mr. KING (L., Somerset, N.) mentioned a case where a gardener whose experience of machinery was limited to a lawn mower was appointed an inspector (laughter).

Dr. ADDISON, interposing, said that the department would have inquiries made. Out of the thousands of applications the department had received for inspectorships, it was not always easy to get hold of the right people.

Mr. DILLON asked for an assurance from the department that no man would be sent to examine shells who did not understand them.

The debate was continued by Mr. Wardle and Colonel Yate.

Mr. TYSON WILSON, in withdrawing the amendment, remarked that many of the inspectors were the laughing stock of the men in the factories. In fact, the department itself was in danger on account of some of their appointments of becoming a laughing stock, too.

Clause 11 enacts that in proceedings before a munition tribunal the chairman shall, before giving his decision, consult with the assessors, and that in cases coming before the tribunals concerning women one assessor shall be a woman chosen from the panel representing workmen. It also provides for a special court for the purpose of hearing appeals on questions of law.

Mr. O'GRADY (Lab., Leeds, E.) moved an amendment to provide that these assessors should be deemed to be members of such tribunal equally with the chairman. He submitted that it was absolutely essential that the assessors should have a voice in determining what the verdict should be if their decision was to be regarded as a fair and square decision.

Mr. HODGE strongly supported the amendment.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that he was sorry he could not accept it. He and his colleagues had given it the deepest consideration, and they had come to the conclusion that it would not only be a departure from precedent to treat the assessors as members of the court instead of advisers, but that, as trade union representatives, they ought not to be placed in an undesirable position in cases where other trade unionists were concerned. He had taken the opinion of the Cabinet on this question, and he regretted that they could not meet the views of hon. members beyond putting a direct obligation upon the president of the court to confer and consult with the assessors before giving a decision.

Mr. GOLDSTONE (Lab., Sunderland) asked if the Minister would accept another amendment in the name of Mr. Denniss, which provided that in all cases where the assessors were agreed the president of the court should be bound to give effect to their opinion in his decision. He said that unless that amendment was accepted a division would be taken upon the present one.

Mr. W. ROCH and Mr. DENNISS having spoken,

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that he agreed that if the representatives of the employers and workmen on the tribunal were agreed, it would be a strong order for the president to overrule them, and he would be prepared to compromise on Mr. Denniss's amendment (cheers).

Some of the Labour members insisted upon taking a division upon Mr. O'Grady's amendment, which was defeated by 43 to 10.

Mr. Denniss's amendment was agreed to.

POWERS OF APPEAL.

Mr. KING (L., Somerset, N.) moved to omit the provision that there should be a specially constituted court to consider appeals on questions of law from the munitions tribunals. He desired to substitute a provision that one of the assessors should be a barrister to whom questions of law should be referred.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that he could not accept the latter part of Mr. King's proposal, but he was willing to omit the subsection in order that he might on report submit a more satisfactory proposal. His object was to get a tribunal which would secure uniformity in the decisions of the munitions tribunals on questions of fact.

Mr. Lloyd George's suggestion was agreed to.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE moved an addition to the clause providing for payment to a member or officer of the appeal court of such remuneration as the Minister of Munitions, with the sanction of the Treasury, might determine.

Mr. BUTCHER (U., York) protested against

676/21

Yorkshire Observer - 18. 12. 15.

LONDON LETTER.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT BY PRIVATE WIRE.)

172, Fleet Street, Friday Night.

The Munitions Bill.

The habit of Friday sittings is apparently one of the vices or virtues which the majority of the Members of the House have found no difficulty in abandoning. Even in the old days it was only upon special occasions that Friday brought with it anything like a full House, but to-day it was only a meagre handful of Members who responded to the call. A division in the course of the sitting found little more than fifty Members present or sufficiently interested to record their votes, and the debate resolved itself into a comparatively quiet talk across empty benches. The measures before the House—the Munitions Act Amendment Bill—may not have suffered from the fact, but from the spectatorial point of view it was a dull and featureless sitting.

Uncontested Clauses.

The first clause gives the Minister of Munitions power to declare Government factories in which munition work is carried on to be controlled establishments, and Mr. Hodge was anxious to have it declared that where part of an establishment was turning out munitions the whole should be deemed, for the purposes of the Bill, a controlled establishment. He wished to include railway shops where munitions were made and female labour employed, alleging that companies were taking advantage of the agreement between the trade unions and the Minister of Munitions to the disadvantage of labour. The amendment, however, was withdrawn upon the explanation of Mr. Lloyd George that he had full power to take over these establishments already, and that it was purely a matter of administration to which he would give attention. The clause was duly added to the Bill, as was also the clause penalising the discharge of a workman by an employer within a period of six weeks after the workman has volunteered for munition work, and the clause providing against the failure of an employer to comply with an undertaking made in the case of men temporarily released from military or naval service.

The Limits of Suspension.

To the clause dealing with the issue of certificates of discharge, Mr. Edmund Harvey moved an amendment with the object of giving a munitions tribunal power to award compensation to a workman in respect of any time during which he might be prevented from earning wages by the failure or unreasonable refusal of an employer to grant a certificate. Mr. Lloyd George undertook to consider the points before the Report stage. Mr. Edmund Harvey also moved an amendment to remove from a sub-section the limit upon the period of suspension without wages for which compensation might be claimed if a leaving certificate was refused. Mr. Lloyd George opposed the amendment on the ground that in many cases men were suspended for short periods while waiting for materials or repairs to machinery. It was contended, however, by Mr. Hodge and Mr. Dillon that workmen who were required to stand by should be paid for their time. This, in Mr. Lloyd George's opinion, opened up a very large question, and did not arise upon the sub-section in debate. It was an issue which would have to be decided by arbitration, but if it were decided in favour of the payment of workmen standing by, it would create a revolution in the custom of certain trades. The amendment was ultimately withdrawn, Mr. Lloyd George consenting to a reduction of the period of suspension from three days to two, and promising further consideration by the Report stage with a view to safeguarding the customs of the trade. Mr. Pringle was for dropping the whole clause upon the ground that the restrictions it imposed on workmen were causing friction and discontent, but it was urged by Dr. Addison that the Bill without the clause would have no value.

The Women Workers.

The clause empowering the Minister of Munitions to fix the scale of wages to be paid to women in munitions work, and to arrange the conditions of their employment, was the subject of some little discussion. Mr. Anderson wanted the same protection to be given to semi-skilled or unskilled workers, and Mr. Edmund Harvey moved to extend the clause to apply to all women engaged in munitions work, but in both cases the amendments were negatived. On a further amendment Dr. Addison pointed out that the clause gave the Minister of Munitions full power to regulate the conditions of employment, and the Department were taking care to make provision for the health of workers, to regulate canteens, and provide women supervisors where large numbers of women and girls were employed. It was agreed, however, that the Minister of Munitions should have power to regulate the hours of labour of women.

The Scrutiny of Accounts.

The clause of the Bill which imposes an obligation on the owners of establishments to supply information as to the cost of production was characterised by Mr. Holt as one of the most outrageous proposals he had ever listened to, and Mr. Pringle contended that the most complete security should be forthcoming that the information so obtained would be treated as strictly confidential. Dr. Addison argued for the necessity of the clause, and referred to cases in which it was found that too much was being paid for munitions. If the clause needed modifying to make the intentions of the Government clearer it could be done on report. The information obtained would be treated as confidential. In the matter of the inspection of books, wages-sheets, and the like Mr. Tyson Wilson urged that qualified inspectors should be employed, not pawnbrokers, barbers, butchers, and bakers. Mr. Hodge, Mr. King, and others supported the amendment, but it was withdrawn in deference to Dr. Addison's protest that the Department would do its best. Opposition was pressed against the clause providing that in proceedings before a munitions tribunal the chairman should, before giving his decision, consult with the assessors. Mr. Lloyd George resisted, in the name of the Cabinet, an amendment by Mr. O'Grady providing that these assessors should be deemed to be members of such tribunals equally with the chairman, but agreed ultimately to a compromise upon an amendment by Mr. Denniss providing that in all cases where the assessors were agreed the president of the court should be bound to give effect to their opinion in his decision. Some of the Labour Members, however, forced a division on Mr. O'Grady's amendment, with the result that they were defeated by 43 votes to 10. After some further debate, in which one or two other points were left over for consideration on the Report stage, the Bill, with slight modification, was reported to the House.

676/22

Reynolds's Newspaper. 19. 12. 15.

LABOUR AND MUNITIONS.

It has been obvious to everyone interested in industrial affairs that the Munitions Act has not worked quite so smoothly as was hoped when it was initiated. Some of the men who have come under its scope have felt very strongly that, in one or two particulars, it was not only badly designed, but distinctly unfair. Now what is the purpose of the Act? In the first place it was inaugurated to give the nation control over the production of munitions of war. From the very outset of hostilities it was seen that the much vaunted enterprise of private firms was incapable of coping successfully with the national emergency. Better organization was needed; the work of the various existing factories had to be co-ordinated; the many new establishments had to be developed and fitted into their proper place in the general scheme of production. National efforts and national aims replaced the old go-as-you-please methods. Similarly with munition labour. Obviously, in such a time of crisis, workmen must be regarded, and must regard themselves, as national assets, as national servants, as men whose individual desires must, to some extent, be subordinated to national needs. On the whole both employers and employed accepted this position. But a slight minority did not. Trouble was caused for various reasons. A few men were careless and intractable; some employers still put profit-making before patriotism. So a new Department was formed with Mr. Lloyd George at its head as Minister of Munitions.

The immediate result was the Munitions Act, whereby employers' profits were to be curtailed and workers were to be prevented from making moves or taking liberties which would be prejudicial to the end the nation had in view —the production of the colossal quantities of war material necessary to win the war. The principal grievances voiced against the Act have been on the matter of discharge certificates, and on the under-payment of women labour. Under the principal Bill a munition worker cannot obtain employment with a new firm unless he is provided with a certificate from his old employer, or unless six weeks have elapsed since there was any work for him to do. An employer, on the other hand, can dismiss a man, refuse him a certificate, or even make remarks prejudicial to his character, and so prevent him from getting a job in any munition factory. Also, the employer can arbitrarily suspend a man and thus stop his pay. Under the Amending Bill it is provided that where suspension takes place over a period of more than three days a man shall be entitled to a certificate; and if a man is dismissed without a week's notice, or wages in lieu of that notice, the case shall be reported to the Munitions Tribunal, who may award the man a certificate and reasonable compensation. The objection to this is that it does not go far enough in the direction of reform. The employer is practically left with a lien upon a man's services for six weeks, although at liberty to turn him off with a week's notice. We are sorry that more drastic changes were not made in the Bill on the Committee stage. In the matter of women's labour, it was frankly admitted in the House that a good many women were being "very improperly paid," and these are to be dealt with under the powers acquired in the new Bill.

To turn to the employers' side of the case, the real grievances still seem to be AGAINST some employers. There has always been a good deal of scepticism as to how much of the vast war profits now being made would ultimately find their way back to the nation, and that scepticism still exists. Then for the Munitions Department a case was cited to show how prices were put up against the Government. Three weeks ago £30 a ton was being paid for a certain munition. This was obviously too much, and, as a result merely of a threat to examine the firm's books, the contracts were offered at £20 per ton! Having stated these objections to the measure, let us now admit cheerfully that the Act has been, on the whole, of great benefit to the country. Under the circumstances it would have been foolish to expect perfect machinery to be developed offhand. And we must also point out that most of the grievances would have had very little solid foundation if the Act had been sympathetically administered. The best piece of legislation ever devised by the mind of man may be made a ghastly ruin by incompetent, tyrannical, or faulty administration. Now that changes are to be made let us hope that the administrators responsible will lay to heart the advice of the chief Minister concerned and in their dealings with the workers rely more upon persuasion than upon the powers Government has conferred upon them. We are out to win the war. To win we must have stupendous supplies. Those supplies are now forthcoming, and only in so far as those supplies can be kept up or increased by it is the Munitions Act justified. The majority of our munition workers are toiling like slaves. They are cheerfully foregoing every pleasure, every bit of relaxation, everything for which they have for so long struggled. We are even finding it necessary to ask for legislation to prevent some of them from working themselves literally to death. There are cases where men are working eighty hours a week, week after week, at heavy tasks, ruining themselves for life in the interests of the State. The workers on the whole are splendid. We wish we could say as much for the men in authority. Let us, then, remember these when considering labour and war, and not lay too much stress upon the shortcomings of a few.

The Federationist
Dec 1915

676/23 676

The Munitions Act and its Results.

JOHN HILL (in the Boilermakers' Report).

Writing last month I entered a mild protest against the tendency shown by some employers to harshly interpret and hurriedly apply their powers under the Munitions Act.

Since then I have given assistance in many questions with results to employers and men concerned which no public accusations and stupidly heavy penalties could secure.

From recent decisions of Munitions Tribunals it would appear that employers may punish their employes, whether guilty or not, as in cases where their charge breaks down the men concerned get no compensation for their expenses and loss of time attending court. In other cases men are compelled to walk idle for days till it suits a firm's convenience to give them employment, whilst their services would be gladly accepted by other firms who could guarantee them constant employment.

In the best spirit of national service we have suspended our right to strike, and with the right to strike all customs for the reduction of hours and limitation of output. The Government has put power in the hands of employers to refuse permission to workmen to leave them in the usual way. Employers may also demand from their workmen not only full time service, but overtime on any day (including Sunday), with the threat of the Munitions Tribunal should they refuse.

Some employers forget that we temporarily suspended our rights in the national interest and for the safety and success of our sons and brothers in the trenches. That being so we are entitled to more considerate treatment than they are meting out to us.

Amongst such employers we find no less a person than the president of the North-East Coast Institution of Engineers and Shipbuilders.

He pays a fine tribute to "the men of our Overseas Dominions rushing in thousands to swell the marvellous army," and in contrast to these men he puts "certain sections of the British population who limited production whilst their brothers bled."

He said he believed that posterity would decide that this certain section of the British population were greater criminals than the German breakers of treaties and destroyers of cathedrals in their "merciless lust of destruction and slaughter."

That is a very harsh statement indeed.

I am sure that Mr. Rowell, the gentleman who made that statement, did not mean to malign that section of the population whom the public will associate with his words, i.e., the workingmen employed on war work.

If Mr. Rowell were asked he would say that he referred to a small minority of workmen who are undoubted slackers—a minority who are no more numerous amongst workingmen than amongst all other classes of the community. They even exists amongst the sons of dukes and earls, according to a very distinguished member of the House of Lords, who spoke from personal experience.

Remember, I am not making this comparison to excuse or exonerate workingmen who slack or lose time. Our national needs demand the best we each can give, and he who gives less should be tried by a tribunal of some kind and judged by his work and service.

The Trade Unions of this country have told the Government and their employers that they are not out to make additional war wages out of the nation's necessity, and any advances of wages asked for have [illegible] would restore the [illegible] stones at workingmen—even guilty workingmen.

Amongst firms who have done well out of the war I also note the firm of Hawthorn, Leslie, and Company—the firm of which Mr. Rowell is a principal representative. This firm always does well, and earns a normal yearly dividend of £102,000, but for last year they had a dividend of £202,000 being nearly 100 per cent. increase. This profit was only possible with the assistance of workingmen. Even the arch-criminals whose wickedness is greater than that of the German Huns and Vandals, did their small share, otherwise they would not have been employed for the few hours per week which they are willing to work at a very slow pace.

There is no body of honest workmen who would not gladly expel from their trade the men who will neither work themselves or allow others to do so, and there are many instances of men expelled by the Trade Union for losing time and failing to pay the penalty. And yet these men are the very first to find employment with employers who talk loudest about the wickedness of workingmen.

Is there any body of employers in the country who can show such a record of loyalty as the Trade Unionists of this country?

We began by contributing a large percentage to infantry battalions to man the first line trenches and offer the greatest sacrifices. At home we gave ourselves day and night to the equipment of our brothers at the front, and by a self-denying ordinance we agreed and put it in writing "that no attempt should be made by or on behalf of workmen to derive any actual profit from the country's critical position."

And now, because of a few slackers, for whose existence in the trade employers are themselves chiefly responsible, we have things said which reflect on every workman on war material.

I hope I shall not be misunderstood when I defend men who have neither time nor opportunity to defend themselves. I have no wish for controversy. It is no satisfaction to say "you're another." At the present time we must either pull together or sink together, and we should be agreed on dealing with slackers and national traitors whether they are workingmen or lookers-on.

In another column we reprint the Munitions Act and Regulations, etc. A good many who have never read the Act have condemned it because of some harsh and stupid interpretations and unreasonable penalties which have been inflicted. I ask each of our members to read the Act and keep this month's report for reference; and here I cannot do better than reprint the comments I made on the Act some four months ago.

The Act will apply primarily to "controlled establishments." The Minister of Munitions has power to declare any factory or yard doing war work a "controlled establishment." Any workman in such an establishment who is employed on ships or munitions of war gives up the right to strike, and the employer gives up the right to lock-out.

The Act, however, does not take away the right to strike without making provision for dealing with every question likely to cause a strike.

All our usual machinery for dealing with grievances and questions in dispute will be continued, i.e., reporting to the foreman, calling the district delegate, meeting employers in conference, etc. But where it is decided that this ordinary procedure will settle any question a report should at once be sent to the Board of Trade. If question our wages and conditions during such period shall not be worsened.

Offences under the Act either on the part of employers or workmen are punishable by heavy fines, the employer being responsible for the payment of his own fine and the fines of his workmen. Power is given the employer to deduct workmen's fines out of wages.

Offences under the Act are dealt with by new courts called Munitions Tribunals. On this court there will be a neutral chairman with one or more workmen's representatives and an equal number of employers' representatives.

In such courts it will be our own fault if the points in favour of a workman are not fully brought out in each case.

Schedule 2 of the Act is in the nature of a Trade Union charter. We give up any custom which is detrimental to the maximum war output, but a record of any departure from custom shall be kept so that this custom shall be restored after the war.

We may allow where necessary men of lesser skill to do certain skilled work, but the lesser skilled man must have the same time or piece rates which are paid to the fully skilled workman. In such a case it will be to the employers' interest to have fully skilled workmen all the time. The menace of "the handyman" is thus averted. In all changes of working conditions we must have due notice and opportunity for local consultation with the employers concerned, and if we disagree the proposed change cannot take place until a properly constituted court shall so decide.

The object of the Act is to obtain the maximum output for the present war, and to this end we must most carefully guard and maintain the health and well-being of workmen and their dependents. The maximum output of the nation will not be obtained or maintained if every man, woman, and child are not kept in full physical and mental efficiency. We, therefore, must have good wages, plenty of wholesome, nourishing food, and decent homes to live in. The Government must do their "bit" in nationalising the food supply; aye, and the house supply if the common people are to do their best for the nation.

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE AND FOOD PRODUCTION.

The "Journal of the Board of Agriculture" for November, 1915, contains an important résume of the final report of the Departmental Committee on the Home Production of Food. The Committee are convinced that there is great need to increase the productivity of the soil of this country, and they are in favour of restoring much of the grass land to arable cultivation; particularly do they desire to do this with the poorer pastures. The Committee suggest at least the partial socialisation of home produced sulphate of ammonia with a view to securing for farmers sufficient supplies at prices approximating to those which obtained before the war. The Committee also suggest that immediate steps should be taken to stimulate the breeding of pigs. They might have inquired into the restrictions imposed and made recommendations as to the abolition of those which made it impossible for many cottagers to breed pigs. The whole of the "Journal," together with the new leaflets issued, suggests that in spite of the criticisms which have been directed against the Board it is endeavouring to supply all food producers with the best scientific information and advice.

It is the workers who suffer the most from all wars, and it is only armament rings, shipping combines, and other capitalist combinations who profit by them.

the hands of employers to refuse permission to workmen to leave them in the usual way. Employers may also demand from their workmen not only full time service, but overtime on any day (including Sunday), with the threat of the Munitions Tribunal should they refuse.

Some employers forget that we temporarily suspended our rights in the national interest and for the safety and success of our sons and brothers in the trenches. That being so we are entitled to more considerate treatment than they are meting out to us.

Amongst such employers we find no less a person than the president of the North-East Coast Institution of Engineers and Shipbuilders.

He pays a fine tribute to "the men of our Overseas Dominions rushing in thousands to swell the marvellous army," and in contrast to these men he puts "certain sections of the British population who limited production whilst their brothers bled."

He said he believed that posterity would decide that this certain section of the British population were greater criminals than the German breakers of treaties and destroyers of cathedrals in their "merciless lust of destruction and slaughter."

That is a very harsh statement indeed. I am sure that Mr. Rowell, the gentleman who made that statement, did not mean to malign that section of the population whom the public will associate with his words, i.e., the workingmen employed on war work.

If Mr. Rowell were asked he would say that he referred to a small minority of workmen who are undoubted slackers—a minority who are no more numerous amongst workingmen than amongst all other classes of the community. They even exists amongst the sons of dukes and earls, according to a very distinguished member of the House of Lords, who spoke from personal experience.

Remember, I am not making this comparison to excuse or exonerate workingmen who slack or lose time. Our national needs demand the best we each can give, and he who gives less should be tried by a tribunal of some kind and judged by his work and service.

The Trade Unions of this country have told the Government and their employers that they are not out to make additional real wages out of the nation's necessity, and any advances of wages asked for have only been such as would restore the balance of real wages which has been upset by the avarice of capitalists and middlemen.

One firm of millers (that of Spillers and Bakers), who did well in normal times with an average yearly profit of £140,000, put up their prices and increased their profits by £227,000, making a first war dividend of £367,000.

A well-known shipowner, when challenged regarding his high freights and profits, said he had a right to make extra profits.

Shall we agree to fine and imprison workingmen and allow idle shareholders to exploit our country in war time?

I am not quite sure the representatives of those firms should be first to throw wickedness of workingmen.

Is there any body of employers in the country who can show such a record of loyalty as the Trade Unionists of this country?

We began by contributing a large percentage to infantry battalions to man the first line trenches and offer the greatest sacrifices. At home we gave ourselves day and night to the equipment of our brothers at the front, and by a self-denying ordinance we agreed and put it in writing "that no attempt should be made by or on behalf of workmen to derive any actual profit from the country's critical position."

And now, because of a few slackers, for whose existence in the trade employers are themselves chiefly responsible, we have things said which reflect on every workman on war material.

I hope I shall not be misunderstood when I defend men who have neither time nor opportunity to defend themselves. I have no wish for controversy. It is no satisfaction to say "you're another." At the present time we must either pull together or sink together, and we should be agreed on dealing with slackers and national traitors whether they are workingmen or lookers-on.

In another column we reprint the Munitions Act and Regulations, etc. A good many who have never read the Act have condemned it because of some harsh and stupid interpretations and unreasonable penalties which have been inflicted. I ask each of our members to read the Act and keep this month's report for reference; and here I cannot do better than reprint the comments I made on the Act some four months ago.

The Act will apply primarily to "controlled establishments." The Minister of Munitions has power to declare any factory or yard doing war work a "controlled establishment." Any workman in such an establishment who is employed on ships or munitions of war gives up the right to strike, and the employer gives up the right to lock-out.

The Act, however, does not take away the right to strike without making provision for dealing with every question likely to cause a strike.

All our usual machinery for dealing with grievances and questions in dispute will be continued, i.e., reporting to the foreman, calling the district delegate, meeting employers in conference, etc. But where it is doubtful that this ordinary procedure will settle any question a report should at once be sent to the Board of Trade. If within 21 days of that notice the question is not referred for settlement by arbitration men are at liberty to strike.

Twenty-one days may seem to long for many questions to be delayed, but as under the Act employers will have no power to delay a reference to arbitration we are more likely to have settlements in one week than in three.

A further clause in the Act provides that "the conditions of labour and the remuneration thereof prevailing before the difference arose shall be continued until the said difference is settled." This clause prevents employers arbitrarily altering existing wages and conditions of employment, so that whether we wait one week or three weeks for a verdict on any averted. In all changes of working conditions we must have due notice and opportunity for local consultation with the employers concerned, and if we disagree the proposed change cannot take place until a properly constituted court shall so decide.

The object of the Act is to obtain the maximum output for the present war, and to this end we must most carefully guard and maintain the health and well-being of workmen and their dependents. The maximum output of the nation will not be obtained or maintained if every man, woman, and child are not kept in full physical and mental efficiency. We, therefore, must have good wages, plenty of wholesome, nourishing food, and decent homes to live in. The Government must do their "bit" in nationalising the food supply; aye, and the house supply if the common people are to do their best for the nation.

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE AND FOOD PRODUCTION.

The "Journal of the Board of Agriculture" for November, 1915, contains an important résume of the final report of the Departmental Committee on the Home Production of Food. The Committee are convinced that there is great need to increase the productivity of the soil of this country, and they are in favour of restoring much of the grass land to arable cultivation; particularly do they desire to do this with the poorer pastures. The Committee suggest at least the partial socialisation of home produced sulphate of ammonia with a view to securing for farmers sufficient supplies at prices approximating to those which obtained before the war. The Committee also suggest that immediate steps should be taken to stimulate the breeding of pigs. They might have inquired into the restrictions imposed and made recommendations as to the abolition of those which made it impossible for many cottagers to breed pigs. The whole of the "Journal," together with the new leaflets issued, suggests that in spite of the criticisms which have been directed against the Board it is endeavouring to supply all food producers with the best scientific information and advice.

It is the workers who suffer the most from all wars, and it is only armament rings, shipping combines, and other capitalist combinations who profit by them.

Have you realised that by purchasing a ¼-lb. Tin of

FRY'S PURE BREAKFAST COCOA

you can provide the household with

30 cups of this Perfectly Pure Cocoa by using a half-teaspoonful to the cup—a weekly average of over 4 cups a day?

Morning Post
5-1-16

676
676/24

MUNITIONS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On the report stage of the Munitions of War (Amendment) Bill,

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE moved to recommit the Bill in order to insert a new clause which had been promised, as the result of certain conferences which he had in Glasgow and afterwards with the Amalgamated Society of Engineers. The object of the clause was to give power to the Ministry of Munitions to enforce what was known as L 3 Circular issued with regard to minimum wages of munition workers. In the absence of an amendment of the kind he proposed the process by which that circular could be enforced was rather cumbrous and roundabout.

The House having gone into Committee,

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE formally moved the second reading of his new clause, which was in the following terms: "(1) The Minister of Munitions shall have power by order to give directions as to the rate of wages, hours of labour, and conditions of employment of semi-skilled and unskilled men employed in any controlled establishment on munition work, being work of a class which prior to the war was customarily undertaken by skilled labour; or as to the time rates for the manufacture of complete shell and fuses and cartridge cases, in any controlled establishment in which such manufacture was not customary prior to the war, and any direction so given shall be binding on the owner of the establishment, and any contractor or sub-contractor employing labour therein, and the workers to whom the directions relate, and any contravention thereof or non-compliance therewith shall be punishable in like manner as if the order in which the direction is contained was an award made in settlement of a difference under Part I. of the principal Act."

Mr. PRINGLE pointed out that the clause would give protection to skilled workmen in controlled establishments but not in other establishments, although in the latter the skilled workmen might be guilty of an offence under the Munitions Act if they took steps to safeguard the rights which might be endangered by relaxation of rules and dilution of labour. He suggested that something should be done to rectify this inequality.

Mr. C. DUNCAN (Lab, BARROW-IN-FURNESS) pointed out that obviously much ill-feeling could be avoided if points of difference were speedily adjusted by the Committee of Production.

Mr. CLYNES (Lab, MANCHESTER, N.E.) joined in the general welcome given to the clause. Had the Minister of Munitions received any assurance that this new clause would satisfy those who had made representations to him on their grievances?

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE replied that difficulties as to the speeding up of the settlement of disputes were covered by an amendment on the paper. His only reason for not extending the clause to non-controlled establishments was that, as Minister of Munitions, he had nothing to do with those works. He was carrying out literally the pledge given by the Prime Minister to the Amalgamated Society of Engineers by adapting the words of the Circular L 3. He had seen the workmen privately, and he had very frank talks with them. Some of the Scotsmen were very frank indeed, but they confined most of their objections to the scheme of dilution.

The new clause was added to the Bill, progress was reported, and the House proceeded to the consideration of the Bill as amended by Committee.

MR PRINGLE'S BASELESS STATEMENTS.

Mr. PRINGLE moved a new clause repealing Section 7 of the original Act. This section, he said, had turned out in practice to be one of the most irritating provisions of the Munitions Act. It dealt with the question of employers' certificates for workmen who wished to change their employment. Nobody suspected that the machinery provided by Section 7 might mean that a workman might be out of work for six weeks. The restrictions imposed on the mobility of labour were no longer necessary, as legal enactments had put a stop to employers trying to entice workmen from others. A state of things had been produced on the Clyde bordering on revolution. He was not exaggerating. The conditions on the Clyde had been systematically concealed from the public by the Government and by the Ministry of Munitions. In one of the greatest shipbuilding yards, that at Fairfield, the men were so aggravated that they refused to see the Minister of Munitions.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE—That is absolutely untrue. I never went near Fairfield and never asked anyone in Fairfield to meet me. (Cheers.)

Mr. PRINGLE—You were at Weir's?

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE—The hon. and learned gentleman's statement is either true or untrue. I say it is untrue. I think his first duty is to withdraw the statement. (Cheers.)

Mr. PRINGLE—I withdraw the statement that the right hon. gentleman offered to go to Fairfield and was refused. I put the point that he went, or desired to go, to Weir's, a Government yard, and that there there was a refusal to meet him. He went to Parkhead, and one of the questions with which he was most urgently faced there was this question of Section 7. In introducing him there the chairman of his meeting said: "This is Mr. Lloyd George. He has come specially to speak to you, and no doubt you will give him a patient hearing. We regard him with suspicion because every Act with which his name is associated has the taint of slavery."

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE—That is absolutely untrue. If my hon. and learned friend likes to repeat in the House of Commons tittle-tattle from meetings which were perfectly private and confidential, I am bound to say that that is the danger—repeating on the authority of some one man the statements made by others at a confidential meeting. It is absolutely untrue. In the first place, if it had been true it ought not to have been reported, because the meeting was a private one. In the second place, it is absolutely untrue. (Cheers.)

Mr. PRINGLE—Of course, I accept the right hon. gentleman's statement. At a subsequent stage of the proceedings Mr. Kirkwood put the point about slavery in even stronger form, and at a public meeting, of which an official report was given, but not an accurate or a full report, his right hon. friend admitted his obligation to Mr. Kirkwood. He thought it was admitted that Mr. Kirkwood put in the very strongest way to the right hon. gentleman his objection to what he called the slavery provisions of the Munitions Act.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S NEW POLICY.

One of the reasons why he had pressed for delay in considering the Bill was for the announcement of the new policy. The new policy was to revolutionise the whole conditions. They were to have the compulsory attestation, in the first place, of all unmarried men, and that would extend to the married men. Under compulsory attestation it would be possible for the Government to put men to any work they pleased under conditions of military law. Under the circumstances what was the use of discussing the Munitions Bill? There had been reports in the Press about Mr. Lloyd George's intentions. It was stated, for instance, that as a result of the right hon. gentlemen's visit to the Clyde he had come back more strongly convinced in favour of compulsion, and that he had sent an ultimatum to the Prime Minister regarding military service. His (Mr. Pringle's) brother was working in one of the yards on the Clyde, and he knew the conditions there just as he did, and he would shed the last drop of his blood before he asked his brethren, flesh of his flesh and bone of his bone, to be submitted to the military slavery which was suggested by those newspapers which were in the confidence of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. HOGGE seconded. He said the workmen on the Clyde were suffering very legitimate grievances, and if some recent events were not covered very quickly very serious trouble would result in the Clyde Valley.

Mr. CURRIE (U, LEITH BURGHS) held that the real trouble with the Clyde workmen arose from the fact that they had a difficulty in accepting Mr. Lloyd George's advice because they heard very different views from him not long ago. The larger number of the Clyde munition workers would realise that the Minister of Munitions was doing his best to discharge his great work just now. What some of them were afraid of was that things done now might remain to their detriment after the war.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S REPLY.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said the amendment had nothing whatever to do with Government [illegible] of the House he would promise that by means of regulations prosecution for refusing to work on Sunday would be made impossible.

The amendment was withdrawn.

PENALTY OF IMPRISONMENT.

With the assent of Mr. Lloyd George, a new clause, moved by Mr. PRINGLE, was adopted abolishing the penalty of imprisonment for offences under the Munitions Act.

WOMEN'S ARBITRATION TRIBUNAL.

Mr. ANDERSON asked that the special arbitration tribunal for women to be established under Clause 6, should not be composed entirely of officials but should include Trade Union representatives and one or two women capable of dealing with questions affecting the employment status of women.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said he had not quite made up his mind as to the class from which the members of the tribunal should be selected, but agreed that they should be thoroughly acquainted with questions of the kind referred to and that there should be one or two women among them.

On Clause 7, which extends the definition of munitions work by the setting out of various classes of work to be included,

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE moved an addition so as to include the construction, alteration, repair, or maintenance of docks and harbours in cases where such work was certified by the Admiralty to be necessary for the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. HOLT moved to add after the word "harbours" the words "work in estuaries."

This was agreed to, and the amendment as amended was adopted.

THE LATE SIR G. SCOTT ROBERTSON.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that it was his painful duty to move an amendment standing in the name of a highly respected member who had passed away (Sir George Scott Robertson). Men of all classes would greatly regret the removal of one who had won great distinction in the public service and was highly respected by all. (Hear, hear.) The amendment was to include in the definition of munitions work the supply of tramway facilities.

The amendment was agreed to.

DIVULGING TRADE SECRETS.

Mr. HOLT, on Clause 10, moved that information given by business firms to the Ministry of Munitions as to their business should be an official secret for the purposes of the Official Secrets Act.

Sir G. CAVE thought the main purpose of the amendment was covered already in the original Act, but the matter would be further considered with a view to setting it right if necessary before the Bill finally became law.

Mr. BOOTH said that perhaps the Minister of Munitions was unaware that what was sought to be guarded against in this amendment had already been done several times. Information obtained for official purposes by officials of the Ministry of Munitions had actually been used for private purposes.

The amendment was withdrawn.

The Bill passed the report stage.

NON-UNION LABOUR.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE moved that the measure should be recommitted, and this having been done, he proposed, in fulfilment of a promise, that when the owner of a controlled establishment, in which it was the practice prior to the war to employ Union labour exclusively, received non-Union labour, he should be deemed to have undertaken that the non-Union labour should only continue during the war.

The motion was agreed to, and the House resumed.

CONSULTING TRADE UNIONS.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said that there had been nothing to complain of either in the substance or the tone of the criticism. There was, however, one remark which he must take an opportunity of correcting and repudiating. He had done more consultation with the leaders of Trade Unionism than any man in the House. He had not taken a single step without taking the most absolute precautions to ascertain their opinion. It was not implied that in entering into a conference a Minister was always to take the view of one party. So far as the vast majority of their suggestions were concerned, he had accepted them. The very fact that he went to the Clyde showed that he did not think the opinion of Labour negligible. There was not a man in the Trade Union movement but knew that the mutiny had been against the whole organisation of Trades Unionism. He saw that beginning when he was President of the Board of Trade. Bargains entered into by the Trades Union leaders were repudiated by mutinies in various localities. There was not the faintest doubt that Trade Union leaders had been fighting for their lives. While it was most desirable to take steps to gain a full measure of the confidence of men who were working in a very difficult situation, it was almost impossible to make bargains with those who were always criticising the Government, and one was driven to fall back on the law. At the same time, the Prime Minister agreed with him that it would be a good thing to arrive at an understanding in order to secure the co-operation of labour, and with that object the new clauses to which there were serious objections were inserted in the Bill. The fact that the Government had piloted through the House this Amending Bill, which contained nothing but concessions to Labour, showed that they were not deaf to the representations of Labour, and that they were anxious to remedy the evils of which Labour complained. The powers to control establishments employing a million and a half of workers, to organise labour, to settle the conditions of work, the limitation of profits, and the various valley.

Mr. CURRIE (U, LEITH BURGHS) held that the real trouble with the Clyde workmen arose from the fact that they had a difficulty in accepting Mr. Lloyd George's advice because they heard very different views from him not long ago. The larger number of the Clyde munition workers would realise that the Minister of Munitions was doing his best to discharge his great work just now. What some of them were afraid of was that things done now might remain to their detriment after the war.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S REPLY.

Mr. LLOYD GEORGE said the amendment had nothing whatever to do with Conscription. In countries where there was complete military conscription no Munitions Bill was necessary, and therefore, if his hon. friend wished to get rid of Clause 7 and every other clause in the Munitions Act, the best way would be to have universal conscription. Coming to the discussion of Clause 7, the case was that they had an unrest which was attributable very largely not to employers, but to managers and foremen who were trying to get advantages one against the other. They offered men all kinds of inducements to leave their work. The result was that there was unrest. The stability of labour was interfered with. It was impossible for any man to organise his business for the output of munitions with any sort of reliance on the future. When they discussed the matter with Trades Unions it was admitted that there was a case, and it was suggested that the clause was the best possible way of dealing with it. He could not see any other way unless they put everybody under some sort of military discipline.

THE TROUBLE ON THE CLYDE.

His hon. friend referred to what happened on the Clyde. He represented this upheaval as an upheaval of the Trades Unions against the action of the Government. The revolt was far more against the official leaders of Trades Unionism than against the Government. There had been trouble on the Clyde long before the war. It was the trouble of a section of workmen. They were Syndicalists—same of them Socialists, but most of them Syndicalists—who had been trying to overthrow the official leaders of Trades Unionism for months and months before the war began. There was trouble over a strike, which was repudiated by the Trades Union leaders. The Trades Union leaders had their way and carried the bulk of the men with them. The malcontents had never forgiven them, and had done their best to overthrow them. They had formed an association of their own and had run newspapers of their own, but they were not official Trades Union papers. The whole of the Government's difficulty had come in because they could not make an arrangement with responsible Trades Union leaders. It came very largely from the fact that there was a very powerful organisation underneath them working sedulously and with great skill to overthrow not the Ministry of Munitions, not the Government, but the recognised leaders of Labour in the Clyde Valley. In the circumstances grievances must arise, but he believed that the vast majority of the working men of this country were prepared to work fairly and loyally in order to increase the output. What was the slavery which it was said was imposed on the men? The restraint was infinitely less than the restraint which their fellow workmen put on themselves when they volunteered to become members of Scottish regiments. (Hear, hear.) The workmen had admitted that there was a case for restrictions in time of war. Men were simply told that if they moved about from one workshop to another it would be absolutely impossible to organise the resources of the country to help the Army in the field. Unless labour was organised the war would be lost. Organisation was essential to victory. Was it too much to ask workmen to submit to restrictions?

A WARNING.

Everything depended on the supply of munitions. The length of the war depended on it. Everything depended on whether we should be able to turn out a sufficient quantity of munitions to bring the campaign to an end this year. That did not depend on the soldiers; they had done their part heroically. (Cheers.) It did not depend on the Government. It depended entirely—he said it solemnly with the full knowledge of papers which he had examined to-day—on the workmen of this country doing what the workmen of France had done, frankly setting aside conditions, throwing themselves into the work, sticking to their workshops. Unless they did that, he could not tell what the result would be, but he could tell this, that if they did it they, and they alone, would achieve the victory for this Empire and for the destinies of the human race. (Cheers.)

Mr. HODGE said that there had been a great deal of exaggeration with respect to the trouble over this clause. There had, however, been many cases of hardship. He contended that the Munitions Department should do something more to prevent vexatious and frivolous cases being taken before the Munitions Tribunals.

Mr. OUTHWAITE said that when the South Wales miners struck without the consent of their leaders Mr. Lloyd George conceded to them all their demands. He (Mr. Outhwaite) did not see why the workmen of Scotland should be coerced, any more than the workmen of South Wales.

The clause was negatived.

SUNDAY WORK.

Mr. PRINGLE then moved a new clause providing that no person should be subjected to penalty under the Munitions Act for refusing to work on Sunday.

Dr. ADDISON (SECRETARY to the MINISTRY of MUNITIONS) opposed the clause. Machinery had often to be kept going on Sunday and a certain amount of work had to be done on that day. Only in a few extreme cases had there been prosecutions for refusing to work on Sunday.

Mr. JOYNSON-HICKS (U, BRENTFORD) thought the House of Commons should lay it down that under no circumstances was the British workman to be fined or penalised for refusing to work on Sunday.

After several other members had urged the right of the exhausted worker to refuse to labour on Sunday,

Dr. ADDISON said that in deference to the wishes to fall back on the law. At the same time, the Prime Minister agreed with him that it would be a good thing to arrive at an understanding in order to secure the co-operation of labour, and with that object the new clauses to which there were serious objections were inserted in the Bill. The fact that the Government had piloted through the House this Amending Bill, which contained nothing but concessions to Labour, showed that they were not deaf to the representations of Labour, and that they were anxious to remedy the evils of which Labour complained. The powers to control establishments employing a million and a half of workers, to organise labour, to settle the conditions of work, the limitation of profits, and the various provisions contained in the Defence of the Realm Act and other Acts, constituted a tremendous step forward in our industrial and social development.

The third reading of the Bill was agreed to.

The House adjourned at twelve minutes before ten o'clock.

Bromley District Times
12-1-17

676

676/25

WOMEN'S WAR WAGES.

"A DECENT LIVING WAGE."

The following statement has been issued from the Ministry of Munitions:—

"What are women actually earning on munitions work? Are they overpaid or underpaid? On the one hand, there are denunciations of extravagance—stories of girls with chocolate boxes on their lathes and of women buying expensive sets of furs, and so forth. On the other hand, there are complaints that there are women on Government work earning 3d. an hour or less. That instances of low wages may still be found is as undeniable as the tales about the furs and the chocolate boxes, but both are exceptional.

"The Minister of Munitions has, in fact, done more for women workers in fifteen months than any other authority could probably have done in fifteen years. As early as October, 1915, he published his famous Circular L2 with its keynote, 'Equal pay for equal work.' By this Order women replacing men were to be paid the same piece rates as men, with a time rate of £1 a week. These terms were at once applied to the national factories, although in private establishments they were at first merely recommendations. Circular L2 became law in February, 1916, and has just been reissued in a form still more favourable to women. The amended form provides for the payment of £1 for a 48-hours' week to women of 18 years and over, with an extra 6d. an hour for all additional work. Thus a woman working 50 hours a week will at the end of that time find herself in receipt of £1 1s., and if she were to work for 54 hours she would receive £1 3s.

"A Special Arbitration Tribunal has also been set up by the Minister of Munitions to deal exclusively with women's wages. This tribunal first considered a number of special cases, and made a number of awards. Then in July last these awards were consolidated into an Order which extended their benefits to many thousands of women and girls without the trouble and expense of arbitration. This Order applies to women and girls employed on work which prior to the war was not recognised as men's work, and amongst its provisions is the payment of 4d. an hour to piece-workers of 18 years and over, of 4½d. an hour to workers of 18 years and over when customarily on time, with an additional ½d. per hour in each case for work undertaken in danger zones. Supplementary Orders provide for girls on men's work and for women and girls on aircraft woodwork.

"A Decent Living Wage."

"The effect of these Orders is to secure for the majority of women and girls engaged on direct munitions a decent living wage, or the possibility of making, when on piecework—and piecework was intended to be the rule—earnings undreamt of by the average woman worker in pre-war times.

"It is comparatively easy to deal with direct munitions. Shells and fuses have no use except in war, and no purchaser but the Government. But the progress of the war has led to the control of thousands of establishments of the most diverse character, from great firms making armour plates to firms making patent foods for babies. It has brought within the definition of 'munitions of war' thousands of articles of ordinary commercial uses, many of which have long been made by women. The trades involved have their own customs, their own rates of pay, their own systems of apprenticeship, all framed under the stress of national and international competition. To interfere rashly with them would be like sticking a knife into the works of a watch, and in this field the Minister of Munitions has had to proceed with caution.

"The Special Tribunal has been engaged, however, on this task for many weeks. It has examined hundreds of cases, and if the new Orders which result from the labours leave any trades uncovered, it can, as the need arises, deal with these by arbitration."

The Iron & Trades Review
January 19, 1917.

An order, entitled the "Munitions (Employment and Remuneration of Women on Men's Work) Order No. 5," dated December 21, 1916, has been made by the Minister of Munitions. In future women employed on time on work customarily done by men shall, except as mentioned below, be paid:—Where the working week is 48 hours, £1; where the working week is less than 48 hours, £1 for the working week and for additional hours, if any, worked up to 48; where the working week exceeds 48 hours, as follows:—For 49 hours, £1 0s. 6d.; for 50 hours, £1 1s.; for 51 hours, £1 1s 6d.; for 52 hours, £1 2s.; for 53 hours, £1 2s. 6d.; for 54 hours, £1 3s. Women employed on time, (a) on work of a class customarily done by semi-skilled men, or (b) on work of a specially laborious or responsible nature, or (c) where special circumstances exist shall be paid according to the nature of the work and the ability of the women, but in no case less than the time-rates specified above. Overtime, night shift, Sunday and holiday allowances as customarily paid to men, shall be paid to the women to whom the above paragraphs refer. The basis for overtime shall be the working week for women in the establishment in question. For this purpose, the working week for women shall in no case be reckoned as less than 48 hours or more than 54 hours. The rate for overtime for women other than those referred to above shall be computed on the basis of £1 for 48 hours. The above directions shall not apply in the case of women employed on work customarily done by fully-skilled tradesmen, in which case the women shall be paid the time-rates of the tradesmen whose work they undertake. Overtime and night-shift and Sunday and holiday allowances payable to such men shall also be made to such women.

WOMEN WORKERS' PAY.

INCREASES BY MUNITIONS MINISTRY

The Ministry of Munitions is to be congratulated on improving, to a large extent, the wage rates in many controlled establishments. It has been pointed out in The Times that women received in some cases only 9s. a week for 52 hours, and were unable to leave without forfeiting six weeks' wages.

Two new orders laying down various rates, and affecting about a quarter of a million women have just been issued—Orders 1917, nine and 10—under which, for the first time, a statutory wage is applied to some of the large subsidiary trades engaged on munition-making. Among these are electrical engineering and electrical accessories, wire rope and cables, iron and steel work, and rubber, in which trades some of the instances of the very low wages paid to women have been quoted in The Times.

One of these orders, however, provides for even lower rates than those previously given, but the order has a limited application. A basis rate of 3¾d. an hour for women of 18 for piecework is, having regard to the rise in the cost of living, only the equivalent of what was regarded as a sweated rate before the war. It is also regrettable to find in this Order (No. 10) a reduction of ½d. an hour on the time-rate. It had been hoped that a new consolidating order would have been issued raising the rates of workers of 18 and over to at least 6d. an hour, and making it a minimum and not a standard rate. In this connexion it is worth noting that by an agreement just concluded in France covering the whole of the metal trades M. Thomas has fixed a minimum rate of 6d. an hour.

The new rates, however, show a marked advance on the previous ones—the increase in wages varying from 6s. to 10s. a week. The Orders are dated January 6, and came into operation last Monday

The Herald.
3/2/17

We must mention the exceedingly welcome announcement that a further step has at last been taken towards the protection of the many thousands of women munition workers whose exploitation has hitherto been allowed to proceed unchecked. Order 447, with its time rates of 4d. and 4½d. for piece and time workers, has now been extended to a number of grossly sweated women's trades, including electrical engineering, electrical accessories, wire rope and cables, wire and steel work, rubber, and a number of other trades. The nut and bolt trade, for what reason we cannot imagine, is still excluded. This is something done; but even the Times is far from satisfied, especially with the provision which reduces the rates to 3¾d. and 4½d. in certain trades. This, in face of an 87 per cent. rise in the cost of living, is a miserably sweated rate still, and the fact that it means considerable advances is a reason rather for shame than for congratulation. The Times points out that M. Thomas has just fixed by agreement a minimum of 6d. for the whole of the French metal trades. Surely we can do as well as France, and declare a general minimum of 6d., with corresponding advances to women now in receipt of more than the lowest minimum yet fixed. Raise the 3¾d. minimum to 6d., and raise all the rest proportionately. That is the programme which, we hope, will be pressed at once upon the Ministry of Munitions.

Times
14-2-17

WOMEN SHELL-MAKERS.

INCREASING NEED OF MORE WORKERS.

The Ministry of Munitions state that the call for women to undertake work on munitions is becoming increasingly urgent, and that on the response made to it must depend in large measure the ability of the Ministry to satisfy the demands of the Army in view of the coming advance.

Nothing but the employment of women on processes hitherto undertaken by men can meet the situation. In the new contracts, now being issued, it is provided that by March 31 80 per cent. of the operatives employed in executing new and continuation contracts for shells of all sizes from 2.75in. to 4.5in. must be women. In the case of shell above 4.5in. the percentage of women operatives is not specifically defined, but all contracts contain the following clause:—

It is a condition of this contract that any directions of the Ministry of Munitions as to the percentage of women operatives to be employed, or as to the number of skilled or semi-skilled male operatives to be employed, shall be complied with.

All women fit to undertake shell-making or munitions work of any kind should apply at once to the employment exchange nearest to their residence.

Times
13-2-17

WOMEN MUNITION WORKERS.

FOUR WAGE ORDERS.

In answer to a question by Lord Henry Cavendish-Bentinck, Mr. Kellaway states that the following Orders have been issued under section 6 (1) of the Munitions of War (Amendment) Act, 1916:—

(1) Remuneration of women on men's work Order; first applied February 28, 1916; amended January 1, 1917; further amended February 5, 1917.

(2) Remuneration of girls on men's work Order; first applied July 17, 1916.

(3) Remuneration of women and girls on work not recognized as men's work Order; first applied July 17, 1916; amended January 22, 1917.

(4) Remuneration of women and girls on woodwork for aircraft Order; first applied October 2, 1916.

The first and second of the above Orders have been applied up to the present to 3,585 establishments engaged in the following trades:—

Arms, ammunition, and ordnance, mechanical, electrical, telegraphic and marine engineering, makers of electric and telegraphic accessories, machine tool manufacture, shipbuilding and repairing, iron and steel works, tube works, tinplate, lead and copper works, foundries, blast furnaces, wire and cable works, textile and printing machinery, motors and cycles, aircraft, constructional engineering, the manufacture of saws and files, cutlery, silver and electro plate.

The third of the above orders has been applied up to date to 3,875 establishments, embracing the following trades:—

Arms, ammunition, and ordnance, mechanical, electrical, telegraphic and marine engineering, makers of electric and telegraphic accessories, machine tool manufacture, shipbuilding and repairing, iron and steel works, tube works, foundries, blast furnaces, lead and copper works, wire and cable works, textile and printing machinery, motors and cycles, aircraft, constructional engineering, the manufacture of saws and files, cutlery, silver and electro plate, chemicals, asbestos, rubber, optical and scientific instruments, explosive and filling factories, mica.

The fourth of these orders has been applied to the aircraft industry.

Electrical
2-3-17

Skilled Women's Wages.—By a new Order of the Ministry of Munitions, women engaged on skilled work, or any part of a skilled job, must receive 25s. weekly from the first to the fifth week, after which they are to receive proportional advances to the 13th week, when they will be paid the district engi[illegible]s' rate of 10½d. per hour.

677/1

677.

Daily News & Leader

7.10.15.

SOLDIERS OF THE FACTORY.

M. THOMAS'S SPEECH TO LABOUR LEADERS.

FRANCE'S EXAMPLE.

NOT A SINGLE STRIKE SINCE WAR BEGAN.

M. Albert Thomas, the French Minister of Munitions, who left England for France yesterday afternoon, addressed earlier in the day a meeting of British Labour leaders at the office of the Ministry of Munitions. Mr. Arthur Henderson presided.

M. Thomas, who spoke through an interpreter, said that had he been able to speak in English as well as he could speak in French it would have given him great pleasure and joy, as a Labour member of Parliament and a Socialist, to address masses of British workmen. He was sorry he could not do that, and he was glad to have the opportunity of addressing some of the representatives of workers who were his associates in this great work of both nations.

The first result of the war was to take most of the younger men, at least, and the strongest muscle and brains from the workshops. Everything was stopped, or nearly everything, for a few weeks. The men had to serve their country as soldiers under a military system which they had so very often denounced in their meetings, but they went very enthusiastically and willingly; they were called, but they would have gone without being called, the universal feeling being that the country was being attacked and that they were rushing to support the country against a dastardly act of aggression.

Men Brought From the Front.

A few weeks after they had become soldiers—about the time of the battle of the Marne—new interests became conspicuous; industrial needs such as had never been dreamed of came to light for the first time. Enormous quantities of supply were found to be necessary, though even then nobody thought how great that demand would be. It was found necessary to bring back a great many men from the Army to the shop, although they considered that all the time they were soldiers fighting for the country, and fighting the same fight. In the workshop, as in the field, they considered they were fighting against the "Boches."

Then their efforts became even greater than before. They had had to march day by day and night by night, and fight in the field or in the trenches. But some of them actually died, so hard and continuously did they work in those first weeks. These workmen, it could be said, had willingly sacrificed everything. From September to February they never knew a Sunday; they never knew one holiday; they did not think of it; they were at it every day. The time came when the machinery grew tired before the men. Then it was found advisable to give the men at least one day in a fortnight, or every Sunday morning, and that had been the system since.

Before the war the men were by no means easy to manage. They were men used to discussion and struggle for their interests and rights. In Great Britain, where there were long established organisations of trade unions, strikes were methodically prepared, and the unions were equipped with the necessary supplies of reserve money. In France perhaps they were not quite so fully organised, and there were a great many small strikes. The men were ready to strike at anything, but there had not been one strike in France since the war began—even a twenty-four hours' strike. (Cheers.) Sometimes they to make it the last of all wars. (Cheers.) They hoped to come back to a state of things where there would be no heavy military burden on the nation, and where more happiness, more freedom, and more work for the real needs of human society would be possible. That is what they think now." (Cheers.)

Mr. Henderson, in thanking Mr. Thomas for his speech, said that those present would do the best they could to transmit the information he had given them to their respective unions, in the hope that any of them who had not yet done so would catch the spirit which evidently pervaded every French workman, whether in the field or the factory.

LABOUR RECRUITING MANIFESTO.

Plea for Vindication of Voluntary Principle.

The manifesto which has been drafted in connection with the Labour Recruiting Campaign was issued yesterday afternoon. It is signed, on behalf of the three national committees, by Messrs. H. Gosling and C. W. Bowerman (Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress), J. O'Grady and W. A. Appleton (General Federation of Trade Unions), G. J. Wardle and W. S. Sanders (Labour Party Executive). The text of the manifesto is as follows:

Fellow countrymen,—At no time in the history of our nation has it been faced with a crisis of such gravity as the one which now exists. Aggression carefully planned has, after fourteen months of war, brought the German forces into Belgium, France, Poland, Turkey, and the Balkan States.

We are convinced that Germany is prepared to involve every country in conflict in order to attain her ends.

Under the voluntary system we have raised great armies to oppose the aggressor, and we can point proudly to their achievements. We are, however, satisfied that if the voluntary principle is to be vindicated at least 30,000 recruits per week must be raised to maintain the efficiency of our armies, and secure such a victory as will free the world from the fear of that military tyranny which Germany would impose upon it.

There are in the country at the present moment tens of thousands of men of military age and fitness who have not yet joined the colours, and for whom equipment and munitions are ready. We appeal to them to take up at once their share of the burden, not only because by so doing they will be defending their own interests, but also because their action will preserve the vital interests of the nation.

It is not want of courage that keeps men from enlisting, but the failure to appreciate the seriousness of the situation.

We know that defeat or an inconclusive peace would mean for us not only the loss of prestige as a nation, and the certainty that the conflict would be renewed in a few years' time, but the loss of those personal liberties and privileges which have taken centuries of effort to win.

The responsibility for victory or defeat rests with those who have not yet responded to the call. Therefore join now as volunteers in defence of your country and all that it stands for.

677/2

Reynolds's Newspaper, Oct. 10th 1915

Before the war the men were by no means easy to manage. They were men used to discussion and struggle for their interests and rights. In Great Britain, where there were long established organisations of trade unions, strikes were methodically prepared, and the unions were equipped with the necessary supplies of reserve money. In France perhaps they were not quite so fully organised, and there were a great many small strikes. The men were ready to strike at anything, but there had not been one strike in France since the war began—even a twenty-four hours' strike. (Cheers.) Sometimes there had been small difficulties, but a peaceful settlement had always been effected in the course of a day.

Sometimes the men would complain that a too zealous foreman had told a man whose work was not considered quite satisfactory, "If you do not work better than that we shall send you back to the front." Then the workman would come and protest: "I am a soldier here, as I am a soldier there. I am doing my best here, as I did my best there. Going to the front is no punishment to me."

Women in the Workshops.

The men agreed to put aside for the present all difficulties that might be caused by the union rules or traditions. Quite recently he had had an interview with a union of the workers in a State establishment on the subject of the employment of women. The representative of the union asked him to remember how for years they had been successfully struggling against the use of women in their shop. Nevertheless, the union agreed to their admission, and the Minister of Munitions thought it necessary and natural at the same time to say that equal pay should be given for equal work. (Hear, hear.) In that way it was possible to send a certain number of women workers immediately to the national factory at S. Etienne.

If the workers had such a high ideal of their duties towards the State, the Government considered it had also great duties. The officers in charge of these places under the Government where munitions of war were made had to remember that all the men were workmen who had become soldiers for the time being whose interests must not be jeopardised. Every military officer in charge of the workshop or factory was under strict orders to be frequently in conference with local trade unions on technical and other questions, and to come to an understanding with them whenever it was found desirable to make any change. Was it not strange to see that the men who represented authority and military discipline worked hand-in-hand with the men who represented the freedom and the rights of the working classes? That, however, was natural in a country which had become a soldier country, just to fight for her soil, her freedom, the future of her democracy. (Cheers.)

A Natural Paradox.

The paradox of bringing together men of such different education and habits became quite natural, and so it must be. The workman had become a soldier; the soldier had become a workman. The workman fought for his own liberty, and the soldier brought his technical knowledge and his ability, and placed them at the disposal of the working classes for their own cause.

Was it not astonishing to see a nation which once sent to the Labour congresses the most uncompromising anti-militarists, and the most revolutionary minds against anything like the present state of things, working whole-heartedly in the war? "Is it we, the men who spoke like that in congresses," said Mr. Thomas, "is it we who are now working solely for the war in that spirit? Yes, we are the men, and we are conscious that we are working for the same ends."

What was the end before the war? It was, by the struggles of the working classes by labour organisation, perhaps by Socialism, to secure greater welfare for the working-men and more freedom for the whole world and for all classes. The end was peace—peace in the nation and peace between the nations. (Cheers.) It was peace for a happier mankind, able to think, able to live the real higher life, and to ascend higher and higher towards an ideal condition of humanity. That was the goal, and it is now.

"Why was the French workman enthusiastic when he was called to arms in August, 1914? There was hardly one who did not think that he was going to war

STRIKES AT AN END

M. THOMAS ON THE SPIRIT OF FRENCH WORKERS.

NO SACRIFICE TOO GREAT.

Fighting the Boches in Factory as in Field.

During his visit to this country M. Albert Thomas addressed a meeting of British Labour leaders at the office of the Ministry of Munitions. Mr. Arthur Henderson, President of the Board of Education, presided. M. Thomas addressed the gathering in French, his remarks being interpreted by Professor Mantour.

Mr. Thomas said: In the course of the conversations which my English colleague, Mr. Lloyd George, and myself have had with regard to our different supplies, and the mutual assistance which we can give to each other, by the exchange of machinery or of materials, our thoughts have often turned to those who are assisting us in manufacturing and increasing day by day the production of munitions. Mr. Lloyd George has often been invited by me to come to France, and to speak to our French workers, and to see with what sympathy, with what enthusiasm, they welcome the efforts made for months in England to increase supplies. And he knows how, for my part, it would have been a real pleasure to me if I could speak English, to address a mass of English workers, and to speak to them, from heart to heart, of our plans and of our hopes. In default of the great masses, which I am not able to address, I have welcomed very heartily the invitation which he was good enough to extend to me to speak to you, authorized representatives of the great English industrial organizations engaged on war work.

Several days ago we had at our Ministry of Labour in Paris Mr. Hodge and Mr. Roberts, who came to tell us of the efforts made by the British working classes to attain the maximum output of munitions. I now wish to tell you very plainly of the admirable efforts of our French workers. On the day of mobilization the workshops were almost completely emptied. All the strongest men, all those who were the muscle and brain of the workshops, were mobilized, and the greater number of the workshops were closed.

Munitions Need Revealed.

But at the end of only a few weeks the enormous consumption of munitions at the Battle of the Marne revealed the necessity of organizing in the midst of war an industrial programme which surpassed everything which until then had been thought necessary for the needs of the country. That is how it came about that workers, who had set out to fight on the battlefield, were suddenly called back to the workshops and summoned afresh as soldiers to industrial pursuits. They came back in the same frame of mind; they came back with the knowledge that there in the shops lay their duty to the nation. They came back with the idea that in the shops also, as they put it, "they would continue to fight the Boches," . . . and it is with this idea that they have used all their strength to multiply the output of munitions. I have known some who died at their work. I have known of admirable foremen spending their days and a great part of the nights in reorganizing the workshops which were disorganized by mobilization. I have known of men who remain constantly at their task, prolonging their daily spell by hours, sacrificing their customary rest. In all the workshops of France from September to May there were neither weekly rest days nor holidays. So long the machinery was running the workers remained in the shops without rest or holiday. One day, however, they had to stop. Their energy was not gone, but the machinery was tired—even before the will of the workers had broken down. And now, to take care of human energy, which has its limits, the men rest one day every fortnight, or on Sunday mornings. They have then a moment's rest—a moment's respite.

Workers' Single Aim.

Our workers were accustomed to meet in their syndicates and to discuss and assert themselves in many matters. To-day they have one single aim, a single ideal. Need I tell you English Trade Unionists, whom I have so often admired—need I say that if in times of peace you brought about methodical, organized strikes to obtain new advantages, with us in France strikes also multiplied on questions of honour and of amour propre? We had in France small strikes on account of disagreements; we had sympathetic strikes. Since the war I affirm, with full knowledge, that there has not been a single strike in France, not even one of those little twenty-four-hour strikes by means of which workpeople show their discontent. If here and there a disagreement arose, it was sufficient to send to the place a Government representative or a friendly member of Parliament, or even one of the Trade Unionists who every day are collaborating with us in national defence, and the movement instantly stopped. We might have given orders; we could have introduced into the shops the military discipline which existed in principle, but the cases in which it has been necessary to fourteen months. They are co-operating without wavering in the organization of national defence.

M. ALBERT THOMAS, the French Minister of Munitions.

The Goal of Peace.

Such is the picture which I am anxious to place before you, side by side with that of my friend, Mr. Roberts, M.P. It shows you the efforts made by the working classes of France since the beginning of the war. These efforts, these hopes may surprise you. And why? It was we who yesterday at our Congresses were the keenest critics of militarism. It was we who were the most unwilling to support the burden of a permanent Army. It was we who seemed the least resigned to the obligation of military service imposed upon us. We protested against it in all our Labour and political organizations. And it is we who to-day voluntarily impose upon ourselves all these burdens. We are conscious of what they mean, but know that in working for them we are working for a common end. This end is, English workers, an end which we have always had in common in our workers' battles, and in our Trade Unionist and Syndicalist struggles, to secure greater welfare to the working classes and greater liberty to the entire world. We seek to realize that universal peace for which we have hoped. Our end is a living humanity, freed from economic oppression, a liberty of thought assured to the human spirit in its progress to higher ideals. To this end our united efforts are to-day directed.

No Sacrifice Too Great.

At the hour of mobilization the French working classes went forward with enthusiasm. Their thoughts were the same in every case, that they must fight with their whole energy in this war which was to be the last of all wars. They must make the fullest sacrifices to gain liberty for the whole world to win a happier life, and a greater freedom for the proletariat. Such was the deepest thought of our workers as they set out in August of last year; it has remained in their hearts ever since. Recently a meeting took place in Paris of one of the sections of our party. Amongst the workmen there was one who had grown discouraged and complained. While he was speaking there were signs of astonishment and protest. At the back of the hall in which the meeting was held was a soldier who was home on four days' leave, and, as a member of the same party, had come to the meeting with his wife and son, a youngster aged twelve. Hearing the complaints made by the man of little faith the soldier said:—

"Comrades, I am surprised to hear what is now being said. We who have been with the colours know all about the fatigue, the suffering and demoralization of trench warfare, but we are to-day in the same mind as we were on the day of mobilization. I went to fight in order that my son here might never have to go to war. If I am to die, then I shall die, but I do not want him to see war. To avoid this we will make every sacrifice—our liberty, our blood, our life."

This man was prepared to sacrifice himself to obtain that which we all desire—a humanity which lives at peace, which is no longer menaced, as it has been for the last forty years by German militarism—a humanity which can realize its dream of emancipating the working classes and of liberating the whole world. It is this emancipation of which I have tried to tell my English comrades; it is this higher aim that we are striving to attain. We have one single idea, to make every sacrifice in the certainty that it is made to secure an ideal which will never be taken away from us.

GETTING UNDER WAY.

Valuable Results of Minister's Visit to London.

Paris, Saturday.

M. Albert Thomas relates in the "Matin" the following impressions of his visit. He says: "It was the third time in four months that I had met Mr. Lloyd George. I could not express the feeling of growing confidence which has marked those interviews. In our relations with the British there is a point at which our friends give proof of a depth of sincerity and a warmth of sympathy which surprise foreigners as [illegible] number of the workshops were closed.

Munitions Need Revealed.

But at the end of only a few weeks the enormous consumption of munitions at the Battle of the Marne revealed the necessity of organizing in the midst of war an industrial programme which surpassed everything which until then had been thought necessary for the needs of the country. That is how it came about that workers, who had set out to fight on the battlefield, were suddenly called back to the workshops and summoned afresh as soldiers to industrial pursuits. They came back in the same frame of mind; they came back with the knowledge that there in the shops lay their duty to the nation. They came back with the idea that in the shops also, as they put it, "they would continue to fight the Boches," . . . and it is with this idea that they have used all their strength to multiply the output of munitions. I have known some who died at their work. I have known of admirable foremen spending their days and a great part of the nights in reorganizing the workshops which were disorganized by mobilization. I have known of men who remain constantly at their task, prolonging their daily spell by hours, sacrificing their customary rest. In all the workshops of France from September to May there were neither weekly rest days nor holidays. So long the machinery was running the workers remained in the shops without rest or holiday. One day, however, they had to stop. Their energy was not gone, but the machinery was tired—even before the will of the workers had broken down. And now, to take care of human energy, which has its limits, the men rest one day every fortnight, or on Sunday mornings. They have then a moment's rest—a moment's respite.

Workers' Single Aim.

Our workers were accustomed to meet in their syndicates and to discuss and assert themselves in many matters. To-day they have one single aim, a single ideal. Need I tell you English Trade Unionists, whom I have so often admired—need I say that if in times of peace you brought about methodical, organized strikes to obtain new advantages, with us in France strikes also multiplied on questions of honour and of amour propre? We had in France small strikes on account of disagreements; we had sympathetic strikes. Since the war I affirm, with full knowledge, that there has not been a single strike in France, not even one of those little twenty-four-hour strikes by means of which workpeople show their discontent. If here and there a disagreement arose, it was sufficient to send to the place a Government representative or a friendly member of Parliament, or even one of the Trade Unionists who every day are collaborating with us in national defence, and the movement instantly stopped. We might have given orders; we could have introduced into the shops the military discipline which existed in principle, but the cases in which it has been necessary to threaten with the police all soldiers brought back from the colours to the workshops trade have been very rare.

Rules Put Aside.

One fact. As Minister of Munitions, I have received complaints from workers, who have said to me: "Such and such a foreman threatens to send us back to the front, but this is not a punishment; we will not permit him to speak of it as a punishment. We do our duty to the nation equally in the shops. If we are sent back to fight, we shall accept the order as an honour." These are some features which illustrate the spirit of our French workers in munitions factories and workshops. All restrictions which they might have enforced, all syndicalist rules and customs which they could have set up against us, especially in State factories, all were put aside. Some days ago, at St. Etienne, in a friendly meeting which I had with the members of the Syndicate of State Workers, I told them of the necessity of introducing female labour into the national factories. They reminded me of how, for fifteen to twenty years, they had resisted the entry of women into the factories, and had even fought to prevent it. But now, with the guarantee which I gave them that for equal work there should be equal pay—to use the old syndicalist formula—they consented to the entry of women into the St. Etienne workshops, and to-day several hundred women are already to be found employed there.

Normal Wages Maintained.

In these circumstances we do not, and cannot, forget the duty of the Government with regard to Labour. I have written to my officers, to those who have control of works, that they must remember at all times that they are the guardians of the soldier-workers, and that, as in the case of the Trade Unionist concessions, it was their duty to maintain them with the authority of the State and to make them respected.

Thus, some days ago I had to make some manufacturers in the west of France observe agreements which they tried to break on account of the war. Also I have ordered that there shall be exhibited in factories a list of wages paid in order that we may be assured that the wages of the mobilized workers and of military workers are paid at the normal rates. I have also recommended that if hereafter the syndicates are not able to meet us as before, if syndical life can no longer remain the same, my officers are to take the advice of the syndicalist workers and to enter into daily relations with them and seek their assistance in the organization of Labour. That is why, at the present moment—a thing hitherto unknown in France—the intimate collaboration of those who are representatives of discipline and authority, and of those who were known as the defenders of the liberty of the working man, has been closely established in a country which is profoundly convinced of the necessity of defending its soil and its threatened liberties. These two opposing elements are now united, and have been so in France for the last are to-day directed.

No Sacrifice Too Great.

At the hour of mobilization the French working classes went forward with enthusiasm. Their thoughts were the same in every case, that they must fight with their whole energy in this war which was to be the last of all wars. They must make the fullest sacrifices to gain liberty for the whole world to win a happier life, and a greater freedom for the proletariat. Such was the deepest thought of our workers as they set out in August of last year; it has remained in their hearts ever since. Recently a meeting took place in Paris of one of the sections of our party. Amongst the workmen there was one who had grown discouraged and complained. While he was speaking there were signs of astonishment and protest. At the back of the hall in which the meeting was held was a soldier who was home on four days' leave, and, as a member of the same party, had come to the meeting with his wife and son, a youngster aged twelve. Hearing the complaints made by the man of little faith the soldier said:—

"Comrades, I am surprised to hear what is now being said. We who have been with the colours know all about the fatigue, the suffering and demoralization of trench warfare, but we are to-day in the same mind as we were on the day of mobilization. I went to fight in order that my son here might never have to go to war. If I am to die, then I shall die, but I do not want him to see war. To avoid this we will make every sacrifice—our liberty, our blood, our life."

This man was prepared to sacrifice himself to obtain that which we all desire—a humanity which lives at peace, which is no longer menaced, as it has been for the last forty years by German militarism—a humanity which can realize its dream of emancipating the working classes and of liberating the whole world. It is this emancipation of which I have tried to tell my English comrades; it is this higher aim that we are striving to attain. We have one single idea, to make every sacrifice in the certainty that it is made to secure an ideal which will never be taken away from us.

GETTING UNDER WAY.

Valuable Results of Minister's Visit to London.

Paris, Saturday.

M. Albert Thomas relates in the "Matin" the following impressions of his visit. He says: "It was the third time in four months that I had met Mr. Lloyd George. I could not express the feeling of growing confidence which has marked these interviews. In our relations with the British there is a point at which our friends give proof of a depth of sincerity and a warmth of sympathy which surprise foreigners so agreeably. I am now at that point with the eminent Minister of Munitions, and I daresay that we are at that point with the whole British people. At my two first meetings with Mr. Lloyd George we only really made each other's acquaintance and talked generalities; yesterday we drew up the conditions of a closer co-operation and we signed arrangements.

A Vital Agreement.

"I can say that the two countries pledge themselves mutually to devote all their raw material to manufactures for the national defence, relegating to the second place manufactures for private industry. This agreement is vital to France, for we are a country of the finished product, and we lack raw material and the half-finished article. It was a great error on the part of Germany to think that the loss of our northern departments was the coup de grace to our military industries. Our great mechanical workshops are intact, thanks to the co-operation of Great Britain and America, and their production will increase constantly. Such is the first result of the interview in London.

"The second result is the friendly settlement of all the little disputes which are constantly arising between departments most cordially connected. Mr. Lloyd George had his dossiers; I had mine. In a few hours all misunderstandings were removed. But we went further in our friendly goodwill. We pointed out to each other mutually the economies that might be effected in our respective manufactories, while taking the experience gained into account. We have taught a lot of things to the British since August, 1914, but they in turn have valuable lessons to impart to us. We have endeavoured to derive from the collaboration of the two countries, pending its speedy extension to other countries, its maximum effect with the minimum of economic wastage."

In conclusion, M. Thomas describes the output of British workshops and psychology of the workers, using, as he says, "a nautical or sporting expression which will please our friends." "England is getting under way"—Reuter.

677/3 677

The Observer – 10.10.15.

THE UNITY OF FRANCE.

M. THOMAS'S SPEECH TO ENGLISH TRADE UNIONISTS.

VERBATIM TRANSLATION.

We are asked to publish the following verbatim translation of the fine speech delivered by M. Albert Thomas, French Under-Secretary of State for War, to a meeting of trade unionists at the Ministry of Munitions on Wednesday last. A verbatim report of the speech in French was taken, but it was found impossible to obtain a translation and a full report in time for publication in the daily papers :—

Gentlemen,—In the course of the conversations which our English colleague, Mr. Lloyd George, and myself have had with regard to our different supplies and the mutual assistance which we can give to each other by the exchange of machinery or of materials, our thoughts have often turned to those who are assisting us in manufacturing and increasing day by day the production of munitions.

Mr. Lloyd George has often been invited by me to come to France and to speak to our French workers, and to see with what sympathy, with what enthusiasm, they welcome the efforts made for months in England to increase supplies. And he knows how, for my part, it would have been a real pleasure to me if I could speak English to address a mass of English workers and to speak to them, from heart to heart, of our plans and of our hopes. In default of the great masses which I am not able to address I have welcomed very heartily the invitation which he was good enough to extend to me to speak to you, authorised representatives of the great English industrial organisations engaged on war work.

Several days ago we had at our Ministry of Labour in Paris Mr. Hodge and Mr. Roberts, who came to tell us of the efforts made by the British working classes to attain the maximum output of munitions. I now wish to tell you very plainly of the admirable efforts of our French workers.

On the day of mobilisation the workshops were almost completely emptied. All the strongest men, all those who were the muscle and brain of the workshops, were mobilised, and the greater number of the workshops were closed. The men had been mobilised, called to that military service of which so many of them had been accustomed to complain at our Conference, at our meetings, at our Congresses. They had been mobilised—they, the keenest of anti-militarists, the most active members of the International Labour Confederation. They had been mobilised, and were setting out to war with enthusiasm, in the knowledge that their country had been attacked. Those who would never have tolerated aggression against another country, who would never have consented to provoke a war, were ready to sacrifice their lives for the defence of their country.

THE DUTY OF "THE SHOPS."

They went to fight with this sentiment, knowing as we all do that the provocation was unjustifiable, and that they must all give their blood, their life, for the defence of the nation. But at the end of only a few weeks the enormous consumption of munitions at the battle of the Marne revealed the necessity of organising in the midst of war an industrial programme which surpassed everything which until then had been thought necessary for the needs of the country.

That is how it came about that workers, who had set out to fight on the battlefield, were suddenly called back to the workshops and summoned afresh as soldiers to industrial pursuits. They came back in the same frame of mind, they came back with the knowledge that there in the shops lay their duty to the nation. They came back with the idea that in the shops also as they put it, "they would continue to fight the Boches." . . . and it is with this idea that they have used all their strength to multiply the output of munitions.

I have known some who died at their work. I have known of admirable foremen spending their days and a great part of the nights in reorganising the workshops which were disorganised by mobilisation. I have known of men who remain constantly at their task, prolonging their daily spell by hours, sacrificing their customary rest. In all the workshops of France from September to May there were neither weekly rest days, nor holidays. So long as the machinery was running, the workers remained in the shops without rest or holiday.

One day, however, they had to stop. Their energy was not gone, but the machinery was tired, even before the will of the workers had broken down. And now, to take care of human energy, which has its limits, the men rest one day every fortnight or on Sunday mornings. They have then a moment's rest, a moment's respite. Our workers were accustomed to meet in their syndicates and to discuss and assert themselves in many matters. To-day they have one single aim, a single ideal.

"NOT A SINGLE STRIKE."

Need I tell you English trade unionists, whom I have so often admired—need I say that if in times of peace you brought about methodical organised strikes to obtain new advantages, with us in France strikes also multiplied on questions of honour and of amour propre? We had in France small strikes on account of disagreements; we had sympathetic strikes. Since the war I affirm with full knowledge that there has not been a single strike in France, not even one of those little twenty-four hour strikes by means of which workpeople show their discontent.

If here and there a disagreement arose, it was sufficient to send to the place a Government representative or a friendly member of Parliament, or even one of the trade unionists who every day are collaborating with us in national defence, and the movement instantly stopped. We might have given orders; we could have introduced into the shops the military discipline which existed in principle, but the cases in which it has been necessary to threaten with the police all soldiers brought back from the Colours to the workshops trade have been very rare.

One fact. As Minister of Munitions I have received complaints from workers who have said to me: "Such and such a foreman threatens to send us back to the Front, but this is not a punishment; we will not permit him to speak of it as a punishment. We do our duty to the nation equally in the shops. If we are sent back to fight we shall accept the order as an honour."

These are some features which illustrate the spirit of our French workers in munitions factories and workshops. All restrictions which they might have enforced, all syndicalist rules and customs which they could have set up against us, especially in State factories, all were put aside.

FEMALE LABOUR.

Some days ago, at St. Etienne, in a friendly meeting which I had with the members of the Syndicate of State workers, I told them of the necessity of introducing female labour into the national factories. They reminded me of how for 15 to 20 years they had resisted the entry of women into the factories and had even fought to prevent it. But now, with the guarantee which I gave them that for equal work there should be equal pay, to use the old syndicalist formula—they consented to the entry of women into the St. Etienne workshops, and to-day several hundred women are already to be found employed there.

In these circumstances we do not and cannot forget the duty of the Government with regard to labour. I have written to my officers, to those who have control of works, that they must remember at all times that they are the guardians of the soldier-workers and that, as in the case of the trade unionist concessions, it was their duty to maintain them with the authority of the State and to make them respected.

Thus, some days ago I had to make some manufacturers in the West of France observe agreements which they tried to break on account of the war. Also, I have ordered that there shall be exhibited in factories a list of wages paid in order that we may be assured that the wages of mobilised workers and of military workers are paid at the normal rates. I have also recommended that if hereafter the syndicates are not able to meet as before, if syndical life can no longer remain the same, my officers are to take the advice of the syndicalist workers and to enter into daily relations with them and to seek their assistance in the organisation of labour.

NATIONAL CO-OPERATION.

That is why at the present moment—a thing hitherto unknown in France—the intimate collaboration of those who are representatives of discipline and authority and of those who were known as the defenders of the liberty of the working men has been closely established, in a country which is profoundly convinced of the necessity of defending its soil and its threatened liberties. These two opposing elements are now united, and have been so in France for the last fourteen months. They are co-operating without wavering in the organisation of national defence.

Such is the picture which I am anxious to place before you, side by side, with that of my friend, Mr. Roberts, M.P. It shows you the efforts made by the working classes of France since the beginning of the war. These efforts, these hopes, may surprise you. And why? It was we who yesterday at our congresses were the keenest critics of militarism. It was we who were the most unwilling to support the burden of a permanent Army. It was we who seemed the least resigned to the obligation of military service imposed upon us. We protested against it in all our labour and political organisations. And it is we who to-day voluntarily impose upon ourselves all these burdens. We are conscious of what they mean, but know that in working for them we are working for a common end.

"THE LAST OF ALL WARS."

The end is this, English workers, an end which we have always had in common in our workers' battles, and in our trade unionist and syndicalist struggles, to secure greater welfare to the working classes and greater liberty to the entire world. We seek to realise that universal peace for which we have hoped. Our end is a living humanity, freed from economic oppression, a liberty of thought assured to the human spirit in its progress to higher ideals. To this end our united efforts are to-day directed.

At the hour of mobilisation the French working classes went forward with enthusiasm. Their thoughts were the same in every case—that they must fight with their whole energy in this war, which was to be the last of all wars. They must make the fullest sacrifices to gain liberty for the whole world to win a happier life and a greater freedom for the proletariat. Such was the deepest thought of our workers as they set out in August of last year; it has remained in their hearts ever since.

A SOLDIER'S SPEECH.

Recently a meeting took place in Paris of one of the sections of our party. Amongst the workmen there was one who had grown discouraged and complained. While he was speaking there were signs of astonishment and protest. At the back of the hall in which the meeting was held was a soldier who was home on four days' leave and, as a member of the same party, had come to the meeting with his wife and son, a youngster aged twelve. Hearing the complaints made by the man of little faith, the soldier said :—

"Comrades, I am surprised to hear what is now being said. We, who have been with the Colours, know all about the fatigue, the suffering and demoralisation of trench warfare, but we are to-day in the same mind as we were on the day of mobilisation.

"I went to fight in order that my son here might never have to go to war. If I am to die, then I shall die, but I do not want him to see war. To avoid this, we will make every sacrifice—our liberty, our blood, our life."

This man was prepared to sacrifice himself to obtain that which we all desire—a humanity which lives at peace, which is no longer menaced, as it has been for the last 40 years, by German militarism, a humanity which can realise its dream of emancipating the working classes and of liberating the whole world.

It is this emancipation of which I have tried to tell my English comrades; it is this higher aim that we are striving to attain. We have one single idea, to make every sacrifice in the certainty that it is made to secure an ideal which will never be taken away from us.

Daily Telegraph.
11. 12. 15.

WAR WORK IN GERMANY.

THE UBIQUITOUS WOMAN.

The complete failure of the German military leaders to bring their disastrous campaign to an end within the short time calculated by the General Staff has led to an unlooked-for change in the business life of the country. It has become necessary in the last few months to call out every available man and youth, with the result that many industries, offices, and municipal services have been serious y disorganised. Where it was possible to appoint them women were urged to take the places of men, and an exhibition showing examples of women's work in war-time has just been opened at the Philharmonic Hall, Berlin. In the course of her inaugural speech, fully reported in the Berliner Tageblatt, Frau Elizabeth Ichenhäuser, one of the organisers, gave some particulars of what had been accomplished. On the ancient principle that it is wise to learn even from a foe, it may be of interest to see how problems similar to, but more urgent than, our own are being handled in an enemy country. The speaker said:

"Thanks to the adaptability of women to the needs of industry, the economic crisis which has necessarily followed on the outbreak of war has not been so severely felt as it might have been. When the first shock was over the buying power of the people revived, and women were installed in many places previously occupied by men. In September, 1914, there were 248 male applicants for every 100 situations vacant; but by September, 1915, the proportion had fallen to 89. Where women are concerned, unfortunately, the figures are not quite so favourable. In August, 1914, there were 202 female applicants for every 100 situations, and by September, 1915, there were still 170. The reason is no doubt to be sought in the fact that women hitherto have not had adequate facilities for becoming familiar with skilled labour in industry. So far industries requiring highly-skilled labour have been able to employ only 45 per cent. of women.

VARIOUS INDUSTRIES.

"Even in time of peace 4,500,000 women are employed on the land in the German Empire, and these brave women have worked with a will through the trying period of war. More gardening and similar work could be performed by women, but they have lacked facilities for learning this trade.

"In the underclothing and ready-made clothing industries there was a great deal of unemployment at the beginning of the campaign; but the enormous demands of the army soon enabled the women employed in these industries to resume their labours. At first there was some doubt as to the ability of women to undertake new branches of work; but any doubts that existed have been removed. Even working-class women are now filling positions in the metal and engineering industries formerly occupied by men. Women are now largely employed by Krupps for machine work requiring delicacy and precision. In the last year the Central Labour Bureau in Berlin alone has appointed more than 80,000 women and girls to positions of every kind in the engineering, leather-making, electrical, and chemical industries.

"Even the printing trade, which might before the war have been described as hermetically sealed to women, is now employing many female compositors. Working-class women who are physically fit for the labour are being extensively used in the transport services and for handling coal; and, of course, large numbers are being employed as street-cleaners and as tram drivers and conductors. Many women, again, have taken the places of barbers and bakers. Women who before the war had been engaged as photographers have found their services in demand at base hospitals, where their experience in handling chemicals has enabled them to be trained quickly as bacteriologists and as skilful users of the X-rays.

"In commercial houses women have almost everywhere taken the places of men as stenographers and bookkeepers. In the postal services our sex is now represented largely as telegraphists, sorters, and clerks.

677/5 67

The Standard.
1-1-16

WORKING FOR VICTORY.

INTENSE PATRIOTISM SHOWN BY FRENCH ARTISANS.

BRITISH LABOUR REPORT.

With the concurrence of Mr. Lloyd George and the hearty approval of M. Albert Thomas, the French Minister of Munitions, Lord Murray of Elibank, Director-General of Labour Recruiting, appointed a mission to visit the industrial districts in France and report on the causes which have contributed to the enormous increase which has taken place in the production of munitions in that country. That such an increase has taken place is remarkable when it is kept in mind that one eighth of the country and five-eighths of the former metallurgical productivity are in the hands of the enemy.

The mission consisted of Messrs. J. T. Brownlie, chairman of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers and member of the National Advisory Committee and the Central Munitions Labour Supply Committee; Alexander Duckham, Ministry of Munitions; Dr. J. Shackleton, Labour Adviser, Ministry of Munitions; and Allan M. Smith, secretary of the Engineering Employers' Federation and member of the Central Munitions Labour Supply Committee.

The report of the mission, which has now been presented, contains much data of a valuable nature, and also observations and conclusions on the position generally. As information of this character cannot fail to be of the greatest interest, especially at the present juncture, a report has been issued for publication.

In this report it is stated that the mission visited 23 establishments engaged in production of munitions. It says:—

The mission endeavoured to ascertain what circumstances had led up to the greatly increased production of munitions in France. Three factors appear to have contributed to this increase: (a) Increasing intensity of production; (b) erection and equipment of new factories and extension of existing munitions factories; (c) adaptation of existing factories to the manufacture of munitions.

With regard to the increasing intensity of production, it was evident to the mission that as the war has proceeded the French nation has settled down with a determination and feeling of set purpose to the fulfilment of the task allotted to it. Women, of whom many thousands are employed in munition factories, work with a good will which is most impressive; this spirit is also evident in the case of male workers. The men have apparently welcomed the introduction of women into the factories, and are doing everything they can to instruct and co-operate with them in increasing the output of munitions.

PATRIOTIC ENTERPRISE.

The erection and equipment of new factories has been resorted to in great measure. It is remarkable that this effort is due to private enterprise. No factories have been subsidised by the Government, nor have loans of any kind been made to the owners. The owners have, at competitive prices, taken orders from the Government, and on the strength of these orders have purchased land, built factories, procured machinery, and now depend on the contract prices for reimbursement of their outlay and for gaining the profit to which they are entitled.

Remarkable success has attended the efforts of a number of employers who have abandoned their normal manufacture and adapted their machinery for the output of munitions.

A feature of the French system is the fostering of the small producer for machine operations. Of these there are about 1800 in the Paris district. In such cases it is found that for reasons of administration, inspection, etc., it is better that small producers should be working under sub-contract and not under direct contract from the Government. The work let on sub-contract is paid for at the price the main contractor receives from the Government, and no profit is made by the main contractor out of the work sub-contracted.

Many small shops are manned by various members of a family, and work day and night shifts. In one case visited, for example, the day shift was superintended by the father and daughter and the night shift by the mother and son. Although the shop was of meagre proportions and the equipment poor, very satisfactory output was effected. In another case, a very small shop, the work had been superintended by the wife of the owner, who was serving in the Army. The woman worked herself to death, and the husband was ordered back from the Army to continue the work she had been doing.

Practically all the factories run night shift as well as day shift. In some cases the hours are divided into three shifts. Those on the two shift system have one break in the day. The usual starting times are 6.0 a.m. to 7.0 a.m. A engaged on night shift. Where three shifts are worked the women are, of course, engaged during the night.

There is no restriction on the work which a woman may do. The only processes which are confined so far to men are setting up and tool making, though with regard to the former the women may qualify for some part of it, and with regard to the latter some women are actually grinding the edges of cutting tools for machines.

The opinion in the French factories is that the output of females on small work equals, and in some cases excels, that of men, and in the case of heavier work, within certain limits, women are of practically the same value as men. It has to be kept in mind that physical considerations limit the range of work which may be done by women. It was noticed, however, that part of the work done by women involved greater strain than might be thought reasonable in this country.

GOOD TIMEKEEPING.

A remarkable feature in the French factories is the almost entire absence of lost time. The time lost by the workpeople owing to avoidable causes does not exceed on the average one per cent. of the total time. At St. Etienne, for example, where 10,000 are employed, on the day of the visit of the mission ten to 20 were to be punished for culpable absence, of whom two or three were the worse for drink. On the same day 60 persons made a late start in the morning. On many days, however, not a single late start takes place. In cases of loss of time the usual punishments for civilians are:—Reprimand for the first offence; in some cases a fine for the second offence, but generally the workman is dismissed. It is, however, not usual for the second offence to take place within such a short period as would not justify its being dealt with by a further reprimand. In the case of military workers, the man is sent to his depot and dealt with under military law.

Although prior to the war the usual labour troubles were experienced, no strike has taken place since the commencement of hostilities. No applications for general advances in wages have been made by the workpeople since the commencement of the war.

There is not uniformity of opinion as to the desirability of having women superintendents of discipline, etc., as distinguished from superintendents of manufacturing operations. Some employers prefer female, and others male.

The general conclusions at which the mission have arrived are:—(a) The people of France realise that they are at war. (b) The one idea in the mind of all is to bring the war to a successful issue. (c) The spirit which dominates the nation has prevented difficulties arising in the manufacture of war material. (d) Loss of time is practically negligible. (e) No trade union restrictions exist at the moment. (f) Everything is done to increase production. (g) No limitation of profits exists, and no question in this respect has been raised by the workpeople. (h) The manner in which the employers in France have been able to acquire machinery, and the initiative and energy displayed by them are beyond all praise. (i) In conclusion it appears to the mission that the increase of production in France is due to one cause, and one only, and that is the patriotic enthusiasm which exists there.

Society of Engineers and member of the National Advisory Committee and the Central Munitions Labour Supply Committee; Alexander Duckham, Ministry of Munitions; Dr. J. Shackleton, Labour Adviser, Ministry of Munitions; and Allan M. Smith, secretary of the Engineering Employers' Federation and member of the Central Munitions Labour Supply Committee.

The report of the mission, which has now been presented, contains much data of a valuable nature, and also observations and conclusions on the position generally. As information of this character cannot fail to be of the greatest interest, especially at the present juncture, a report has been issued for publication.

In this report it is stated that the mission visited 23 establishments engaged in production of munitions. It says:—

The mission endeavoured to ascertain what circumstances had led up to the greatly increased production of munitions in France. Three factors appear to have contributed to this increase: (a) Increasing intensity of production; (b) erection and equipment of new factories and extension of existing munitions factories; (c) adaptation of existing factories to the manufacture of munitions.

With regard to the increasing intensity of production, it was evident to the mission that as the war has proceeded the French nation has settled down with a determination and feeling of set purpose to the fulfilment of the task allotted to it. Women, of whom many thousands are employed in munition factories, work with a good will which is most impressive; this spirit is also evident in the case of male workers. The men have apparently welcomed the introduction of women into the factories, and are doing everything they can to instruct and co-operate with them in increasing the output of munitions.

PATRIOTIC ENTERPRISE.

The erection and equipment of new factories has been resorted to in great measure. It is remarkable that this effort is due to private enterprise. No factories have been subsidised by the Government, nor have loans of any kind been made to the owners. The owners have, at competitive prices, taken orders from the Government, and on the strength of these orders have purchased land, built factories, procured machinery, and now depend on the contract prices for reimbursement of their outlay and for gaining the profit to which they are entitled.

Remarkable success has attended the efforts of a number of employers who have abandoned their normal manufacture and adapted their machinery for the output of munitions.

A feature of the French system is the fostering of the small producer for machine operations. Of these there are about 1800 in the Paris district. In such cases it is found that for reasons of administration, inspection, etc., it is better that small producers should be working under sub-contract and not under direct contract from the Government. The work let on sub-contract is paid for at the price the main contractor receives from the Government, and no profit is made by the main contractor out of the work sub-contracted.

Many small shops are manned by various members of a family, and work day and night shifts. In one case visited, for example, the day shift was superintended by the father and daughter and the night shift by the mother and son. Although the shop was of meagre proportions and the equipment poor, very satisfactory output was effected. In another case, a very small shop, the work had been superintended by the wife of the owner, who was serving in the Army. The woman worked herself to death, and the husband was ordered back from the Army to continue the work she had been doing.

Practically all the factories run night shift as well as day shift. In some cases the hours are divided into three shifts. Those on the two-shift system have one break in the day. The usual starting times are 6.0 a.m. to 7.0 a.m. A break of one to two hours (averaging one and a-half hours) takes place at noon, and the day shift continues until 6.0 or 7.0 p.m. The long break in the middle of the day enables the women to look after the meals and comfort of their children at home, and is highly valued on this account. On night shift usually ten hours are worked, one hour is generally allowed for a meal, but this is usually taken at the machines, and where the period is half an hour it is paid for, and in few cases is the machinery stopped. In most cases the shifts change over every fortnight, and on the change the workpeople get 24 hours off. No difference is made in the case of Saturdays, the same hours being worked as on other week days. In some cases no work is done on Sundays after noon. This gives an additional time for carrying out necessary repairs, etc.

WOMEN WORKERS.

In practically all cases, women have been introduced since the commencement of the war. They have been drawn from all kinds of occupations. In most cases the women work the same hours as the men, but where tramway journeys are undertaken the women start usually fifteen minutes later and leave fifteen minutes earlier than the men, to vaoid congestion on the tramcars.

The production on night shift appears to equal that on day shift. In some cases it is better owing, as was stated, to there being less interruption at night. Not much female labour is at present employed on night shift. So far, the tendency is to have a female day shift and male night shift. This, however, is being modified, and probably women will, to a large extent, be three were the worse for drink. On the same day 60 persons made a late start in the morning. On many days, however, not a single late start takes place. In cases of loss of time the usual punishments for civilians are:—Reprimand for the first offence; in some cases a fine for the second offence, but generally the workman is dismissed. It is, however, not usual for the second offence to take place within such a short period as would not justify its being dealt with by a further reprimand. In the case of military workers, the man is sent to his depot and dealt with under military law.

Although prior to the war the usual labour troubles were experienced, no strike has taken place since the commencement of hostilities. No applications for general advances in wages have been made by the workpeople since the commencement of the war.

There is not uniformity of opinion as to the desirability of having women superintendents of discipline, etc., as distinguished from superintendents of manufacturing operations. Some employers prefer female, and others male.

The general conclusions at which the mission have arrived are:—(a) The people of France realise that they are at war. (b) The one idea in the mind of all is to bring the war to a successful issue. (c) The spirit which dominates the nation has prevented difficulties arising in the manufacture of war material. (d) Loss of time is practically negligible. (e) No trade union restrictions exist at the moment. (f) Everything is done to increase production. (g) No limitation of profits exists, and no question in this respect has been raised by the workpeople. (h) The manner in which the employers in France have been able to acquire machinery, and the initiative and energy displayed by them are beyond all praise. (i) In conclusion it appears to the mission that the increase of production in France is due to one cause, and one only, and that is the patriotic enthusiasm which exists there.

The Daily Chronicle.
1-1-16.

THE SHELL-WOMEN OF FRANCE.

FAMILIES' DAY AND NIGHT SHIFTS.

HEROIC SOLDIER'S WIFE.

"The people of France realise that they are at war."

This is the first conclusion arrived at by the mission appointed by Lord Murray, Director-General of Labour Recruiting, to investigate the enormous increase in France's production of munitions. Other general conclusions, summarised in the report of the mission, issued last night, are:—

The one idea in the mind of all is to bring the war to a successful issue.

The spirit which dominates the nation has prevented difficulties arising in the manufacture of war material.

Loss of time is practically negligible.

No trade union restrictions exist at the moment.

Everything is done to increase production.

No limitation of profits exists and no question in this respect has been raised by the workpeople.

The manner in which the employers in France have been able to acquire machinery, and the initiative and energy displayed by them are beyond all praise.

It appears to the mission that the increase of production in France is due to one cause and one only, and that is the patriotic enthusiasm which exists there.

WOMEN EQUAL TO MEN.

The mission, which consisted of Messrs. J. T. Brownlie, chairman of the Amalgamater Society of Engineers; Alexander Duckham (Ministry of Munitions); D. J. Shackleton (Labour Advisor, Ministry of Munitions), and Allan M. Smith, secretary of the Engineering Employers' Federation, commenced its investigations on November 30, and visited twenty-three munitions establishments in various parts of France.

Practically all the factories run day and night, states the report. On the day shift the hours are 6 or 7 a.m. till 6 or 7 p.m., with a break averaging an hour and a half at noon. The night shifts work 10 hours, workers taking their meals at the machines, which are rarely stopped. There is no holiday on Saturday, but in some cases Sunday work ceases at noon.

Women, of whom many thousands are employed, work the same hours as men, and the report mentions the opinion, in the French factories that their output on small work equals, and in some cases excels, that of men, while in the case of heavier work, within certain limits, women are of practically the same value as men.

A feature of the French system is the fostering of the small producer for machine operations. Of these there are about 1,800 in the Paris district. Many small shops are manned by various members of a family and work day and night shifts.

NO STRIKE SINCE THE WAR.

"In one case visited, for example, the day shift was superintended by the father and daughter and the night shift by the mother and son. Although the shop was of meagre proportions and the equipment poor, very satisfactory output was effected, due no doubt to the spirit which dominated everyone employed in it.

"In another case, a very small shop, the work had been superintended by the wife of the owner, who was serving in the army. The woman worked herself to death and the husband was ordered back from the army to [illegible] work she had been doing."

No factori[illegible] subsidised by the Government, [illegible] been made t[illegible] practically al[illegible] mium bonus [illegible]

The introd[illegible] female labou[illegible] culties [illegible] a single [illegible] commenc[illegible]

Daily Mail
1-1-16

WOMAN'S LIFE FOR SHELLS.

FRANCE'S GREAT EXAMPLE.

NO TANGLING RULES AND NO LOST TIME.

The remarkable patriotism and spirit of self-sacrifice in which France has tackled the work of making munitions have greatly surprised the members of a British mission appointed to inspect the industrial conditions of our Ally.

The report of the members, Mr. J. T. Brownlie, chairman of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers; Mr. Alexander Duckham, Ministry of Munitions; Mr. D. T. Shackleton, and Mr. Allan M. Smith, secretary of the Engineering Employers' Federation, speaks of the great increase of production and the causes for the increase.

A feature of the French system is the fostering of the small producer for machine operations. Of these there are about 1,800 in the Paris district; they work on sub-contract, paid for at the price the main contractor receives from the Government. Many small shops are manned by various members of a family and work day and night shifts.

A WOMAN'S SACRIFICE.

In one case, a very small shop, the work had been superintended by the wife of the owner, who was serving in the army. The woman worked herself to death, and the husband was ordered back from the army to continue the work she had been doing.

The opinion in the French factories is that the output of women on small work equals and in some cases excels that of men, and in the case of heavier work, within certain limits, women are of practically the same value as men. It was noticed that part of the work done by women involved greater strain than might be thought reasonable in this country.

The period of training for machine operations for women is, on the average, one week. In some cases it extends to a fortnight, while in others it is less than one day. The work of teaching the unskilled is done in each factory. In some cases a man will teach a woman, who will then take his place and teach another woman, and thereafter be promoted and be replaced as a teacher by her pupil. In a few cases men originally objected to this system, but that objection has long since disappeared.

The introduction of unskilled male and female labour has not presented the difficulties experienced in this country. It was ascertained from representatives of the trade union movement in France that trade union conditions as regards wages and labour had been practically suspended.

A remarkable feature in the French factories is the almost entire absence of lost time. No strike has taken place. No applications for general advances in wages have been made.

The Times

1-1-16

WORK FOR WOMEN ON THE LAND.

LORD SELBORNE'S PLAN FOR A CANVASS.

A ROLL OF HONOUR.

Lord Selborne, President of the Board of Agriculture, occupied the chair at a conference of representatives of county committees on the question of women's labour for the land at the Middlesex Guildhall yesterday. He outlined a scheme for a canvass of women in agricultural parishes and the preparation of a register of all who are willing to help in farming.

LORD SELBORNE said that on the solution of the question of the employment of women depended whether agriculture was to rise triumphantly over its difficulties in the coming year. All other difficulties would be small compared with the solution of the labour problem. This matter had already been taken up and strenuously dealt with in some counties, but what had been done was as nothing compared with what ought to be done.

OUTLINE OF ORGANIZATION.

He asked the War Agricultural Committees in each county, if they had not already done so, to organize a body of women who would be responsible to them, and in cooperation with the lady inspectors of the Board of Trade to organize women's labour in every parish in every county in England and Wales. That could only be done by a canvass of women for the work, just as there had been a canvass of the men to get them to join the Army. He wanted a regular canvass of all the women in every agricultural parish and a register formed of all those who were prepared to help in agriculture. Meetings would be necessary to appeal to the women and put the case properly before them.

There were still farmers who were reluctant, or shy, or sceptical about the use of women in agriculture, but these feelings were very much less manifest to-day than they were three months ago. Unless farmers were prepared to utilize women's labour to the utmost possible extent to which it was procurable in many parts of England and Wales they would not be able to surmount their labour difficulties.

He was told that the women in agricultural districts would not be willing to work on the land—that many of them were already well off owing to the receipt of separation allowances. But who a year ago would have believed it possible that three million men would join the Army under the voluntary system? If the same pains were taken to touch the imagination of women, and they were made to understand that the maintenance of agriculture was essential to victory, he believed they would respond to the call. What was required was a crusade, and it was in nothing less than a crusade that he would ask the women of England to engage.

BADGES AND CARDS.

It had been suggested that in every parish there should be a roll of honour for women working on the land. The idea had been adopted in one county, and he commended the suggestion to other counties. There was also a suggestion that some distinctive badge or card which might be hung in a window should be issued to these women. He hoped the Board of Agriculture would be able to give help in showing what kind of clothing was suitable and where it was to be got. Besides the women already living in the country, on whom they must mainly depend, and in regard to whom he urged the crusade, some help could also be given by town women who were willing to undergo training. Experience had shown that such women, being mostly of superior education, could be trained rapidly. Hundreds of them were already on farms, and in almost every case he had heard nothing but unqualified praise of them.

The difficulties of women who not having independent means must earn their livelihood during training he hoped would be met locally. The farmer might advance money or landowners and others arrange for the women's accommodation and maintenance.

In a discussion which was taken part in by many women some interesting points were raised. Several speakers said that women belonging to the well-to-do classes consented more readily to do dirty farm work than women from the humbler classes. The question of suitable clothes was discussed. Mr. TRUSTRAM EVE remarked on the extreme unsuitability of the cloth-topped boots of the "flapper" for work on the land; and said that the places of cloth and leather in women's clothing seemed recently to have been reversed.

Miss LA MOTHE, Agricultural Inspector for Women's Labour under the Board of Trade, recommended a short skirt, strong boots and gaiters, and a knitted cap. It was most important, she said, that women who had to deal with animals should not use a hat-pin. A girl wearing a costume for agricultural work stood on a chair to show it to the conference. To facilitate cheap manufacture Miss La Mothe suggested that every county should adopt some uniform costume.

LORD SELBORNE, in his reply, said arrangements were being made for the information on the registration forms of women to be made available. He whether agriculture was to rise triumphantly over its difficulties in the coming year. All other difficulties would be small compared with the solution of the labour problem. This matter had already been taken up and strenuously dealt with in some counties, but what had been done was as nothing compared with what ought to be done.

Outline of Organization.

He asked the War Agricultural Committees in each county, if they had not already done so, to organize a body of women who would be responsible to them, and in cooperation with the lady inspectors of the Board of Trade to organize women's labour in every parish in every county in England and Wales. That could only be done by a canvass of women for the work, just as there had been a canvass of the m . to get them to join the Army. He wanted a regular canvass of all the women in every agricultural parish and a register formed of all those who were prepared to help in agriculture. Meetings would be necessary to appeal to the women and put the case properly before them.

There were still farmers who were reluctant, or shy, or sceptical about the use of women in agriculture, but these feelings were very much less manifest to-day than they were three months ago. Unless farmers were prepared to utilize women's labour to the utmost possible extent to which it was procurable in many parts of England and Wales they would not be able to surmount their labour difficulties.

He was told that the women in agricultural districts would not be willing to work on the land—that many of them were already well off owing to the receipt of separation allowances. But who a year ago would have believed it possible that three million men would join the Army under the voluntary system? If the same pains were taken to touch the imagination of women, and they were made to understand that the maintenance of agriculture was essential to victory, he believed they would respond to the call. What was required was a crusade, and it was in nothing less than a crusade that he would ask the women of England to engage.

Badges and Cards.

It had been suggested that in every parish there should be a roll of honour for women working on the land. The idea had been adopted in one county, and he commended the suggestion to other counties. There was also a suggestion that some distinctive badge or card which might be hung in a window should be issued to these women. He hoped the Board of Agriculture would be able to give help in showing what kind of clothing was suitable and where it was to be got. Besides the women already living in the country, on whom they must mainly depend, and in regard to whom he urged the crusade, some help could also be given by town women who were willing to undergo training. Experience had shown that such women, being mostly of superior education, could be trained rapidly. Hundreds of them were already on farms, and in almost every case he had heard nothing but unqualified praise of them.

The difficulties of women who not having independent means must earn their livelihood during training he hoped would be met locally. The farmer might advance money or landowners and others arrange for the women's accommodation and maintenance.

In a discussion which was taken part in by many women some interesting points were raised. Several speakers said that women belonging to the well-to-do classes consented more readily to do dirty farm work than women from the humbler classes. The question of suitable clothes was discussed. Mr. Trustram Eve remarked on the extreme unsuitability of the cloth-topped boots of the "flapper" for work on the land; and said that the places of cloth and leather in women's clothing seemed recently to have been reversed.

Miss La Mothe, Agricultural Inspector for Women's Labour under the Board of Trade, recommended a short skirt, strong boots and gaiters, and a knitted cap. It was most important, she said, that women who had to deal with animals should not use a hat-pin. A girl wearing a costume for agricultural use stood on a chair to show it to the conference. To facilitate cheap manufacture Miss La Mothe suggested that every county should adopt some uniform costume.

Lord Selborne, in his reply, said arrangements were being made for the information on the registration forms of women to be made available. The major part of the organization of women must be done through and by women. He hoped example and precept would overcome the fastidiousness shown by some women in regard to dirty work. He believed the idea that it was impossible for horses to be managed by women to be a heresy, and he hoped the experiment of setting women to this work would be tried. He must have assured success in the provision of labour by March, or they would begin to miss the weeks for work essential to the harvest.

Dundee Advertiser

1-1-16

MUNITIONS IN FRANCE.

How Unskilled Workers are Trained.

TOUR OF BRITISH MISSION.

The Ministry of Munitions last night issued the report of a mission appointed to visit industrial districts in France. The mission consisted of Messrs J. T. Brownlie, Chairman of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers; Alexander Duckham, of the Ministry of Munitions; D. J. Shackleton, Labour Adviser, and Allan M. Smith, Secretary of the Engineering Employers' Federation. Attached to the mission were two engineers.

On November 30th last the mission were received by M. Albert Thomas, Minister of Munitions in France, who placed every facility at their disposal. The mission visited 23 establishments. Their report says:—Three factors appear to have contributed to the increase of production—the increasing intensity of production, the erection and equipment of new factories and extension of existing munition factories, and the adaptation of existing factories to the manufacture of munitions.

With regard to the increasing intensity of production, it was evident to the mission that as the war proceeded the French nation had settled down with determination and a feeling of set purpose to the fulfilment of the task allotted to it. There is no question but that the nation is at war, and the dominant sentiment of the men and women is to carry the war to a successful termination. Everything else is subordinated to this determination. Men have apparently welcomed the introduction of women into the factories, and are doing everything they can to co-operate with them in increasing the output of munitions.

A feature of the French system is the fostering of the small producer for machine operations. Of these there are about 1800 in the Paris district. Many small shops are manned by various members of the family, and work day and night shifts. In one small shop the day shift was superintended by a father and daughter, and the night shift by the mother and son. Although the shop was of meagre proportion, and the equipment poor, a very satisfactory output was effected, due no doubt to the spirit which dominated every one employed in it. In another case in a very small shop the work had been superintended by the wife of the owner, who was serving in the army. The woman worked herself to death, and the husband was ordered back from the army to continue the work she had been doing. In most cases women work the same hours as men.

Female Labour.

Not much female labour is at present employed on the night shifts. The tendency is to have a female day shift and a male night shift. Where three shifts are worked, the women are engaged during the night.

There is no restriction on the work which women may do. The opinion in French factories is that the output of females on small work equals that of men. In most cases good locker, washing, and sanitary accommodation is provided. Practically all the work is done on piece. The same piece work prices are paid to women as to men.

There does not appear to be any arrangement made by the Government for technical instruction of unskilled men or of women. This work is done in each factory. In some cases a man will teach a woman, who will then take his place and teach another woman, and thereafter be promoted and be replaced as teacher by her pupil. In a few cases men originally objected to this system, but that objection has long since disappeared, and no difficulty is placed in the way of unskilled male and female labour being enabled to acquire all the skill necessary for their work.

It was ascertained from representatives of the Trade Union movement in France that Trade Union conditions as regards wages and labour had been practically suspended. In France there does not appear to be any recognised system of apprentices, except in the higher branches of engineering. Trade labour is being specialised, and workpeople are permitted to specialise in more skilled operations as they show ability. The time lost by workpeople owing to avoidable causes does not exceed on an average 1 per cent. of the total time. At St Etienne, for example, where 10,000 are employed, on the day of the visit of the mission ten to twenty were to be punished for culpable absence, of whom two or three were the worse for drink. On the same day sixty persons made a late start in the morning. Although prior to the war the usual labour troubles were experienced, no strike has taken place since the commencement of hostilities. No applications for general advances in wages have been made by workpeople since the commencement of the war.

production—the increasing intensity of production, the erection and equipment of new factories and extension of existing munition factories, and the adaptation of existing factories to the manufacture of munitions.

With regard to the increasing intensity of production, it was evident to the mission that as the war proceeded the French nation had settled down with determination and a feeling of set purpose to the fulfilment of the task allotted to it. There is no question but that the nation is at war, and the dominant sentiment of the men and women is to carry the war to a successful termination. Everything else is subordinated to this determination. Men have apparently welcomed the introduction of women into the factories, and are doing everything they can to co-operate with them in increasing the output of munitions.

A feature of the French system is the fostering of the small producer for machine operations. Of these there are about 1800 in the Paris district. Many small shops are manned by various members of the family, and work day and night shifts. In one small shop the day shift was superintended by a father and daughter, and the night shift by the mother and son. Although the shop was of meagre proportion, and the equipment poor, a very satisfactory output was effected, due no doubt to the spirit which dominated every one employed in it. In another case in a very small shop the work had been superintended by the wife of the owner, who was serving in the army. The woman worked herself to death, and the husband was ordered back from the army to continue the work she had been doing. In most cases women work the same hours as men.

Female Labour.

Not much female labour is at present employed on the night shifts. The tendency is to have a female day shift and a male night shift. Where three shifts are worked, the women are engaged during the night.

There is no restriction on the work which women may do. The opinion in French factories is that the output of females on small work equals that of men. In most cases good locker, washing, and sanitary accommodation is provided. Practically all the work is done on piece. The same piece work prices are paid to women as to men.

There does not appear to be any arrangement made by the Government for technical instruction of unskilled men or of women. This work is done in each factory. In some cases a man will teach a woman, who will then take his place and teach another woman, and thereafter be promoted and be replaced as teacher by her pupil. In a few cases men originally objected to this system, but that objection has long since disappeared, and no difficulty is placed in the way of unskilled male and female labour being enabled to acquire all the skill necessary for their work.

It was ascertained from representatives of the Trade Union movement in France that Trade Union conditions as regards wages and labour had been practically suspended. In France there does not appear to be any recognised system of apprentices, except in the higher branches of engineering. Trade labour is being specialised, and workpeople are permitted to specialise in more skilled operations as they show ability. The time lost by workpeople owing to avoidable causes does not exceed on an average 1 per cent. of the total time. At St Etienne, for example, where 10,000 are employed, on the day of the visit of the mission ten to twenty were to be punished for culpable absence, of whom two or three were the worse for drink. On the same day sixty persons made a late start in the morning. Although prior to the war the usual labour troubles were experienced, no strike has taken place since the commencement of hostilities. No applications for general advances in wages have been made by workpeople since the commencement of the war. There is no evidence of fatigue due to long hours. A long break in the middle of the day and the absence of overtime beyond the usual working hours have, no doubt, an important bearing on this question.

Thousands of new machines have been installed. These are mainly from America, but in many cases are of British and Swiss make. Representatives were sent to America provided with cash, and instructed to purchase all the machinery available for munitions work, and if any machinery available was not exactly what was required, if it was to be useful it was to be purchased. By this means there has been a steady flow of most valuable machinery from America to France.

The general conclusions at which the mission have arrived are:—(1) The people of France realise that they are at war; (2) the one idea in the minds of all is to bring the war to a successful issue; (3) the spirit which dominates the nation has prevented difficulties arising in the manufacture of war material; (4) the loss of time is practically negligible; (5) no Trade Union restrictions exist at the moment; (6) everything is done to increase production; (7) no limitation of profits exists, and no question in this respect has been raised by the workpeople; (8) the manner in which the employers have been able to acquire machinery and the initiative and energy displayed are beyond praise; (9) the increased production is due to one cause only—patriotic enthusiasm.

SPUR TO CLYDE WORKERS: FRENCH WOMEN'S SPLENDID EXAMPLE

To-day we publish the first instalment of the report of the British Mission which recently returned from a visit to the industrial districts France. The Mission found that the French people are working like one man in a single cause. The one idea in the mind of all is to bring the war to a successful issue, and we commend the article to every Clydeside worker. In France, as on the Clyde, women are doing splendid work. In most cases they work the same hours as the men, but where tramway journeys are undertaken the women start usually 15 minutes later and leave 15 minutes earlier than the men. Our pictures show French women engaged in various departments of the manufacture of munitions.

THE OPINION IN THE FRENCH FACTORIES IS THAT THE OUTPUT OF FEMALES ON SMALL WORK EQUALS AND IN SOME CASES EXCELS THAT OF ME.

The report of the British Mission which visited the French munition factories states:—"Not much female labour is at present employed on night shift. So far, the tendency is to have a female day shift and male night shift. . . . There is no restriction on the work which a woman may do. The only processes which are confined so far to men are setting up and tool-making, though, with regard to the former, the women may qualify for some part of it, and, with regard to the latter, some women are actually grinding the edges of cutting tools for machines." Our pictures show:—(1 and 2) Young women working machines, and (3) The shells being packed.

Edinburgh Evening Dispatch
14-1-16.

677.

677/12

Women are taking a prominent part in helping France to win the war by working night and day in the munition factories in the place of men. The workshop illustrated is typical of many.

Board of Trade Gazette
- - 1-1916.

LABOUR CONDITIONS IN THE MANUFACTURE OF MUNITIONS IN FRANCE.

A REPORT has now been issued embodying the conclusions of the mission charged with the investigation of labour conditions in the munitions factories of France. The mission consisted of Messrs. J. T. Brownlie, Chairman of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers and member of the National Advisory Committee and of the Central Munitions Labour Supply Committee; Alexander Duckham (Ministry of Munitions); D. J. Shackleton, Labour Adviser (Ministry of Munitions); and Allan M. Smith, Secretary of the Engineering Employers' Federation and member of the Central Munitions Labour Supply Committee. The preamble to the report points out that the increase in the output of munitions which has taken place in France is remarkable when it is considered that one-eighth of the country and five-eighths of the former metallurgical productivity is in the hands of the enemy.

The mission visited 23 factories, and it is stated that on the evidence thus gained it is clear that the primary means by which the enhanced output of munitions has been achieved is by increasing intensity of production, by the erection and equipment of new factories and the extension of existing munitions factories, and by the adaptation of existing factories of other kinds to the manufacture of munitions. In connexion with the increased intensity of output it is stated that "women, of whom many thousands are employed in munition factories, work with a good will which is most impressive; this spirit is also evident in the case of male workers. The men have apparently welcomed the introduction of women into the factories, and are doing everything they can to instruct and co-operate with them in increasing the output of munitions."

With regard to the erection of new factories, it is remarkable that this is due entirely to private enterprise, no factories having been subsidised by the Government or loans of any kind made. In such cases the Government has paid, on the equipment of the factory, one-third of the contract price of the contract taken, the remaining two-thirds being paid as the munitions are delivered. The report states that the mission were much impressed with the extent to which the owners of factories have been able to import machinery. Thousands of new machines have been installed, mostly from America, but in many cases also of British or Swiss make. The mission were also much impressed with the lay-out in the new shops, where, owing to the amount of free space and the mechanical devices for transport, no congestion or difficulty in handling products is met with.

A feature of the French system is the small producer, of whom there are about 1,800 in the Paris district alone. These producers, for reasons of administrative convenience, work under sub-contract; but the work is paid for at the price received by the main contractor, who, therefore, makes no profit. Many such small shops are manned by the various members of a family, and work goes on day and night. An instance is cited where the day shift was superintended by the father and daughters and the night shift by the mother and son. Practically all the factories run night as well as day shift. In some cases three shifts are worked. Where the two-shift system is in force the hours are from between six and seven a.m. to six or seven p.m. There is a long break, averaging one and a half hours, in the middle of the day, and this enables women to look after the meals and comfort of their children at home. On night-shift ten hours are worked, one hour being allowed for a meal, which, however, is usually taken at the machines. The shifts generally change over every fortnight, and on the change the workpeople get 24 hours off. The same hours are worked on Saturdays as on other days, but in some cases no work is done on Sundays after noon, and this allows additional time for carrying out repairs, etc.

In practically all cases women have been introduced since the beginning of the war. They have been drawn from all sorts of occupations. In most cases they work the same hours as the men, but so far they have not been employed much on night shift; this is being modified, however, and in the future women will probably be largely so employed. There is no restriction as to the work which women may do. The only processes so far confined to male labour are setting up and tool-making; with regard to the former, however, women may qualify for some part of it, and with regard to the latter, women are already grinding the edges of cutting tools for machines. A long list of occupations on which women are engaged is given in the Report, and instances of complete manufacture by women include a 75 mm. shell complete, a 120 mm. shell complete, and fuses complete.

be largely so employed. There is no restriction as to the work which women may do. The only processes so far confined to male labour are setting up and tool-making; with regard to the former, however, women may qualify for some part of it, and with regard to the latter, women are already grinding the edges of cutting tools for machines. A long list of occupations on which women are engaged is given in the Report, and instances of complete manufacture by women include a 75 mm. shell complete, a 120 mm. shell complete, and fuses complete.

The introduction of unskilled labour is stated to have been facilitated by the specialisation in output of each factory; thus one factory will specialise in fuses, another in 75 mm. shells, and so on, according to the varying circumstances of each. It is stated to be the general opinion that on small work the output of female labour equals, and in some cases excels, that of male labour; while in heavier work, within limits, women are of practically the same value as men.

Practically all the work, except tool-room work, setting up, and floor labouring, is done on piecework. The premium bonus system is unknown. In the case of women there is no recognised time rate other than that paid during the period of training, which is usually recognised as a guaranteed minimum rate. The same piecework rates are paid to women as to men.

The period of training for machine operations for women is on the average a week; in some cases, however, it extends to a fortnight, and in others again it is less than a day. There is no Government arrangement for instruction, this work being done separately in each factory. In many cases a man teaches a woman, who then takes his place and teaches another woman, and so on. It is stated that in a few cases men objected to this system at first, but such objections have long ago disappeared.

The Report states that the introduction of unskilled male and female labour has not in France presented the difficulties experienced in this country. Trade Union conditions as regards wages and labour have been practically suspended, and workpeople who show ability are permitted to specialise in the more skilled operations. No strikes have taken place since the beginning of the war, and there have been no applications for general advances in wages. A large proportion of the male labour employed, however, is military, many of the men being those who have been mobilised but found unfit for active service. Time-keeping is remarkably good, the time lost owing to avoidable causes not exceeding on the average 1 per cent. It is stated that there is no evidence of fatigue due to the long hours worked either by day or night, although the temperature of the shops is usually very high; it is considered that this is largely due to the long break in the middle of the day and to the absence of overtime beyond the usual hours.

The Report concludes by remarking that "it appears to the mission that the increase of production in France is due to one cause, and one only, and that is the patriotic enthusiasm which exists there."

Standard
8.2.16

Engineer
7.17.16

6

OVERWORKED WOMEN.

CONDITIONS IN AUSTRIAN AND GERMAN FACTORIES.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT IN SWITZERLAND.)

Interesting evidence regarding the extent to which woman labour is being employed in Germany is contained in a report issued by the trade union of German metal workers, in which it is stated that "improved machinery has facilitated the substitution of women for men. In many factories only a few men are left to superintend the work of women, who form 99 per cent. of the hands. Even physically strenuous work is undertaken by women. As an example, a factory may be mentioned in which women lift and carry shells weighing 80lb.; one woman deals with 36 of these heavy projectiles every day. The employment of women for such purposes must give rise to grave anxieties, because it cannot continue without very injurious effects to the health of the nation. The same danger exists in many branches of work of a less laborious character, inasmuch as the women engaged in them are constrained to be strenuously active for eleven and twelve hours per day, often for seven days in the week. It is most desirable that women should not be required to do work for which they are physically unfitted."

In a report published by the Austrian Socialist, Mme. Adelheid Popp, it is declared that the employment of women in laborious and unsuitable occupations has become very extensive in Austria. Both the German and Austrian Socialists demand that women inspectors shall be appointed to supervise the employment of women, and to restrict female labour to occupations which do not endanger their health.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK AT KRUPP'S.

(From our Swiss Correspondent.)

BERNE, June 8th.

THE immensely increased importance of women's labour in Germany is nowhere better shown than by figures of the number of women and girls employed by the firm of Krupp, of Essen. For instance, on August 1st, 1914, their number was only 1241, all being either mere charwomen or sellers in the various canteens and shops specially intended for the use of Krupp's workmen. The number of men employed at the outbreak of war was 36,880. By April 1st last the number of women employed had risen to 13,023, the great majority being, of course, ammunition workers, while the number of men employed had increased to 55,949. By now it is safe to assume that Krupp's female workers number fully 14,000.

In 1914, 8114 of Krupp's male employees were called up, and in 1915, 7500. The total number of employees, men and women, was on April 1st 68,972. They worked double shifts of twelve hours each, including an hour and a-half for meals. It will be seen that the number of employees, taking both sexes together, has almost doubled since the beginning of the war. As a result partly of the long hours of labour and doubtless also of inferior and insufficient food, the number of cases of sickness among the women is enormous—76.60 per cent., while among the men it is also extremely heavy—62.31 per cent.—these figures being taken from the sick fund report of Krupp's workers. The average duration of illness among the workers was in 1915 14.85 days, taking them all together. Taking the men alone, however, it was 15.18 days, and taking the women alone 12.02 days. It is singular at first sight that the average number of days' illness should have been less in 1915 than in any of the three preceding years. It was, for example, 17.49 days in 1914, 18.33 in 1913, and 18.63 in 1912. This, however, is easily explainable by the fact that, working as they do under exceeding pressure and obsessed by concern caused by the increasing dearness of living, the employees, whether men or women, do not go on the sick list until absolutely compelled to do so. The women, it must be remembered, are very frequently either widows or the wives of men serving at the front, and in both cases they have oftener than not children to support. It is significant that the effect of the workers keeping at work until obliged by exhaustion to desist has been to cause a notable increase in the mortality figures, which in 1915 were much higher than in 1914—5.84 per 1000 members of the sick fund members as compared with 4.12 in 1914.

The women employed in Krupp's and in all engineering and ammunition works in Germany are supplied with suitable costumes such as will not endanger their lives by catching in machinery and will not impede their movements. There are several of these costumes, one with knickers and puttees made in one and worn with a loose sack coat made to come down over the hips. This coat can be worn open or closed, but when the wearer is at work she usually removes it and puts on instead a sleeveless overall, so designed as to cover the legs and whole body, and fastening on the shoulders. For women doing work necessitating constant movements of the upper part of the body a special dress has also been devised to allow the freest possible movements while keeping the blouse in place.

The number of women now employed in engineering works throughout Germany is enormous, being in some cases as much as 80 per cent. There is even a movement both in Germany and in Austria-Hungary in favour of introducing some form of compulsory service for women—that is to say, the obligation for every woman directly to serve her country in one way or another by doing war work, unless, of course, physically incapacitated or prevented by motherhood.

One complaint of the women factory workers in Germany at present, especially of those who are married and have young children at home, is that, working as they do mostly from six in the morning till six in the evening, with perhaps only an hour's interval at mid-day, they have absolutely no time or opportunity to buy provisions. At noon they have no time to make purchases, and after 6 p.m. there is virtually nothing more to be had. Another complaint is that soldiers' widows are worse off than soldiers' wives. A soldier's wife with three children, for instance, and a soldier's widow with three children each receive M. 75 a month, but the latter must pay taxes upon this sum, while the former need not.

Furthermore, there is a general feeling that the women are being altogether unduly exploited and their work underpaid, particularly in view of the immense profits earned by ammunition works and almost all enterprises supplying either the requirements of the army and navy or any indispensable commodities, such as coal. Take the twenty-six leading German mining companies, for example. Their total surplus rose from M.7,158,823 in the first quarter of 1915 to M.13,868,377 in the last quarter of the same year, or a rise of 96 per cent. This is attributed to the increases in the price of coke, coals and briquettes, to keen demand and to comparatively small output owing to scarcity of labour, despite the number of prisoners of war employed. In Prussia alone early this year there were 669,000 prisoners of war employed, not all of them in mines, of course, while in other parts of Germany 250,000 to 300,000 prisoners of war are now at work. This utilisation of prisoners of war may possibly account for the slight increase of wages during last year—only 12 per cent.—despite the great increase in relative output.

Standard
15.2.16

OUTPUT OF MUNITIONS IN FRANCE.

NATIONAL ENTHUSIASM.

REPORT OF THE BRITISH MISSION.

Towards the end of last year, with the concurrence of Mr. Lloyd George, and with the approval of M. Albert Thomas, the French Minister of Munitions, Lord Murray of Elibank, the Director-General of Recruiting for Munitions Work, appointed a mission to visit the industrial districts in France and report on the causes which have contributed to the enormous increase which has taken place in the production of munitions in that country, notwithstanding that one-eighth of the country and five-eighths of the former metallurgical productivity are in the hands of the enemy.

The mission was composed of Mr. J. T. Brownlie, chairman of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers and member of the National Advisory Committee and the Central Munitions Labour Supply Committee; Mr. Alexander Duckham, Ministry of Munitions; Mr. D. J. Shackleton, Labour Adviser, Ministry of Munitions; and Mr. Allan M. Smith, secretary of the Engineering Employers' Federation and member of the Central Munitions Labour Supply Committee. Attached to the mission were two engineers of wide experience in the manufacture of war munitions in this country.

On November 30, the mission, accompanied by Colonel Le Roy-Lewis, our Military Attaché in Paris, were received by M. Thomas, who placed at the disposal of the members the necessary facilities for their work. Through the courtesy of M. Thomas the mission was able to visit 23 munition factories, and as a result of their investigations have submitted a report, which has just been published by the Ministry of Munitions as a White-paper.

"In conclusion it appears to the mission that the increase of production in France is due to one cause, and one only, and that is the patriotic enthusiasm which exists there."

That is the given result of the investigations conducted by the mission, and it is led up to by the following striking sentences:—

The people of France realise that they are at war.

The one idea in the mind of all is to bring the war to a successful issue.

The spirit which dominates the nation has prevented difficulties arising in the manufacture of war material.

Loss of time is practically negligible.

No trade union restrictions exist at the moment.

Everything is done to increase production.

No limitation of profits exists, and no question in this respect has been raised by the workpeople.

The manner in which the employers in France have been able to acquire machinery and the initiative and energy displayed by them are beyond all praise.

The report states that in regard to the increasing intensity of production, it was evident to the mission that as the war has proceeded the French nation has settled down with a determination and feeling of set purpose to the fulfilment of the task allotted to it. There is no question but that the nation is at war, and the dominant sentiment, not only of the men, but also of the women, is to carry the war to a successful termination. Everything else is subordinated to this determination.

Women, of whom many thousands are employed in munition factories, work with a good will which is most impressive; this spirit is also evident in the case of male workers. The men have apparently welcomed the introduction of women into the factories and are doing everything they can to instruct and co-operate with them in increasing the output of munitions.

THE SMALL PRODUCER.

A feature of the French system is the fostering of the small producer for machine operations. Of these there are about 1800 in the Paris district. In such cases it is found that for reasons of administration, inspection, etc., it is better that small producers should be working under sub-contract and not under direct contract from the Government. The work let on sub-contract is paid for at the price the main contractor receives from the Government, and no profit is made by the main contractor out of the work sub-contracted.

Many small shops are manned by various members of a family and work day and night shifts. In one case visited, for example, the day shift was superintended by the father and daughter and the night shift by the mother and son. Although the shop was of meagre proportions and the equipment poor, very satisfactory output was effected, due no doubt to the spirit which dominated every one employed in it.

In another case, a very small shop, the work had been superintended by the wife of the owner, who was serving in the army. The woman worked herself to death, and the husband was ordered back from the army to continue the work she had been doing.

DILUTED LABOUR.

There is no restriction on the work which women may do. The only processes which are confined so far to men are setting up and tool making, though with regard to the former, the women qualify for some part of it, and with regard to the latter some women are actually grinding the edges of cutting tools for machines.

One consideration which has made the employment of unskilled male and female labour satisfactory is that in most cases the factory has specialised on a single product, or at least a small range of products. For example, many factories specialise in fuzes, others in gaines, others in 75 mm. shell, and so on, with the result that the repetitive nature of the work is increased and the tool-room and inspection work is proportionally decreased. The specialisation has been arrived at after due regard has been paid to the nature and capacity of the machinery employed.

The Government has paid great attention not only to the desires of employers in this matter, but also to the capacity of each factory and its plant.

PIECE WORK AND INSTRUCTION.

On the subject of piecework, the report states that practically all the work, except tool-room work, is done on this system. The premium bonus system is not known. In the case of women there does not appear to be any recognised time-rate other than that paid during the period of training—these rates are usually recognised as guaranteed minimum rates. The same piecework prices are paid to women as to men.

It did not appear to the Mission that any arrangement was made by the Government for technical instruction of the unskilled. This work is done in each factory, and in some cases a man will teach a woman, who will then take his place and teach another woman, and thereafter be promoted and be replaced as a teacher by her pupil.

In a few cases men originally objected to this system, but the objection has long since disappeared, and no difficulty is placed in the way of unskilled male and female labour being enabled to acquire all the skill necessary for their work. The introduction of unskilled male and female labour has not presented the difficulties experienced in this country. It was ascertained from representatives of the trade union movement in France that trade union conditions as regards wages and labour had practically been suspended.

A remarkable feature in the French factories is the almost entire absence of lost time. The time lost by the workpeople owing to avoidable causes does not exceed on the average 1 per cent. of the total.

Although prior to the war the usual labour troubles were experienced, no strike has taken place since the commencement of hostilities. No applications for general advances in wages have been made by the workpeople since the commencement of the war.

Evening Stand 10
11/3/16

071

6

WOMEN AND WAR.

Visit to a Large Munition Factory in France.

This article, contributed by our Paris Lady Correspondent, has been written by special permission of the French Authorities.

Of the first few minutes that I passed within the door, I remember nothing. The noise produced by thirteen millions of francs worth of powerful machinery stunned me as effectually as a blow on the head! When I recovered my sangfroid and capacity for observation, I saw that I was in a sort of shed, so vast that the opposite end was hardly visible. How the roof—a glass one—remained on was a mystery, especially as it was not helped by any pillars or columns. Under my feet was an irregular earth floor, often broken by light rails on which ran low cars bringing up or taking off different sorts of munition material. In this gigantic hive of labour, nearly 8000 people were at work, and of these two-thirds were women!

"Do you find women make satisfactory workers?" I asked the manager of the place, who was showing me round—not on my own merits, I will admit, but on those of a much greater personage.

"Perfectly," he replied, without a second's hesitation. "They learn quickly and are as steady as time!"

I had visited innumerable workrooms in Paris, where girls and women sew and chatter and chatter and sew from morning to night, turning out marvels of taste and skill. This Government munitions workshop bore not the slightest resemblance to any of them. Conversation was out of the question. The machinery saw to that. Often one noisy monster was served by three, four, or more pairs of hands, but the co-operation seemed to be as automatic as the movement of pistons, levers, and joints. No one asked or gave directions: all seemed thoroughly to know what they were about. I wondered how they stood the roar and rumble.

"Does the noise give you a headache?" I shouted in the ear of a pleasant-looking young woman with a heavy shell in her hands. She shook her head, which was very neatly dressed, the hair well brushed and coiled, and uncovered. "Get used to it," were the only words I caught of her reply. And the manager said the same thing. "I am in and out all day. I cannot make a complete round of the works under two hours—you see the vastness of the buildings—but I don't notice the noise." Still, I observed that when he asked for anything it was in a single word, accompanied by an expressive gesture. The human voice does not carry in such an atmosphere.

Strength and Light Fingers Both Necessary

A few of these women wore caps; they were those occupied with the machinery that makes fine curls and filings of metal. The rest donned only a thick leather apron, with high bib, tied close round their persons. Some were slips of girls—there are some operations that call only for light fingers and attention—others were matrons, over forty, and of largely developed figures. One of these latter had the arms of a blacksmith, and she spent the livelong day turning a huge and heavy lever, putting a weighty shell-case into a certain machine and taking it out again with even, deliberate movements and a quiet mastery of the whole operation that amazed me.

This factory is one of the biggest in the country, and soon there will be ten thousand men and women working there, in two shifts, of ten hours each, a day and a night shift. For some time past the double shift has been the rule. They come on at six in the morning, and go off at four in the afternoon, with an hour off for lunch. The men wore an arm band having a black grenade on a white ground to show they were employed in Government work. Some were young, others were over forty. Quite a number of lads were also working there, fetching and carrying, and waiting on workers gathered round the machines. All are under a close and strict surveillance, and all, I may mention, looked upon me as on an "event," as they say in Paris. Obviously a woman visitor is something so out of the common that it marked the day. And rightly too. It is no place for idle curiosity. It is a demonstration of a force so stupendous, of creative ingenuity so impressive in its directness, that you feel you have to re-adjust yourself anew to the ethical problem of war. For all the force is destructive, and here are women—the mothers of the race, holding in their hands the stoutest of them I noticed, too, had light deft movements, and passed in and out of the limited free space in the area of her bit of machinery without brushing against grease sticks or rocking wheels. Perfect order and discipline prevailed. For a few seconds I watched a group of both sexes occupied with molten steel, comparing its glowing colour with the pattern set up before their eyes on a stand, and manipulating the liquid objects with their long scissors as calmly and neatly as though they had been dressmakers' hot irons or curling tongs.

French Pay for Women Munitioners.

I inquired about the pay. It compares very advantageously, of course, with that earned in ordinary trades, demanding apprenticeship and experience. The highest seems to be eight francs for the day of ten hours, the scale being slightly less for some of the quite simple operations, performed by girls of eighteen or so. There are fifteen processes to produce an obus, or shell, and the final ones are the easiest—those which concern the small brass fittings. Thousands and thousands of these

This Government munitions workshop bore not the slightest resemblance to any of them. Conversation was out of the question. The machinery saw to that. Often one noisy monster was served by three, four, or more pairs of hands, but the co-operation seemed to be as automatic as the movement of pistons, levers, and joints. No one asked or gave directions: all seemed thoroughly to know what they were about. I wondered how they stood the roar and rumble.

"Does the noise give you a headache?" I shouted in the ear of a pleasant-looking young woman with a heavy shell in her hands. She shook her head, which was very neatly dressed, the hair well brushed and coiled, and uncovered. "Get used to it," were the only words I caught of her reply. And the manager said the same thing. "I am in and out all day. I cannot make a complete round of the works under two hours—you see the vastness of the buildings—but I don't notice the noise." Still, I observed that when he asked for anything it was in a single word, accompanied by an expressive gesture. The human voice does not carry in such an atmosphere.

Strength and Light Fingers Both Necessary

A few of these women wore caps; they were those occupied with the machinery that makes fine curls and filings of metal. The rest donned only a thick leather apron, with high bib, tied close round their persons. Some were slips of girls—there are some operations that call only for light fingers and attention—others were matrons, over forty, and of largely developed figures. One of these latter had the arms of a blacksmith, and she spent the livelong day turning a huge and heavy lever, putting a weighty shell-case into a certain machine and taking it out again with even, deliberate movements and a quiet mastery of the whole operation that amazed me.

This factory is one of the biggest in the country, and soon there will be ten thousand men and women working there, in two shifts, of ten hours each, a day and a night shift. For some time past the double shift has been the rule. They come on at six in the morning, and go off at four in the afternoon, with an hour off for lunch. The men wore an arm band having a black grenade on a white ground to show they were employed in Government work. Some were young, others were over forty. Quite a number of lads were also working there, fetching and carrying, and waiting on workers gathered round the machines. All are under a close and strict surveillance, and all, I may mention, looked upon me as on an "event," as they say in Paris. Obviously a woman visitor is something so out of the common that it marked the day. And rightly too. It is no place for idle curiosity. It is a demonstration of a force so stupendous, of creative ingenuity so impressive in its directness, that you feel you have to readjust yourself anew to the ethical problem of war. For all the force is destructive, and here are women—the mothers of the race—helping it forward!

In Normal and War Times.

The city where this gigantic factory is situated is a busy centre of intensive production in normal times, and even now, in the twentieth month of the war, there is more life and movement in its streets than there is in the capital. This shell factory and the military hospitals remind us of the war that is raging in the distant theatre of the north-east provinces. These outward signs and the fact that the division drawn from this district has distinguished itself in the hottest of the fighting are all the inhabitants know of war risks, for they are out of reach of aerial attacks and beyond the fear of possible invasion.

Contrasts in Dress.

It was very characteristic of the dress-sense of the women of France that all these feminine workers, young or old, were plainly clothed in neat black frocks. In England, workers of this class go out to their labour in any cast-off clothes that come their way, reserving some of their wages for holiday finery, with the lamentable æsthetic results we know. In France, just the opposite is the rule. Mademoiselle or madame buys the neat black working suit, and adapts for exceptional holiday wear any gifts of clothing she may receive. Under the shiny leather apron she is extraordinarily neat in this noisy Turkish bath. Even fittings. Thousands and thousands of these pass through the fingers of the employees in a small, cool room at the end of the huge machinery shed. You might have taken them for brass buttons, as they were being packed and rolled like golden sovereigns in a mint. I came away with the feeling that it is a very happy thing that our sex has been enabled to render a really signal service to the country in a crisis that calls for every strong arm, together with the whole and harmonious effort of every individual belonging to the nation as it is straining towards the goal of Victory and Liberty.

Star
26.7.16

6

Women Engineers.

Our Russian allies have given English women a lead which would have helped our munition supplies immensely if we had followed it. Scores of highly skilled women engineers hold high positions in Russian industry, and it is, I am told, quite usual to come upon engineering gangs working under women supervisors on railroads and in shipbuilding yards. It is even said that they do their work better than men! And this was going on before the war.

Glasgow Herald
22.7.16.

COMRADES IN ARMS.

THE MUNITION WORKERS OF FRANCE AND BRITAIN.

VISIT OF SCOTTISH WOMEN TO PARIS.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

A deputation of Scottish women munition workers and others, representing industrial interests, has just returned from France, where they have been visiting munition factories, chiefly in the district of Paris. The deputation, which had been organised by suffrage workers, was in charge of Miss Irwin, and included Mrs Kerr, Miss Blair, and Miss Prentice (three munition workers from large firms in Glasgow); Mrs Buchan, ex-president, and Mrs Hunter, ex-secretary of the Women's Co-operative Guild of Scotland. They were joined by Mrs Cameron Swan, superintendent of the high explosives department, Woolwich. The visit was arranged under the auspices of the French Ministry of Munitions, and had also the approval of the Ministry of Munitions for Britain. It extended over several days, and the party were personally convoyed to the various places of interest by officials of the French Ministry of Munitions.

The investigation was conducted from the general point of view of possibly increasing the British munitions output. Careful note was made of the number of women employed at the factories visited, the processes they were performing, and, in particular, methods of economising time, energy, and motor power, and thus increasing production.

The Scottish deputation took with them the proud consciousness that our own women workers here are doing their bit in munition factories, as elsewhere, faithfully and well. They have brought back this consciousness unimpaired, and in addition they feel strengthened for future effort by the knowledge that they form part of a great international army of women who are putting their very best into their work for the defence of their homes, their liberty, and their men at the front. It has been an additional inspiration, if such were needed at all, to our Scottish women workers to see the fervour with which their French sisters are also doing their share in the munition factories, and doing it so cheerfully. "Do you find your work tiring?" we asked sometimes as we went through the factories, and were always met with the response, "No, no, not at all," accompanied by a smile and an emphatic shake of the head. It was all "pour la patrie." In France, too, as in Scotland, employers and managers alike speak in the highest terms of the enthusiasm, reliability, and adaptability of their women workers. "Nous sommes très contents," was the reply made in every case by employers and managers to inquiries regarding the work of the women.

INTEREST IN CANTEEN SYSTEM.

Some of the new factories were splendidly equipped in respect not only to machinery and ventilation but in other provisions for the workers' comforts. One feature the French factories propose to copy from us very soon is the canteens. Managers were eager to hear about our arrangements, and we were delighted to give them the names and addresses of Glasgow ladies who have done such splendid work in this direction, and whom they are anxious to consult. The deputation were delighted by the great cordiality shown them on every hand, and the readiness with which information was placed at their disposal. In one factory the French workers had devised the pretty compliment of wearing small Union Jacks on the day of the deputation's visit. It seemed to be well understood in France that the present comradeship in arms was not a new bond but a revival of "the Auld Alliance" which had existed between France and Scotland since the seventeenth century. The deputation were much impressed by the extent to which labour-saving appliances had been adopted in French munition factories and the excellent organisation which prevailed. These two points were, in fact, the outstanding features of French munition factories.

INTERESTING INCIDENTS.

In addition to the visits paid to munition factories, certain other incidents met with during their visit will always remain vividly in the minds of the Scottish delegation. One was the National Military Review, held on the anniversary of the fall of the Bastille. Another was a visit paid to one of the devastated villages which in the early days of the war had suffered a brief occupation from the Germans. One of our official guides on this occasion was a distinguished historian and a professor of the Sorbonne. He had three boys at the front, and, like many other sons of France, he had given up his own post to do responsible work at the Ministry of Munitions. He had taken part in the work of re-establishing the fugitives in their own homes.

Paris is already busy with schemes of reconstruction. An interesting exhibition, to which Professor Geddes, of Edinburgh, has largely contributed, is now open in the Place de la Concorde, showing what may be described as "life-sized" models of houses, schools, and other edifices suitable for replacing those which have been so wantonly destroyed.

The concluding incident of the visit was a reception accorded to the delegates by M. Thomas, Minister of Munitions. Mature judgment and forcefulness might be regarded as the keynote of the munitions staff, of which M. Thomas is the centre. These men, one felt, had looked realities in the face, had counted the cost, and were going forward without either vainglorious boasting or expressed bitterness towards the enemy, but with a quiet determination to see things through.

The sustained fervour of the workers, the comradeship of all classes, the resolution of the great leaders of State, the ruined homes of the people, and the gallant bearing of the men from the front who had seen and faced the worst alike conveyed the eloquent message—"Carry on, carry on."

THE WOMEN OF FRANCE AND THE WAR.

REVISING UNJUST ESTIMATES.

By MARCEL PREVOST,
Of the French Academy.

"DAILY POST" AND "DAILY CHRONICLE" SPECIAL.

Before the coming of the Great War how often have I not deplored in silence the fact that England—a land in which I have often lived, a nation that I love and admire—should so little understand the women of France! The untiring propaganda of Germany had succeeded in making the English believe that the French people were a frivolous and pleasure-loving race without any national ideal, and quite ready to give up, for the sake of ease and amusement, all pretensions to a dominating influence in Europe. Those Englishmen, and there were many, who still felt some sympathy with us, even a sort of affection, would express it in the half-pitying tone in which one speaks of a man of genius who drinks, takes cocaine, or is otherwise going to the dogs.

To bring her English neighbours to revise this summary and unjust judgment France has already paid a heavy price in heroism, blood, and toil. The revision has been prompt and striking, and France is proud of her success. England has not hesitated to acknowledge she was wrong yesterday, and does not spare the expression of her clear-sighted admiration to-day.

ETHNICAL RESULTS.

You have at last, dear English people, looked at things with your own eyes, instead of through the deforming glasses fashioned for you across the Rhine. The sight of the abnegation, the tenacity, the courage, the spirit of self-sacrifice displayed by the soldiers of the Third Republic has conquered your hearts; and this fact is not the least of the ethnical results of the war which is going to modify all the races on earth.

For the future the English will understand the French; above all, the Frenchman under arms, the Frenchman at the front—next, and as a consequence, he will understand those who remain behind and, by means of a labour and an ingenuity which partake of the miraculous, manage to make good our previous want of preparedness.

But I cannot convince myself that the English as yet do real justice to the mothers, wives, and daughters of the soldiers they so cordially admire. The current prejudices against the Frenchwoman, prejudices which the Germans worked so strenuously to keep up—I wonder are they yet quite got rid of in England? I don't feel sure. I know, of course, that at least in war time you no longer condemn every Frenchwoman as a dressed-up doll, in short, wide skirts, tottering along on cloven hoofs, wearing a mad hat at a mad angle, thinking of nothing but smart clothes, restaurant teas, and music halls. But I cannot help thinking that the immense help given by the women of France to France at war is not yet altogether appreciated by you.

MOTHER LOVE.

If you want to understand in how great a proportion the Frenchwoman has contributed to the nation's self-sacrifice, I ask you to recall all that you have read, all that you yourselves have written, concerning the maternal passion which possessed the women of France during the long years of peace. Without exaggeration the Frenchwoman has more of the "mother" in her than have any of the other women of Europe. With fewer children as a rule, she concentrates on these a love which is more intense. The contrary of many other European women, she is a better mother than a wife. I don't say she is right in this, I simply state the fact. I need not remind you of the number of sons whom the women of France mourn to-day—an infinitely greater number than those lost to England. And still Death continues to take his toll, and the mothers of France foresee no end to their anguish. Yet ardent and exclusive as they are in their love for the of many other European women, she is a better mother than a wife. I don't say she is right in this, I simply state the fact. I need not remind you of the number of sons whom the women of France mourn to-day—an infinitely greater number than those lost to England. And still Death continues to take his toll, and the mothers of France foresee no end to their anguish. Yet ardent and exclusive as they are in their love for the son, never once have we heard them utter complaint or reproach for the frightful sacrifice asked of their flesh and blood.

The mothers of France, you may take it from me, could have crippled, had they wished it, and might even have broken down altogether, the national will to conquer. It is their stoicism which has rendered possible the long-drawn-out defence, and which will sustain it until the barbarians are overthrown. In this lies the powerful aid which the women of France contribute to the liberation of the modern world. No one can deny their especial merit in this, because their excess of "mother" feeling has been considered a fault. They have been reproached for it over and over again, above all in England, when French and British mothers were compared.

Those who before the war were the most devoted to dress and amusement, who appeared to think of nothing but bridge, tango-teas, and "first nights," flung themselves—the word is no whit too strong—into charitable work with the same enthusiasm which they showed yesterday for pleasure. All of these women—all, you understand—are among the best of our hospital nurses; I would even go so far as to say that these Society women are of all nurses the very best.

TAKING THE MAN'S PLACE.

To conclude, let us enter to the credit of the Frenchwoman her unremitting effort to replace, in the economic life of the nation, the men drained from it by the war. In our munition factories, just as in those of England, and perhaps even in a higher percentage, skilful feminine fingers bring us a much-prized help. I do not know whether in England, as in France, women have undertaken work needing manual strength. To-day in our foundries a great number of women swing the hammer and beat the iron. As for the peasant women, they simply stepped straight into the shoes of the husband, father, brother, called to arms. They plough, sow, reap, and gather in the vintage instead of the men. Thanks to them, France was able, after the first moments of stupor, to resume her daily task and carry on her industries. If the Germans imagine they have "bled us white," or have any chance of doing so, it is because they have not seen the Frenchwoman at work.

And now for a little story from my own province of Gascony, a mere trifle, yet with pathos in it, too. The last time I was there—I don't go often, as I am mobilised—I met the brave and good young wife of one of my peasant neighbours. I asked after her husband, who had been home on leave the previous week, and had now gone back to Hill 304, where the famous Gascony regiments have received much praise in General Petain's despatches.

"Well, Marie," said I, smiling, "you and he must have had a fine time together, eh?" She looked at me with a proud melancholy, in which love and vexation were curiously blended. "Ah, don't talk of it, Monsieur!" she answered. "The only time he cares for now is the time he gives to France!"

Could you add to these words the tone of voice in which they were uttered, I think you would have a suspicion of tears in your eyes, just as I had in mine.

Birmingham Post.
14.8.16.

French and English Women Munitioners.

I am told that French women munition workers are viewing with much interest the influx of English girls who, it is said, are, to the number of several thousands, to come to their assistance. The immediate occasion for this movement is understood to be the disinclination shown by unmarried women in France to engage in some of the processes involved in the manufacture of explosives, on the ground that it leads to a temporary discolouration of the skin. English girls, who have observed the same result, are apt to console themselves with the knowledge that they are earning more than ever previously. The presence of English side by side with French labour in the munition and other factories of North-West France already, however, has brought about an interchange of ideas which may have a far-reaching effect on the international industrial relations of the future.

Scotsman
19-12-16

THE FRENCH ARMY OF WOMEN WORKERS.—Professor Garnier, Paris, of the Lycée Henri IV. and the Ecole des Ponts et Chaussées, last night gave the first address of the winter course of the Franco-Scottish Society in Edinburgh. His subject was "The Work of French Women during the War." France, he said, had found her women prompt to answer the call to work. The energy and perseverance required during this gigantic struggle had far surpassed anything necessitated in former armed conflicts. The lecturer described the prominent part played by women in their new war-created occupations, where they filled places left vacant by men in nearly every walk of life—transport work, farming, management of shops, factory work, war industries, labour organisation, municipal work, administrative committees. He cited statistics supplied to him by the French Government Munitions Department of the number of women directly employed, which now exceeded 300,000, and referred to cases where large farms were wholly worked by women. There was an instance in Paris where a lady completed contracts for public works of 20 million francs, and now makes 3000 shells daily at her workshops. Before the war French women were not behind their foreign sisters in industrial, commercial, or intellectual work; but public opinion and legal recognition were slow to do them justice. The war and the splendid record they had achieved had forced the admiration of the public, and had already quickened the lagging step of the law, which hesitated at first to acknowledge the share which women could take in the work of the nation. Miss Lumsden, LL.D., occupied the chair, and urged that this country should not be behind France in discarding prejudice and enlisting all its available womanhood.

Daily Sketch.
1.1.1917

EIGHTPENNY LUNCHES.

French Government's Scheme for Feeding Women Workers.

From Our Special Correspondent.

PARIS, Sunday.—The French Government is taking charge of the feeding of its employees. The increasing price of food makes this very necessary.

Not satisfied with making provision for munition workers, the Government is now caring for the well-being of women workers in Ministries and other public offices. Arrangements have been made for clerks, typists and others employed in Government offices to obtain cheap meals. An hotel has undertaken to supply them with a simple lunch at 8d. per head.

At the office of the Ministry for Munitions a large number of women are employed. Since the beginning of this month they have been treated as soldiers. That is to say, they receive the same food as the troops: a plate of soup or a hors d'œuvre, meat, vegetables and dessert. They have no choice in meat. It is beef, always beef, cooked in different ways.

Daily Graphic. 2.7.1917 677/20

WOMAN-POWER.

THE EXAMPLE—AND THE DIFFERENCE—IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

BY CHRISTOBEL ELLIS.

What struck me the most on my return to England from Russia and the Balkans were the innumerable appeals for women workers, not only in the Press, but placarded about the streets. In no other country have I seen anything like it. In Russia, Serbia and Rumania everyone works in war-time as a matter of course, and the women know that their country requires their services. They do not wait to be asked to work and they do not wait to be canvassed. It is only just beginning to dawn upon us in England what it means for the men to be "fetched" and for the women to be "left" to carry on the work at home. A Serbian man can be exempted from taxation, but never from military service. In this country it is the opposite. When war breaks out in Serbia the men leave their farms and homesteads at a moment's notice. There is no quarrelling and bickering over tribunals and exemptions and classes and groups. As they go, the women automatically step into their places, pick up the tools, put their hands to the plough, and harness the oxen. The work goes on, and the industry of the country is maintained without a break, and, more than that, without a murmur. Serbia is essentially an agricultural country, more so really than any of the other Balkan States; so the work of the Serbian women affords us an interesting lesson when our own agriculture is being to some extent threatened by the shortage of labour.

Carrying-on as Usual.

I think I am right in saying that up to 1915, in spite of nearly four years of war, there was in Serbia hardly one acre less land cultivated than in 1911. Serbia was short of many things; even necessities (tea, sugar, matches, etc.) became almost worth their weight in gold; but the harvest of 1915 was above the average.

As far as I know, no one has ever asked the women of the Balkans to "release" the men. It is their natural instinct, for which one cannot find a better name than patriotism. It would seem to have been lost in this country through over-education, if we are compared with the semi-civilisation of Serbia. Perhaps if we broaden our ideas, and do not grudge learning a lesson from a small nation, it will revive.

The work of the women in Russia is perhaps less remarkable, as it is a far more enlightened country, and the standard of education is high. Here, again, in Russia, there is no need to appeal for workers. There may be, and I think there undoubtedly is, a lack of organisation; but the workers are there ready and eager for employment.

The Leisured Classes.

In the large towns in Russia the women are doing much the same as they are in England, only there is no outcry against the men going, and the necessity for general economy is more readily understood and is accepted as a matter of course. Probably no city in the world can boast of finer and more expensive shops than Moscow; but now, in war-time, the comparison between one of its world-famous arcades, where over 1,000 shops are found under one roof, and the shops in London, is startling. In London the shops are crowded beyond endurance, and at all times of the day young women are to be seen in hundreds, idly sauntering from counter to counter, discontentedly fingering the goods displayed, and complaining about the lack of novelties; whereas in Moscow the purchasers are few and far between: they hurry in and out during the luncheon hour, or while going to or from their work, to buy the few meagre necessaries of life. There is no lack of money in Russia, any more than there is here; but women of the class idling in England are working in other countries. The work of the women in Russian factories would fill many pages, and would not compare very favourably with the similar work done by Englishwomen; but it is the moneyed middle classes who have risen to the occasion (or shall we say to their responsibilities?) better in foreign countries than they have in England.

ITEM 677/21

677

FRENCH MUNITION WORKERS' SACRIFICES AND AIMS.

A Message to British Workers from the French Minister of Munitions,

M. ALBERT THOMAS,

Delivered at the British Ministry of Munitions,

October 6th, 1915.

Published by the

MUNITIONS PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE,
6, Whitehall Gardens, London, S.W.

NOTE.

M. Albert Thomas, the French Under Secretary for War, is a typical son of French Democracy, which has " found itself " during the present crisis. A sturdy, thick-set figure, he has all the French " élan " and go, coupled with that sound common-sense and cheerfulness which is characteristic of the class that is born without any silver spoon in its mouth.

M. Thomas is the son of a baker, and was born in 1878 at Champigny-sur-Marne. To a remarkably quick intelligence he joined unremitting application, so that he was able at school and the university to take the highest possible degrees. He won many prizes, some of which took the form of money, which enabled him to gratify his passion for travel. He visited Siberia, Smyrna, and Constantinople, and then took a course of lectures at the University of Berlin.

Returning to Paris, he joined the staff of L'Humanité under Jaurès, with whom he worked in full agreement and close friendship; Jaurès being the undisputed leader of the French Labour Party both in Parliament and in the country. Young Thomas was considered as one of the coming and most promising men of French Socialism. Afterwards he became editor-in-chief of the Revue Syndicaliste. In the meantime he had become a Member of the Municipal Council of Champigny and then Mayor of his native town. In 1910 he became Deputy to the French Chamber, and at once took a prominent position in the Socialist Party.

When the War broke out, M. Thomas joined the Army as Lieutenant in a territorial regiment, which had to protect Paris before and during the Battle of the Marne. As early as February, 1915, he was asked by the Minister of War to help him in organizing and inspecting War Industries, and since May, 1915, he has been Under Secretary for Munitions. The collaborateur of Jaurès, the opponent of the Three Years' Law, and the personal friend of Bernstein and the German Revisionists, he was chosen above all others as most competent to look after the supplies of those deadly engines of destruction upon which so much depends. And right well has he justified the confidence placed in him by his fellow countrymen.

The representatives of Labour who were present to meet M. Albert Thomas, on the occasion referred to in this pamphlet, included the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, M.P. (President of the Board of Education), who presided; Mr. W. Brace, M.P. (Under Secretary of State for Home Affairs); Mr. G. H. Roberts, M.P. (Lord Commissioner of the Treasury); Mr. G. N. Barnes, M.P., Mr. C. Duncan, M.P., the Members of the Munitions Labour Supply Committee, the National Labour Advisory Committee, Representatives of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, and of the General Federation of Trade Unions. Sir H. Llewellyn Smith, K.C.B. (Secretary of the Ministry of Munitions) was also present.

TRANSLATION OF A SPEECH DELIVERED BY M. ALBERT THOMAS, THE FRENCH MINISTER OF MUNITIONS, AT THE MINISTRY OF MUNITIONS, ON THE 6th OCTOBER, 1915.

GENTLEMEN,—In the course of the conversations which my British colleague, Mr. Lloyd George, and I have had with regard to our different supplies and the mutual assistance which we can give to each other, by the exchange of machinery or of materials, our thoughts have often turned to those who are assisting us in manufacturing and increasing day by day the production of munitions.

Mr. Lloyd George has often been invited by me to come to France and to speak to our French workers, and to see with what sympathy, with what enthusiasm, they welcome the efforts made for months in England to increase supplies. And he knows how, for my part, it would have been a real pleasure to me, had my knowledge of English permitted it, to address a crowd of British workers, and to speak to them, as a friend—open-heartedly—of our thoughts and of our hopes. But though I cannot address a big meeting, I have welcomed very heartily the invitation which he was good enough to extend to me to speak to you, authorised representatives of the great British Labour organisations engaged on War work.

Efforts of French Munition Workers.

Several days ago we had at our Ministry of Public Works in Paris Mr. Hodge and Mr. Roberts, who came to tell us of the efforts made by the British workmen to attain the maximum output of munitions. I now wish to tell you very plainly of the admirable efforts of our French workers. On the day of mobilization the workshops were almost completely deserted. All the strongest men, all those who were the muscle and brain of the workshops, were mobilized, and the greater number of the workshops were closed. The men had been mobilized, called to that military service which so many of them had been accustomed to criticise at our meetings and conferences. They had been mobilized, they the keenest of anti-militarists, the most active members of the International Labour Confederation. They had been mobilized, and were setting out to war with enthusiasm, in the knowledge that their country had been attacked. Those who would never have tolerated aggression against another country, who would never have consented to provoke a war, were ready to sacrifice their lives for the defence of their homes and country. They went to fight in that spirit, knowing as we all do that the provocation was unjustifiable, and that they must all give their blood, their life, for the defence of the nation.

Without Rest or Holiday.

But at the end of only a few weeks the enormous consumption of ammunition at the Battle of the Marne revealed the necessity of organising, in the midst of war, an industrial programme which surpassed everything which, until then, could have been imagined necessary for the needs of the country. That is how it came about that workers who had set out to fight on the battlefield were suddenly called back to the workshops and are now doing their share as soldiers in the industrial army. They came back in the same frame of mind, they came back with the knowledge that there in the shops lay their duty to the nation. They came back with the idea that in the shops also, as they put it, "they would continue to fight the Boches," and it is with this idea that they have used all their strength to increase the output of munitions. I have known some who died at their work. I have known of admirable foremen spending their days and a great part of the nights in reorganising the workshops which were disorganised by mobilization. I have known of men who remained constantly at their task, beyond the usual overtime, sacrificing their customary sleep. In all the workshops of France, from September to February, there were neither weekly rest days nor holidays. So long as the machinery was running the workers remained in the shops without rest or holiday. One day, however, they had to stop. Their efforts did not relax, but the machinery was tired, though the spirit of the workers was unbroken. And now, to take care of human strength, which has its limits, the men rest one day every fortnight or on Sunday mornings. They have then a moment's rest, a much needed respite.

Not a Single Strike in France.

Our workers were accustomed to meet in their Unions and to discuss and assert themselves in many matters. To-day they have one single aim. Need I tell you British trade unionists, whom I have so often admired —need I say that if in times of peace you brought about methodical organised strikes to obtain new advantages, we also had our strikes, and they were often sympathetic strikes, strikes on points of principle and amour propre? But since the War I affirm, with full knowledge, that there has not been a single strike in France, not even one of those little twenty-four hour strikes by means of which workpeople show their discontent. If here and there a disagreement arose it was sufficient to send to the place a Government representative or a friendly member of Parliament, or even one of the trade unionists who every day are sharing in the work for national defence; and a peaceful settlement was brought about at once.

We might have given orders; we could have introduced into the shops the military discipline which existed in principle; but that has not been found necessary or advisable, except in a few cases of quite insignificant character, where refractory workmen brought back from the front to the factory had to be threatened, as soldiers would be, with the practical joke of a night in the guard room. As Minister of Munitions I have received complaints from workers, who had said to me, " Such and such a foreman threatens to send us back to the front, but that is not a punishment; we will not permit him to speak of it as a punishment. We do our duty to the nation equally in the shops. If we are sent back to fight we shall accept the order as an honour." These are some features which illustrate the spirit of our French workers in munitions factories and workshops. All restrictions which they might have enforced, all Trade Union rules and customs which they could have insisted upon, especially in State factories, all were put aside.

Female Labour.

Some days ago, at St. Etienne, in a friendly meeting which I had with the members of the Union of State Workers, I spoke of the necessity of introducing female labour into the national factories. They reminded me of how for fifteen to twenty years they had resisted the introduction of women into the factories, and had even fought to prevent it. But now, with the guarantee which I gave them that for equal work there should be equal pay, to use the old Union claim, they consented to the entry of women into the St. Etienne workshops, and to-day several hundred women are already to be found employed there.

In these circumstances we do not, and cannot, forget the duty of the Government with regard to labour. I have written to my officers, to those who have control of works, that they must remember at all times that we are the guardians of the soldier-workers, and that, as in the case of the trade unionist concessions, it was their duty, with the authority of the State, to guard their interests and see that they were respected. Only a few days ago I had to make some manufacturers in the West of France observe agreements which they tried to break on account of the War.

Workers' Interests Safeguarded.

Also, I have ordered that there shall be exhibited in all factories a list of wages paid, in order that we may be assured that the wages of mobilized workers and of military workers are paid at the normal rates. I have also recommended that if hereafter the Unions are not able to meet as before, if Trade Union life can no longer remain the same, the military officers, some of them being Union men, should keep in daily touch with the local Trade Unions, and consult with them, whenever possible, on any questions connected with the organisation of the work.

That is why at the present moment—a thing hitherto unknown in France—a close co-operation between those who are representatives of discipline and authority and of those who were known as the defenders of the rights of the working classes has been closely established in a country which is profoundly convinced of the necessity of defending its soil and its threatened liberties. These two opposing elements are now united, and have been so in France for the last fourteen months. They are working harmoniously together in the organisation of national defence.

Such is the picture which I am anxious to place before you side by side with that shown to us in Paris by my friend, Mr. Roberts, M.P. He also has told you of the efforts made by the working classes of France since the beginning of the War. These efforts, these hopes, may surprise you. Are we really the same men who appeared in former days at the labour congresses as the most stubborn opponents of militarism, who protested against the heavy burden of the great regular armies, and were by no means reconciled to all the trying obligations imposed by universal military service, using both labour and political organisations for criticism and protest? Yes, we are the same men who to-day voluntarily impose upon ourselves all these burdens. We are conscious of what they mean, and know that in working for them we are working for what had been the constant end of our efforts before the war. The end is this, British workers, an end which we have always had in common in our workers' battles and in our trade unionist and socialist struggles, to secure better conditions for the working classes and greater liberty for the entire world. We seek to realise that universal peace for which we have been striving with such fervent hopes. Our end is a living humanity, freed from economic oppression, a liberty of thought assured to the human spirit in its progress to higher ideals. To this end our united efforts are to-day directed as in the past.

French Sacrifices for Humanity.

At the hour of mobilization the French working classes went forward with enthusiasm. Their thoughts were the same in every case—that they must fight with their whole energy in this War, which was to be the last of all wars. They must make the fullest sacrifices to gain liberty for the whole world, to win a happier life and a greater freedom for the proletariat of all countries. Such was the deepest thought of our workers as they set out in August of last year; it has remained in their hearts ever since. Recently a meeting took place in Paris of one of the sections of our Union. Amongst the workmen there was one who had grown discouraged and complained. He said that the War was long and painful, that grief and mourning were increasing around him, and that at all costs they must return to a policy of international agreement. While he was speaking there were signs of astonishment and protest. At the back of the hall in which the meeting was held was a soldier who was home on four days' leave, and, as a member of the Union, had come to the meeting with his wife and son, a youngster aged twelve. Hearing the complaints made by the man of little faith the soldier said: "Comrades, I am surprised to hear what is now being said. We who have been with the colours know all about the fatigue, the suffering and demoralisation of trench warfare, but we are to-day in the same mind as we were on the day of mobilization. I went to fight in order that my son here might never have to go to war. If I am to die, then I shall die, but I do not want him to see war. To avoid this, we will make every sacrifice—our liberty, our blood, our life." This man was prepared to sacrifice himself to obtain that which we all desire—mankind living at peace, and no longer menaced, as it has been for the last forty years, by German militarism, mankind at last able to realise its dream of emancipating the working classes and of liberating the whole world.

It is that emancipation, that high ideal, that we must reach. There must be but one thought in our minds—one only—to make every sacrifice, with the certainty that we are doing so in order to gain our ideal, which no evil power will henceforth be able to wrest from us.

LONDON:
PRINTED UNDER THE AUTHORITY OF HIS MAJESTY'S STATIONERY OFFICE
BY HARRISON AND SONS, 45-47, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.,
PRINTERS IN ORDINARY TO HIS MAJESTY.

M.P.C. 7. (B 4761) Wt. 34494—g 814 100M 11/15 H & S

Daily Express
30. III. 15

678/1

Nottingham Guardian
30. III. 15

WOMEN'S WORK IN WAR TIME.

ACTION TAKEN IN DERBY.

With the object of forming a local Women's Volunteer Reserve, a meeting was held in the Guild Hall, Derby, on Monday evening, when there was a very large attendance of ladies, and the enthusiasm shown augurs well for the success of the movement.

In opening the meeting, the Mayoress (Mrs. Joseph Hill), who presided, said the formation of a Women's Volunteer Reserve had found great favour throughout England, and they in Derby did not want to be left behind in this matter. Personally she felt that if a battalion was formed in this town it would be a good thing for the girls, for they would be taught discipline, and be less a source of anxiety to their mothers, who were anxious about their daughters walking up and down the streets. There would be room in the battalion for every section of women and girls in the town, and she took it that the large attendance that evening proved that they were already interested. She had received letters from a number of ladies who were willing to help, and also encouraging letters from people who were willing to act as instructors, and she hoped the movement would be successful. (Applause).

Mrs. Beatty (of London), who was attired in a smart khaki costume similar to that worn by members of the Women's Volunteer Reserve in London, then addressed the meeting upon the objects of the movement and the necessity for the formation of such bodies throughout the country. They were passing through such a terrible national crisis, she said, that there was no room for any decent man who could possibly get away to be in England now, and it was for the women to be ready to do something more than they had done already to assist their country and help the men to go and do their duty. She referred to the work which had already been done by the Women's Emergency Corps, and said the Women's Volunteer Reserve was organised very much in the same way as the men's, and they trained very much on the same lines. Women as a rule were not used to discipline, but she assured them that drilling would make a wonderful difference to them in many ways, especially in the matter of health, and they would find that the thin ones would fill out and the fat ones thin down by regular drilling and route marching. (Laughter). It was very necessary that every woman should know something about nursing and be able to render first-aid assistance, and it was up to the Women's Volunteer Reserve to have so as to be able to assist the nurses who were so nobly doing their duty. She spoke of the value of camp sanitation classes, of the importance of learning how to keep a camp healthy, of the pleasures of trench digging, the value of carpentry for training the eye and the hands, and added that women could also be most useful as signallers and telegraphists in case of emergency. As more and more men were being called up women would inevitably be required to fill their places, and they could best prepare themselves to do this by a proper course of training. The way the women could assist in case of invasion was clear, and there was no doubt that if they had had trained women in Belgium to keep order some of the ill-advised things that occurred in that country would not have happened. They wanted women trained to be useful in case of emergency, and by belonging to such a corps girls could work off their superfluous energy, and at the same time be taught self-respect, self-control, obedience to duty, and discipline. (Applause).

A NUMBER OF WOMEN TRAINED

Forms of the condition of enrolment were then handed round, and the Mayoress stated that those who did not fill them up that night could do so at their leisure, and forward them to her either by post or hand during the next few days. They hoped in a few days to have proper headquarters, and secretaries in assistance, and they already had an instructor and an honorary medical officer.

Questions having been invited, Miss Petty asked if recruits had to provide their own uniforms, and if so what was the cost.

Mrs. Beatty replied that this depended upon conditions, and when funds permitted allowances were made in exceptional cases. They did not find the provision of a uniform by the girls any hindrance to their joining. In some places the coat and skirt could be obtained for 23s. 6d. Answering another question, she explained how a company was formed, and said that officers would be chosen for and to handle a number of girls. The call upon the time of a member was two hours a week, but more if they could spare it.

THEIR ABILITY TO DRILL

Answering Miss Petty, Mrs. Beatty denied that she had advocated the training of women to take the place of actual soldiers, or that the movement inculcated the spirit of hate. That had never been in her mind, and she hoped she had not left that impression in any other mind. Shooting was practised as a recreation, and not to be used against other people. They did not want women going about doing silly things, but to know how to control themselves and other people (Applause).

Miss MacArthur, by invitation of the Mayoress, referred to the war service for women movement, and said they were forming a register at the Derby Labour Exchange of girls and women over 17 years of age who would come forward as willing subjects to do work to enable men to go into actual war work. Men would be required more and more to go to the front, and to provide munitions of war, and women would be required to take up and carry on the business of the nation. They wanted in Derby to show Lord Kitchener that they were loyal, and they wanted to register the names of all women who were prepared to give up part of their time to help in the work. While they might not be called up to do anything, she hoped they would show willingness to assist and do their best to make the register as large and representative as possible.

The Mayoress expressed the hope that the women of Derby would come forward and show their desire to help the country in the present great struggle, and that both the forms for the Volunteer Reserve and the War Service for Women would be extensively signed.

A number of forms were signed and handed in at the close of the meeting.

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

VOLUNTEER RESERVE FORMED AT DERBY.

The desire of the women of Derby to take a more active part in coping with the emergency created by the war was brought to fruition last evening in the formation of a battalion of the Women's Volunteer Reserve, which is a counterpart of the Home Guards. A meeting for the purpose, held at the Guildhall, was both largely attended and enthusiastic.

Wearing the khaki uniform of the London corps, Mrs. Beatty explained the objects and working of the Reserve, and laid stress on its utility not only to the individual member in improving her health and physique and bringing her under discipline, but also to the nation in providing an organised body capable of useful service in the event of invasion and in freeing men as far as possible for military duties.

The chair was occupied by the Mayoress (Mrs. J. Hill), who recognised in the movement a valuable means of promoting self-control and discipline, and of removing the anxiety which many women, especially those who were mothers, were feeling in regard to the girls who spent their leisure in the streets to their own detriment and the benefit of no one. There was room in it for girls of every class.

The services of drill instructors have already been obtained for the battalion, and it is hoped to secure headquarters in the centre of the town, with outlying centres for the different companies.

At the close of the meeting Miss MacArthur, of the Labour Exchange, was given the opportunity of inviting additions to the register of women willing to undertake war work, which register, she said, was at present of only small proportions.

North Mail.
30 III. 15.

WOMEN'S VOLUNTEER RESERVE.

Sir,—You published recently a letter from the organising secretary of the Women's Volunteer Reserve in London. I would have replied to that letter sooner than this had I not been out of town.

I am glad to have at last received a definite reply to my query as to whether it is the intention that members shall be employed abroad in the lines of communication; it is stated that there is no question of this happening as the W.V.R. was raised for service in England.

The secretary thinks that first-aid, nursing, sanitation, signalling, and despatch riding are well within a woman's scope. I agree, for instance, that nursing is, but it is only hindering the authorities if these nurses are not properly trained with a thorough whole time training. This has been pointed out several times in the leading medical journals. Signalling and despatch riding are not within a woman's scope, because they are carried out mainly on service in the field.

Why, may I ask, is rifle shooting practised? This cannot be put to any use well within a woman's scope.

I do not sneer at the uniform, but am sorry that there is no other form of workmanlike kit except on very much the same lines as the military uniform.

The Board of Trade have published a notice inviting all women who are prepared, if need be, to take employment of any kind—industrial, agricultural, clerical, etc.—to register their names as being so prepared. Here, then, is an opportunity for war service; whilst waiting for this service members could be trained in nursing and first aid, and then offer themselves individually. In this way there would be far more chance of their services being accepted than there ever will be if they wait for sanction from the War Office to the Women's Volunteer Reserve.—Yours, etc.,

WILFRID G. C. LAMBERT.

Newcastle, March 29, 1915.

Derby Telegraph
30/3. 15

WOMEN AND THE WAR.

VOLUNTEER RESERVE FORMED IN DERBY

Women between the ages of 18 and 50 who are willing to serve their country in the hour of need were invited to attend a public meeting held at the Guild Hall on Monday evening, with the object of forming a Women's Volunteer Reserve in Derby, and the response was so gratifying that the success of the movement is assured. The attendance was very large and representative, and consisted entirely of members of the fair sex (with the exception of two representatives of the Press) whilst considerable enthusiasm was evinced in the proceedings.

The Mayoress of Derby (Mrs. Joseph Hill) presided, and in opening the meeting said the formation of a Women's Volunteer Reserve had found great favour throughout England, and they in Derby felt that they did not want to be left behind in this matter. Personally she felt that if a battalion was formed in the town it would be a good thing for the girls. If these joined they would be taught discipline, and it would be a good thing for their mothers who were anxious about their daughters walking up and down the streets. Some of them seemed to spend all their leisure hours in the streets to their own detriment, and it was desirable that an effort should be made to get these to take an interest in the movement. There would be room in the battalion for every section of women and girls in the town, and she took it that the large attendance that evening proved that they were already interested. She had received letters from a number of ladies who were willing to help, and also encouraging letters from people who were willing to act as instructors, and she hoped the movement would be successful. (Applause.)

Mrs. Beatty (of London), who was attired in a smart khaki costume similar to that worn by members of the Women's Volunteer Reserve in London, then addressed the meeting upon the objects of the movement and the necessity for the formation of such bodies throughout the country. They were passing through such a terrible national crisis, she said, that there was no room for any decent man who could possibly get away to be in England now, and it was for the women to be ready to do something more than they had done already to assist their country and help the men to go and do their duty. She referred to the work which had already been done by the Women's Emergency Corps, and said the Women's Volunteer Reserve was organised very much in the same way as the men's, and they trained very much on the same lines. Women as a rule were not used to discipline, but she assured them that drilling would make a wonderful difference to them in many ways, especially in the matter of health, and they would find that the thin ones would fill out and the fat ones thin down by regular drilling and route marching. (Laughter.) It was very necessary that every woman should know something about nursing and be able to render first-aid assistance, and it was up to the Women's Volunteer Reserve to have a number of women trained so as to be able to assist the nurses who were so nobly doing their duty. She spoke of the value of camp sanitation classes, of the importance of learning how to keep a camp healthy, of the pleasures of trench digging, the value of carpentry for training the eye and the hands, and added that women could also be most useful as signallers and telegraphists in case of emergency. As more and more men were being called up, and those who had "slacked" so far would not be able to do so much longer, women would inevitably be required to fill their places, and they could best prepare themselves to do this by a proper course of training, remembering that if they could give up some of their time their duty. She spoke of the value of camp sanitation classes, of the importance of learning how to keep a camp healthy, of the pleasures of trench digging, the value of carpentry for training the eye and the hands, and added that women could also be most useful as signallers and telegraphists in case of emergency. As more and more men were being called up, and those who had "slacked" so far would not be able to do so much longer, women would inevitably be required to fill their places, and they could best prepare themselves to do this by a proper course of training, remembering that if they could give up some of their time to enable a man to assist his country they were doing their duty to their country. (Applause.) The way the women could assist in case of invasion was clear, and there was no doubt that if they had had trained women in Belgium to keep order some of the ill-advised things that occurred in that country would not have happened. They wanted women trained to be useful in case of emergency, such as a bombardment, and they felt that if men saw women banded together prepared to do their part, it would incite the men to do theirs. (Applause.) She ridiculed the suggestion that they had adopted a khaki costume in order to ape the men, and said they had chosen that colour because it was more serviceable than blue, and said that by belonging to such a corps girls could work off their superfluous energy, and at the same time be taught self-respect, self-control, obedience to duty, and discipline, adding that they must put the best of them in the corps to get the best out of it. (Applause.)

Forms of the conditions of enrolment were then handed round, and the Mayoress stated that those who did not fill them up that night could do so at their leisure, and forward them to her either by post or hand during the next few days. They hoped in a few days to have proper headquarters, and secretaries in assistance. They already had an instructor and an honorary medical officer, and so they were going on.

Questions having been invited, Miss Petty asked if recruits had to provide their own uniforms, and if so what was the cost.

Mrs. Beatty replied that this depended upon conditions, and where funds permitted allowances were made in exceptional cases. They did not find the provision of a uniform by the girls any hindrance to their joining. In some places the coat and skirt could be obtained for 23s. 6d. Answering another question, she explained how a company was formed, and said that officers would be chosen for their ability to drill and to handle a number of girls. The call upon the time of a member was two hours a week, but more if they could spare it.

Miss Petty: Are you careful to eliminate the war spirit from the movement?

Mrs. Beatty: What do you mean?

Miss Petty: You referred to the slackers. It is a difficult thing to get men to carry on the civilian life of the country, and that is quite as necessary as to get men to go out and kill their enemies. You spoke as though it were necessary to train women to take the place of actual soldiers, and if this movement inculcates the spirit of hate I am afraid I do not quite approve of it.

Mrs. Beatty: If I have given that impression my speech has utterly failed. That has never been in my mind, and I hope I have not left that impression in any other mind. We practise shooting as a recreation, and not to be used against other people. We don't want women going about doing silly things, but to know how to control themselves and other people. (Applause.)

At this stage Miss MacArthur, by invitation of the Mayoress, referred to the war service for women movement, and said they were forming a register at the Derby Labour Exchange of girls and women over 17 years of age who would come forward as willing subjects to do work to enable men to go into actual war work. Men would be required more and more to go to the front, and to provide munitions of war, and women would be required to take up and carry on the business of the nation. They wanted in Derby to show Lord Kitchener that they were loyal, and they wanted to register the names of all women who were prepared to give up part of their time to help in the work. While they might not be called up to do anything, she hoped they would show willingness to assist and do their best to make the register as large and representative as possible.

The Mayoress expressed the hope that the women of Derby would come forward and show their desire to help the country in the present great struggle, and that both the forms for the Volunteer Reserve and the War Service for Women would be extensively signed.

Forms were freely distributed, and a number signed and handed in at the close of the meeting.

The North Mail 31. V. 15

678/2 678

SKIRT AND SADDLE: NEWCASTLE WOMEN VOLUNTEERS IN TRAINING.

The khaki-uniformed members of the Newcastle Women's Volunteer Reserve made their first appearance in the city yesterday at riding exercise. The object of the ladies is to equip themselves to occupy posts which may release men for military duty, and one part of their preparations is to accustom themselves to riding and grooming horses. The side-saddle, it will be noted, has been vetoed, with the result that much more rapid progress in handling the horse has been made than is usually the case when ladies are the pupils. In the third picture is Mr Colin Forbes, the riding master.

The Birmingham Daily Post. 30/6/15

WOMEN AND FARM WORK

DEMANDS FROM ALL PARTS OF THE COUNTRY.

INFLUENTIAL MEETING IN BIRMINGHAM.

A largely attended meeting was held at the Birmingham Council House, yesterday, under the auspices of the Women's Volunteer Reserve and the National Political League, to consider the best method of organising women's help to meet the shortage of labour on the land. The Lady Mayoress (Mrs. Bowater) presided, and amongst those present were the Countess of Warwick, Lady Isobel Margesson, the Earl and Countess of Dartmouth, the Earl of Craven, Mrs. Hopkins (colonel of the Women's Reserve), Lady Cobham, Miss Farquharson, Miss Hamilton, and Captain Pierson Webber.

Letters of apology were received from the Duchess of Rutland, Lady Deerhurst, Lady Denman, Lady Hindlip, Lord and Lady Willoughby de Broke, Mrs. Joseph Chamberlain, Miss Beatrice Chamberlain, and the Earl and Countess of Plymouth. Lady Plymouth wrote that her husband thought it a very good suggestion that landlords and others who could should give facilities for students, so that when they were needed a number of women would be ready to take up the work, and he would do all he could to help in the matter. (Applause.)

The Board of Agriculture reporter for North-west Warwickshire wrote that he had not yet found acute shortage of labour, but it undoubtedly existed in many districts. He thought the greatest difficulty would be the temporary housing accommodation.

The Lady Mayoress said she was most anxious that this work should be taken up very heartily. because she was quite sure it was necessary. At this time we ought to cultivate every bit of land we had, so as not to depend too much upon goods from abroad; and besides, it was a good thing to keep our money in England as much as we could. She thought the two points they ought to get information upon that day was how women could be trained, and to get the farmers' wives, if possible, to take up the matter of housing them and looking after them. If they could only get the farmers' wives on their side they would do very good work.

The Training Difficulty.

Miss Broadhurst (London) said unless great centres like Birmingham took up this matter, and unless they could have throughout the country a strong public opinion, much of the work that could be done would not be done, and England would be the loser. Land in this country was now left without the necessary labour, and we were faced with an actual shortage of food as well as other conditions. There was therefore a call to those who could perform this work. It was a call in a very real sense to women, because although boys had been called out to do the work, boys were unskilled and irresponsible, and could not do much of the work that had to be done. Although many of the older men were left on the land, there were not sufficient of them. How could women meet this call? When the call came women found themselves in a great difficulty. Some of them saw there would be a difficulty, and urged authorities to train women and look forward, but they would not do so. Their organisation had been training women since the beginning of the war to face the difficulty, but nevertheless they were not in any sense meeting it fully. The difficulty was far greater than they had been able to cope with. They had now demands from every part of the country for women workers. There was much work that they could send women to, but there was a great deal of work to be done that women were not trained to do, and she thought they had better face that squarely. Three or four weeks' training would have enabled thousands of women to handle farm machinery, but they could not get that training, and consequently were now faced with an enormous difficulty.

According to a recent compilation, there were 200,000 fewer head of cattle in the country now than this time last year, and there was an even greater deficiency of pigs. In Ireland the number of milch cows was less by 40,000 and the number of sows by 11,000. The farmers had been selling their cattle and pigs because of the labour difficulty, and to some extent because of the temptation of the high prices they could get. Some people said there was no shortage, but girls were engaged as a rule the very same day they concluded their training. Conditions were going to be far worse in the future. How were they going to cope with the situation when, at the end of the harvest, more labourers went from the land? They were bound to have women, and skilled women, or they could difficulty would be the temporary housing accommodation.

The Lady Mayoress said she was most anxious that this work should be taken up very heartily, because she was quite sure it was necessary. At this time we ought to cultivate every bit of land we had, so as not to depend too much upon goods from abroad; and besides, it was a good thing to keep our money in England as much as we could. She thought the two points they ought to get information upon that day was how women could be trained, and to get the farmers' wives, if possible, to take up the matter of housing them and looking after them. If they could only get the farmers' wives on their side they would do very good work.

The Training Difficulty.

Miss Broadhurst (London) said unless great centres like Birmingham took up this matter, and unless they could have throughout the country a strong public opinion, much of the work that could be done would not be done, and England would be the loser. Land in this country was now left without the necessary labour, and we were faced with an actual shortage of food as well as other conditions. There was therefore a call to those who could perform this work. It was a call in a very real sense to women, because although boys had been called out to do the work, boys were unskilled and irresponsible, and could not do much of the work that had to be done. Although many of the older men were left on the land, there were not sufficient of them. How could women meet this call? When the call came women found themselves in a great difficulty. Some of them saw there would be a difficulty, and urged authorities to train women and look forward, but they would not do so. Their organisation had been training women since the beginning of the war to face the difficulty, but nevertheless they were not in any sense meeting it fully. The difficulty was far greater than they had been able to cope with. They had now demands from every part of the country for women workers. There was much work that they could send women to, but there was a great deal of work to be done that women were not trained to do, and she thought they had better face that squarely. Three or four weeks' training would have enabled thousands of women to handle farm machinery, but they could not get that training, and consequently were now faced with an enormous difficulty.

According to a recent compilation, there were 200,000 fewer head of cattle in the country now than this time last year, and there was an even greater deficiency of pigs. In Ireland the number of milch cows was less by 40,000 and the number of sows by 11,000. The farmers had been selling their cattle and pigs because of the labour difficulty, and to some extent because of the temptation of the high prices they could get. Some people said there was no shortage, but girls were engaged as a rule the very same day they concluded their training. Conditions were going to be far worse in the future. How were they going to cope with the situation when, at the end of the harvest, more labourers went from the land? They were bound to have women, and skilled women, or they could not take the place of these men. Girls and women who were suitable for the land ought to come forward, and she assured them they had a splendid future before them. (Applause.)

Short Training Discounted.

The Countess of Warwick expressed the opinion that three or four weeks' training would be of no use in getting women to handle farm machinery. Women could not go to farmers as skilled persons after four to six weeks' training; it was not possible. Real training would last for three years. She agreed that after three months' training a farmer would be able to teach women a great deal more; that was, if they had the groundwork and the love for the thing. She thought a love for the thing was a very important matter, but did not agree that a lot of unskilled labour was at all acceptable to farmers.

Lord Dartmouth said what they really wanted was training and education, and they must get rid of prejudices. They needed three things: getting the farmer to realise that his work would be well done; getting the man who went from the land to realise that if a woman took his place he was not going to be permanently ousted from his job; and getting a woman who took his place to realise that she was going to be treated fairly. (Applause.)

Miss Broadhurst, replying to the observations of the Countess of Warwick, said she had not meant to deprecate the value of training for farm work; but they were faced with an emergency, and in meeting that emergency had taken the only possible way.

The subject was discussed by the meeting generally, and one farmer expressed the opinion that the chief difficulty on the land now was the lack of that muscle and brawn necessary for the performance of heavy work.

Lady Isobel Margesson announced that the Lady Mayoress had formed a Land Council Centre for the Midlands, under her own chairmanship, and Mrs. Alfred Wiggin had consented to be the vice-chairman. The idea of the committee was that representatives of the districts around Birmingham should serve on it, and each do his or her best to advocate organisation in farming in those districts.

Farmers present at the meeting were invited to hand in their names if agreeable to take women for training on the land.

678/4

The Standard – 24. 8. 15.

WOMEN'S LEGION.

THE NEED FOR LEISURED VOLUNTEERS.

MANY FORMS OF WORK.

To the Editor of "The Standard."

Sir,—Just a year ago, when the war cloud had first descended on England and war work was in its infant days, the Women's Volunteer Reserve came into being. Mrs. Evelina Haverfield and Miss Decima Moore, realising the need for a quasi-military organisation, which would train and discipline women for all kinds of work, were the orginators of the scheme, and the object of the Reserve is now exactly what it was in August, 1914, "to provide a trained and disciplined body of women whose services can be offered to the State at any time."

From a small beginning the organisation has steadily increased its membership until there are more than 3000 recruits in England and 21 country branches. Nor has the Reserve confined its energies to England alone. Lady Inverclyde, of Castle Wemyss, has inaugurated a branch in Scotland, and already the recruits make an imposing number. In Vancouver and at Winnipeg flourishing centres are already formed, owing to the keenness and excellent work of Dr. Scarlett-Synge, Mrs. Haverfield's sister, and New York and Montreal are soon to follow suit.

During the past year several members have served abroad in various capacities; Mrs. Haverfield, Major Holme, and Dr. Scarlett-Synge are now in Serbia working in a hospital, while Second Lieutenant Miller, Miss Decima Moore herself, and a good many of the rank and file have assisted to run canteens in France. In the British Isles the work has been varied and useful, comprising canteens in London, Birmingham, Newcastle, and Glasgow (mainly run in munition centres), orderly work in various military hospitals, the driving of ambulances for the R.A.M.C. in Newcastle, the supply of tramcar drivers at Newcastle and Blackpool, the entire work of hospital gardens at Cheltenham, recruiting for the Army in almost every district where a branch is situated, helping to collect for the Red Cross National Penny Fund, and to work the National War Register.

On the departure of Mrs. Haverfield for Serbia Mrs. Charlesworth became colonel of the Reserve, and it is largely owing to her energy and capable management that so much success has been obtained. The offices and headquarters removed in July last to 15, York-place, Baker-street, and Lady Battersea has allowed us the use of the ball-room at Surrey House, Marble Arch, for drills and meetings.

UNIFORM AND SALUTES.

There has been a good deal of discussion in the papers lately with regard to women's uniforms and the question of saluting in the streets, and I should like to take this opportunity of making our position clear on this matter. The uniform is merely adopted because a serviceable dress of some kind which shall be the same for all is absolutely necessary in a large body of people, and the khaki colour was chosen as least likely to show dirt. The saluting question is easily disposed of, as none of the W.V.R. salutes Army officers in the streets, and would never do so unless ordered by the authorities.

The great need of the W.V.R. at the present time is for leisured women who can undertake canteen and orderly work, as so many of our girls are at business all day and can only give up their evenings.

In view of the fact that every day renders it more necessary for women to take the place of men at home, in order to release the men for service abroad, Lady Londonderry, who is the colonel-in-chief of the W.V.R., was most anxious to extend the scope of the organisation. At her request a general meeting of the corps was held at Londonderry House, and the result of this meeting led to the formation of the Women's Legion. It was felt that many people were able and willing to undertake various forms of work which could not be run on the same quasi-military lines—including regular drill—which forms an important part of the training of the Reserve. A constitution was drawn up and a Central Council appointed, which is responsible for the work of the whole organisation, with Lady Londonderry as president. Two honorary treasurers were elected, the Earl of Chesterfield and Mr. Frank Chaplin, of Robarts' Bank. Mrs. Charles Henderson is the acting treasurer.

WORK OF THE LEGION.

The work of the legion is divided into several sections. There is the original and parent body, the Women's Volunteer Reserve, which also carries on the canteen work, assisted by an auxiliary body of workers from the legion. These begin work at the end of this month at the London Docks with a motor kitchen, working under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. Munition Workers' Canteen Committee. Lady Askwith is in charge of the dock area of this committee. The commandant of the canteen section of the legion is Mrs. Charlesworth, and the chairman Mrs. Maguire. Ladies of the Y.M.C.A. Canteen Committee are also co-operating with Mrs. Maguire in this section.

Other sections comprise an ambulance section, a cookery section, and a general working section. The cookery section has undertaken to supply trained cooks where wanted to replace men, these women having all volunteered for war service, and in most cases having signed the register at the Board of Trade Labour Exchange. Some of these women are already working at the military convalescent homes, and are paid for their services.

In view of the wide scope of the work undertaken, it is obvious that expenses are becoming increasingly heavy, and any addition to the funds would be more than welcome. All particulars of the Women's Legion can be obtained at headquarters, or by writing direct to the president at Londonderry House, Park-lane.—I am, Sir, yours truly,

E. D. SMITHETT, Organising Secretary.

Headquarters, 15, York-place, Baker-street.

Wadey Times & Leader.

24. 8. 15.

WOMEN'S WAR-WORK.

Activities of the Volunteer Reserve and Legion.

"I did my share" is the motto of the Women's Volunteer Reserve and its offshoot, the Women's Legion, the headquarters of which are at 15, York-place, Baker-street, W. The Women's Volunteer Reserve, among their many activities, are managing a hospital in Serbia, and canteens in London, Birmingham, Newcastle, and Glasgow. They have undertaken orderly work in various military hospitals, the driving of ambulances for R.A.M.C. in Newcastle, the supply of tram drivers at Newcastle and Blackpool, and the entire work of hospital gardens at Cheltenham.

The Women's Legion assist the Volunteer Reserve in canteen work. Work will be begun at the end of this month at the London Docks with a motor kitchen, working under the auspices of the Y.M.C.A. Munition Workers' Canteen Committee. There are also an ambulance section, a cookery section, and a general working section. The cookery section has undertaken to supply trained cooks, where wanted, to replace men, these women having all volunteered for war service. Some are already working at the Military Convalescent Homes, and are paid for their services.

The great need of the W.V.R. at the present time is for leisured women who can undertake canteen and orderly work. In view of the wide scope of the duties undertaken it is obvious that expenses are becoming increasingly heavy, and any addition to the funds would be more than welcome.

The Picture World - 9. 12. 15.

BIRMINGHAM SHELL GIRLS HELPING THE NATION.

Two thousand girls have their dinner together in the huge dining hall of a munitions factory.

Shell girls in their khaki and blue overalls waiting for their meals.

The members of the Women's Volunteer Reserve give their services.

These pictures, taken during a dinner-hour, show Birmingham shell girls happy and healthy. The works' kitchens are models, and are managed and conducted voluntarily by ladies of each district. The workers can have meals cheaper at the works than at home.

The Weekly Dispatch 5/3/16.

67

THE PLACE OF WOMEN IN WAR.

Legion of Workers a National Necessity.

By the MARCHIONESS OF LONDONDERRY.

MODERN war, by dint of its modernism, is reverting to primitive conditions. It has already brought back the obsolete methods of attack and defence. On sea we have privateers as of old, and open cases of piracy are committed every day. On land we have the grenade, the dagger, and the helmet.

From our point of view, even more imoprtant, it is restoring those social conditions of the remote or barbaric past, when war called for every able-bodied man of the tribe or nation and none remained in village or city except the women and children in charge of the old men.

War to-day is not between professional armies; it is waged by the people themselves. More than that, it has come to be waged by the people irrespective of sex. The place of women in war has been revolutionised. Hers is no longer the lot of biding at home, waiting and weeping while the man fights; she has, as never before, an opportunity offered her to help them in a more tangible manner. It is not enough now that she should nurse, or sew; a hundred other spheres of national employment are opening for her every day. Women have to work at munitions, to fill the empty places in the offices, on the railways, 'busses, and trams, in the field; they have, in effect, to do man's work if they would not see the national machine stop running altogether.

The Marchioness of Londonderry.

HOW THEY MAY HELP.

When the war broke out, no one probably realised the extent to which the services of women would be necessary. None, outside a very few, thought that Britain would have to send five million men into the field. Yet, even in those early days, women were clamorous to be allowed to help. Lately things have altered; the cry now is to the women that they should help. What they asked for as a privilege fifteen months ago has now become an urgent national necessity.

I believe that, much as they deplore the reason of it, women are proud and glad that their help is wanted and that they can take an active part in the national scheme. Many are doing their share already, more are ready and willing to follow their example; but, and this the trouble, they do not quite know how to set about it. They are not sure in what direction their abilities point, nor where their help is needed, and even when these difficulties are solved they do not know to whom to apply for employment.

The Women's Legion, of which I am president, has been established to meet this difficulty. It exists solely to organise the energies of women. It is entirely non-political, and devoid of class distinctions or religious restrictions. Its object is to provide a capable and efficient body of women whose services can be offered to the State as required to take the place of men needed in the firing line or in other capacities. Women can join one or other of the four sections: 1. General. 2. Motor transport and ambulance. 3. Cookery and canteen. 4. Agricultural.

WORK IN SOLDIERS' HOMES.

The general section requires a little explanation. It was formed with the object of securing as members those women who have had no special technical training but who "want to do something," as well as those who can only give part of their time to the service of the country. Such women can help by providing food for canteens, by helping in the canteen an afternoon or two a week, and by working in the homes of soldiers, sailors, and munition workers.

In this latter direction I am now convinced there is a great work to be done, not only in the homes of the rank and file, but in those of officers as well. Many men have made great pecuniary sacrifices in order to fight; their wives are left badly off, servants have to be reduced or given up altogether. A little help in the housework will do much to relieve the strain on the housewife, overworked with unaccustomed toil. The wife of the soldier or sailor can add to her income by going out to work if she knows the children are being cared for, and thus the girl who minds them is helping her country. Without entering into detail regarding the other sections of the organisation, it may be pointed out that our object is not only to get work for women; we have it in our minds also to help the employer by sending to him women with some guarantee of fitness and qualifications for their work. It will not only lighten his task of selection of the most efficient. Time, money, and worry will be saved, and we can afford none of them.

AN EVER-WIDENING FIELD.

Our operations will be directed from London, but they will not be confined to London. Already we are working in other large centres, and new local branches are in course of formation. The prospects are encouraging; an ever-widening field of usefulness opens before us, and willing helpers are found to take their places in it. But there is room and to spare for more, and still more. Women who want to join one of our sections in order to find work to do, employers who want to find workers, all those who desire to help on the movement need only apply to the secretary at our headquarters, 72, Upper Berkeley-street, W.

It is, I suppose, impossible for anyone in these days to write on such a subject as this without concluding with an appeal for financial aid—in fact, begging. I beg those who want to work to become members. I invite those who have work to offer to give our members a chance. And lastly, I beg those who are in neither of these categories, but recognise the national necessities, to help us with money. But for the zeal of volunteer helpers we could not have gone so far as we have; to go further larger resources are necessary.

The Birmingham Post
27/2/15

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN IN WAR TIME.

CHURCH PARADE OF THE BIRMINGHAM VOLUNTEER RESERVE.

The existence of the Women's Volunteer Reserve has been fully justified. Though not actually on "war service," the members are in a variety of ways rendering valuable assistance in the prosecution of the war. Yesterday the Birmingham Reserve held a church parade. The women assembled at Curzon Hall, and, headed by the band of the 8th Warwickshire Regiment, marched to the Cathedral. Col. B. Hopkins was in command, and wore the order recently conferred upon her by the King of Serbia. Detachments were present from the districts surrounding the city.

The Bishop, in an address, said in the past a great many women had escaped from taking their full part in public life because the consensus of opinion was that it had no concern for them. One of the results of this terrible war was that in the future woman would take her proper part in public life, and it would not be possible for her t olead a comparatively useless existence. In a vague sort of way the world had recognised the position of women. If the powers of evil were to speak they would say, "Let us have the women and we shall bring the whole world to destruction." Women, it had been said, was either the best, the strongest, and the purest influence in the world, or she was the worst influence, and she had he rspecial power in that she was—though it seemed an absurd thing to say—the protecting influence, the strongest influence in the world. It was woman who strengthened spirituality. At critical moments in the world's history woman had, generally speaking, come forward either on the very best and most righteous side or on the lowest and most degrading side. Her influence had not always been duly recognised. Woman, as a sex, has been kept apart, though individually women had, of course, taken a strong and vigorous place in the world's history. It was said that woman's place was in the home; t was her kingdom, where she was to be supreme. Quite true. The higher the civilisation the more absolute in the home did the rule of the wife and the mother become, and the less did physical force become a determining factor. He hoped another result of this war would be that women who had homes would care more for those homes. One of the difficulties of to-day with regard to many women whose husbands were at the front was that they did not realise that upon them now rested the full responsibility of the home. He hoped the members of the Women's Volunteer Reserve would help to make such wome nunderstand that they ought to be father and mother. Woman was taking her place in the present crisis most admirably. She had sacrificed her best and given of her best in a variety of ways. She was now a more dignified person than hitherto; she was combining the qualities of Martha and Mary. He hoped the members of the reserve would be proud of their uniform, as it meant the women were working.

Glasgow Record
8/2/16

WOMEN IN GOVERNMENT OFFICES

Having occasion to visit the office of one of the leading insurance companies to-day, I was impressed by the elderly appearance of the clerical staff. Not a single one of the thirty or forty men in the office appeared to be of military age, and I learned that practically every enlistable member of the personnel has joined up, their places being filled by men above recruitable years.

Formerly a large number of girls and young women were employed to fill the vacancies, but these have been transferred to the offices administering the National Insurance Act. Here, I understand, female workers are now greatly in the majority, and another Government Department in which this is the rule is the Ministry of Munitions.

678
The Glasgow Record
7/2/16.

AN OFFICER'S ARMLET.

The Women's National Land Service Corps is forming an Officers' Training Corps of 5000 educated girls who are to be trained as captains and lieutenants. Our photograph shows the first khaki armlet worn by an officer of the Corps. (N.J. Co.)

The Glasgow Record
7/2/16

WOMEN VOLUNTEERS.

MEMBERS WANTED FOR THE GLASGOW RESERVE.

An earnest appeal is made for recruits for the Glasgow Branch of the Women's Volunteer Reserve, which now numbers about 300. This branch is already working in four canteens—in two of the largest shipbuilding firms in the city and in the free canteens opened for soldiers and sailors in the Central and Queen Street Stations.

They are also employed in connection with the Glasgow Corporation "Parcels Scheme," the Patriotic Food League, and various temporary forms of war work, but to make the work thoroughly efficient many more day-workers are wanted, as well as girls who are free for evening work only.

As soon as recruits can have uniform work is waiting for them, and it only remains for them to come forward.

The Rules of the Reserve are few and simple, discipline and obedience being the main essentials insisted on. The age limit is 18 to 50, and the only compulsory training is the weekly drill on the lines of the Infantry Drill Book.

Signalling, First Aid, Nursing, and other classes are held as occasion requires, and the uniform, which costs under £2, must be worn when on duty.

The Reserve already numbers nearly 6000 in the British Isles, and has branches in Vancouver and Canada. In London alone a huge amount of work is undertaken by the members, who voluntarily give up their leisure time to help their country in her hour of need.

We feel certain that the need for further help need only be known to receive a liberal response. Those who find it convenient to join the Reserve should communicate with the Hon. Mrs. MacGilchrist, 175 West George Street, Glasgow.

10/2/16

WAR WORK FOR WOMEN.

LADY LONDONDERRY'S APPEAL.

To the Editor of "The Standard."

Sir,—May I draw the attention of your readers to the work of the Women's Legion? This organisation, founded by me last year, and of which I am president, has already done much useful work in various parts of the country. It has lately been reconstituted in order to secure for its members a wider field of operation.

The object of the legion, which is entirely non-political and devoid of class distinctions or religious restrictions, is to provide a capable and efficient body of women whose services can be offered to the State as required to take the place of men needed in the firing line or in other capacities. Members have to pay an enrolment fee of 1s., and they receive a certificate of membership. A badge may also be obtained if desired at the price of 1s.

Women can join one or other of the four sections:—

1. General.
2. Motor transport and ambulance.
3. Cookery and canteen.
4. Agricultural.

In the first or general section are included those women who have had no special technical training, but who want to do something to help on the national machine. We also enrol in this section those who can only give part of their time to the service of the country. Such women can help by providing food for canteens, by helping in the canteens an afternoon or two a week, and by working in the homes of soldiers, sailors, and munition workers. In this latter direction I am convinced there is a great work to be done, not only in the homes of the rank and file, but in those of officers as well. Many men have made great pecuniary sacrifices in order to fight, their wives are left badly off, the servants have to be reduced or given up altogether; a little help in the housework, even taking the children out for a walk, will do much to relieve the strain of the overworked housewife.

Section 2 comprises motor drivers who are prepared to take up any class of motor transport work. In addition, to train suitable women in motor mechanism and driving. In this section there are also trained hospital workers.

In the canteen section we provide a paid staff of trained cooks to take charge of the catering, cookery, and management in huts or hostels, in munition works, or other places where regular meals are served to the workers. In addition we provide voluntary workers in canteens and buffets for supplying soldiers, sailors, and munition workers with meals and refreshments.

The military branch of the cookery section is responsible for providing trained cooks in the military convalescent camps, and has to furnish highly qualified women to instruct the soldier cooks either at the camps or in the various military schools of cookery.

In the agricultural section we enlist women to render assistance to farmers who are in want of labour, and we form committees of women in the counties to provide facilities for suitable women to be trained for dairy, poultry, and other agricultural work.

Our headquarters are in London, but already we are working in other large centres, and new local branches are in the course of formation. The prospects are encouraging, as ever-widening fields of usefulness are before us, and willing helpers are found to take their place in it, but there is room and to spare for more. Women who want to join one of our sections in order to find work to do, employers who want to find workers, all those who desire to help on the movement are invited to write to the secretary at our headquarters, 72, Upper Berkeley-street.

Those who desire to help us but cannot take an active part in our work are invited to become honorary members of the legion, and to assist us by donations to our funds.—Yours faithfully,

E. Londonderry.

72, Upper Berkeley-street.

Daily Express
18.3.16

WOMEN AND THEIR WORK.

CALL FOR 100 COOKS FOR HOSPITALS AND CAMPS.

The military cookery section of the Women's Legion, which provides cooks as required by the War Department for camps and convalescent hospitals, announce that they are immediately requiring at least a hundred cooks, and strong women and girls who wish to take up a most useful branch of war work will find that this offers an excellent opportunity.

The Government allowance is £20 a year, plus sixpence a week for laundry, and also rations and accommodation. Much experience of cooking is unnecessary, as the work is so simple that the women can very easily learn it within a week from the superintendents in charge of the camp kitchens. Strength and good health are, however, most important qualifications. The women selected will be taken on probation for one month, and if satisfactory they will be asked to sign on for one year or the duration of the war, should it end sooner. Third-class railway expenses incurred by the cooks on first joining the hospital or camp will be refunded to them.

On signing the agreement the women will be provided free of charge with the regulation uniform of the Women's Legion. All applications for these posts should be addressed to the hon. secretary, Women's Legion, Cookery Section, London Irish Headquarters, Duke of York's, Chelsea, S.W.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

The book entitled "Women's War Work," edited by Lady Randolph Churchill, which has just been published, is a wonderfully interesting record of the part which women of all nations have played, and are playing, in the great war. One reads with increasing admiration of the splendid work that women have accomplished, and no one can fail to realise that it marks an epoch in the history of womanhood. A new era has begun—an era in which women's abilities will be more fully recognised than ever before, and this record of heroic work stands as a lasting testimony to the courage and patient endurance of the women of to-day.

"Women's War Work" is published by C. Arthur Pearson, Limited, Henrietta-street, W.C., at 2s. 6d. net.

Glasgow Evening News
21-6-16.

"HAPPY DUSTWOMEN."

All our young ladies are not engaged tennising and golfing at nights. Reference has already been made to a patriotic band of the Women's Volunteer Reserve, who nightly assist the Cleansing Department in collecting waste paper—now recognised as a valuable material. Several weeks have now elapsed since these volunteers took up the role of "Happy Dustwomen," and the Department has voted results extremely good. The ladies work in the evenings from 6 till 9 p.m., and require no male assistance, not even for the horse, which must be pleasantly surprised at the strange, endearing terms used to jog it along on its journey! Copying the loyal example of the W.V.R., another local organisation known as the B.P. Girl Guides have taken up similar duty in a residential area a few miles from the city.

Mark Lane Express.
25-9-16

EAST SUSSEX.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETING.

A meeting of the Executive Committee of the East Sussex Farmers' Union was held at Lewes on Wednesday. Mr. E. J. Gorringe (Lewes Branch) presided, and there were also present Mr. W. Wood (Hassocks), vice chairman, Mr. J. M. Moubray (Lewes), Mr. J. E. Brand and Mr. A. Lemmon (Hailsham), Mr. A. Leggat (East Grinstead), Mr. W. Fry (Haywards Heath), Mr. F. E. Newnham (secretary), &c.

Women's Work on the Land.

A letter was read from the Women's Defence Relief Corps bringing to the notice of farmers the fact that they had many women ready for work on the land.

The Chairman remarked that if a few strong men could be sent on the land it would be a great advantage to agriculture. (Hear, hear.)

It was decided to leave members to apply for help if they wished.

Daily Express.
20.10.16.

WOMAN

The action of the British Censorship in ...nying to Mr. Hearst's pro-German International News Service, on account of its ...istortion of news, the use of all cable and ...ther facilities, has drawn from the manager of the International News Service in New York a reply in which the "facts" of the matter are set forth with the wholesale disregard for truth which is characteristic of this pro-German concern.

In a message to the equally mendacious Wolff Bureau in Berlin, he declares, according to the Wireless Press, that the International News Service has been denied the mails and cables "because it has not been willing to distort news."

"The action of the British Censor," he ... "is the greatest compliment that ...d be paid to the International News ...ice. The British censorship has been ...ews-suppressing institution and a news-...sifying institution from the beginning of ...e war. The British Government wants ...e American newspapers to print only such ...ews as will please and assist the British ...overnment. The British Government ...ants the American newspapers to print ...nly distorted news or lying news. The International News Service will not distort ...ews or falsify news to please the British ...overnment or anybody else."

THE REPLY.

In reply to this charge, the Press Bureau ...as issued the following account of the ...

that grocers must supply ... who purchase other goods ...
At present the housewif...
she must spend 5s. on oth...
she can obtain sugar:—

To the Editor of the "...

Sir,—Since the publica... in the "Daily Express" ... the Sugar Commission ... many letters on the sub...
impossible to answer the... correspondents ask for a...
me which I believe wo...
fairer distribution of su...

It is, of course, quite c...
there must be some restr... apportionment of such a...
sugar, but not to the ex...
purchaser to buy 5s. wort... ever 2lbs. of sugar are ...
of what the commission ...
may say, the retailer in ...
can force on his custo...
ticular brand of article... whatever price the trade ...

The Sugar Commissi... rule that groceries need ...
the equivalent in value ... chased.

Apart from enabling ... purchase her goods whe...
would make conditions ...
number of people who, ...
keepers, find it necessa...
casionally in a pound ...

ELISABETH

After Mrs. Hyatt-Wo... received by the "Daily ...

Daily Express.
2.10.16

678

678/11

THE WOMAN IN THE CAR.

PROBLEMS OF THE LADY CHAUFFEUR.

ROYAL FLYING CORPS' NEW AUXILIARIES.

By JANE RAMSAY-KERR.

A woman clad in official khaki, receiving Government pay for driving a Government car, and under military discipline, is the nearest approach to a female soldier that we can muster in England. Women have driven Government cars for the Ministry of Munitions for some considerable time, but the Army Service Corps have now twenty-two women chauffeurs and the Royal Flying Corps have ten.

These women have been provided by the transport section of that excellent organisation, the Women's Legion, and the ten who are now driving for the Royal Flying Corps have only been in harness for a little over a week. They have all been recruited from the "leisured classes," and their present mode of life presents a striking contrast to anything they have ever done before—a fact which enhances the value of their services from a sentimental point of view and entitles them to great praise.

There is something amusingly incongruous in the sight of a pretty young woman swathed in the voluminous folds of a Royal Flying Corps khaki overcoat, with the words "Royal Flying Corps" printed in white letters on the sleeve, sitting in a small waiting-room at Adastral House awaiting the signal that "A E 43"—the magic formula of the great car which is entrusted to her care—is required to take an officer to Brooklands or to some munition factory or other place of business.

LONG DAY'S WORK.

The routes to the different places are not easy to find, but the R.F.C. are anxious to assist their lady chauffeurs in every possible way, and there is no stigma attached to the chauffeur who has to ask the way to anywhere. There are night rides also to be negotiated, and piloting a heavy car through the Stygian gloom of London and suburban streets and across slippery tram lines needs some nerve, especially when the driver knows that she is transporting some of the brains of the Army in her car. The pace has to be good also, as time is valuable, and many of the R.F.C. officers have speed permits, so the khaki-clad girls must hustle along and not show any indecision or "funk" in their driving.

The day of a woman chauffeur in the Army is a long one. She must be at the garage by eight in the morning, ready to take out the car; may perhaps make a long journey, and then wait two or three hours in rain, cold, or sunshine, according to the vagaries of our mutable climate; meals may be at any time, and they are frequently of a very hasty nature, while the end of the day comes at no fixed hour, and often the car is not back at the garage till 10 or 10.30 in the evening, and the chauffeur, although of course she is not responsible for cleaning the engine or anything of that description, has to see that her petrol tank is left full, so that no valuable time is wasted in the morning.

The most agitating moments of the Government lady chauffeur are those which precede the inspection, which takes place once a week at 7.30 a.m. at the garage. Each chauffeur then stands by her car, with all appliances and implements of her work outspread, and they are checked. If anything is lost, or has been stolen, borrowed, or has vanished into space in the way small tools sometimes do in a large garage, the lady chauffeur has to make it good from her own pocket.

AWKWARD POINTS.

One is a trifle glad to learn that Government property is looked after with so keen an eye in at least one department of an authoritative description, and none of the "female soldiers" are anxious to spend any money in replacing lost tools, as the salary paid to them is not exactly princely, being 30s. a week.

...educated and cul-

has been stolen, borrowed, or [illegible] ished into space in the way small tools sometimes do in a large garage, the lady chauffeur has to make it good from her own pocket.

AWKWARD POINTS.

One is a trifle glad to learn that Government property is looked after with so keen an eye in at least one department of an authoritative description, and none of the "female soldiers" are anxious to spend any money in replacing lost tools, as the salary paid to them is not exactly princely, being 35s. a week,

The difficulties of educated and cultured women taking the place of a "Tommy" have been much commented upon, but these difficulties really exist more in the imagination of narrow-minded and prejudiced persons than anywhere else. "Who," say the critics, "will open the door of the car—the officer or his lady chauffeur? Who will start the engine—the chauffeur or the passenger? How awkward it will be!"

These problems, however, resolve themselves. The chauffeur jumps into her car with a polite "Good-morning!" such as she would proffer to any friend with whom she was going to enjoy a day's golf in peace times. Most of the cars are self-starters, but if the engine has to be "wound up," the officer finds no awkwardness in starting it for his chauffeur. Why should he? The only "feeling" which a man might have would be that he did not like keeping a woman waiting for several hours, but when the woman is in khaki and in an official position the man can hardly find there is any awkwardness or difficulty in the situation, and as so many of the places to be visited are munition works, there is nearly always a workers' canteen where the lady chauffeur can wait and refresh herself with that meal so dear to the heart of every woman—a cup of tea and a bun or a bit of cake.

DISCIPLINE.

There is, however, plenty of military discipline and plenty of hard work connected with driving a Government car, and no flighty young thing who imagines that being chauffeur to the R.F.C. means nice joy-rides with handsome officers enlivened by mild flirtations with a flavour of war work, is advised to apply for the job of an Army chauffeur. Hard work, long hours, and one half-day off a fortnight is the rule for lady chauffeurs.

They are being given a trial to see if they can successfully replace men, and the work which they are doing is responsible and serious business which has in the past been done by men. They have offered to serve their country, and they are doing it with a single-hearted and purposeful spirit which is worthy of unstinted admiration. Every one should take off his hat to the girls in khaki who are acting as chauffeurs, and should wish them the best of luck.

Glasgow Evening news
21-6-16

678

678/11

"HAPPY DUSTWOMEN."

All our young ladies are not engaged tennising and golfing at nights. Reference has already been made to a patriotic band of the Women's Volunteer Reserve, who nightly assist the Cleansing Department in collecting waste paper—now recognised as a valuable material. Several weeks have now elapsed since these volunteers took up the role of "Happy Dustwomen," and the Department has voted results extremely good. The ladies work in the evenings from 6 till 9 p.m., and require no male assistance, not even for the horse, which must be pleasantly surprised at the strange, endearing terms used to jog it along on its journey! Copying the loyal example of the W.V.R., another local organisation known as the B.P. Girl Guides have taken up similar duty in a residential area a few miles from the city.

Daily Express.
2.10.16

THE WOMAN IN THE CAR.

PROBLEMS OF THE LADY CHAUFFEUR.

ROYAL FLYING CORPS' NEW AUXILIARIES.

By JANE RAMSAY-KERR.

A woman clad in official khaki, receiving Government pay for driving a Government car, and under military discipline, is the nearest approach to a female soldier that we can muster in England. Women have driven Government cars for the Ministry of Munitions for some considerable time, but the Army Service Corps have now twenty-two women chauffeurs and the Royal Flying Corps have ten

These women have been provided by the transport section of that excellent organisation, the Women's Legion, and the ten who are now driving for the Royal Flying Corps have only been in harness for a little over a week. They have all been recruited from the "leisured classes," and their present mode of life presents a striking contrast to anything they have ever done before—a fact which enhances the value of their services from a sentimental point of view and entitles them to great praise.

There is something amusingly incongruous in the sight of a pretty young woman swathed in the voluminous folds of a Royal Flying Corps khaki overcoat, with the words "Royal Flying Corps" printed in white letters on the sleeve, sitting in a small waiting-room at Adastral House awaiting the signal that "A E 43"—the magic formula of the great car which is entrusted to her care—is required to take an officer to Brooklands or to some munition factory or other place of business.

Mark Lane Express.
25.9.16

EAST SUSSEX.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETING.

A meeting of the Executive Committee of the East Sussex Farmers' Union was held at Lewes on Wednesday. Mr. E. J. Gorringe (Lewes Branch) presided, and there were also present Mr. W. Wood (Hassocks), vice chairman, Mr. J. M. Moubray (Lewes), Mr. J. E. Brand and Mr. A. Lemmon (Hailsham), Mr. A. Leggat (East Grinstead), Mr. W. Fry (Haywards Heath), Mr. F. E. Newnham (secretary), &c.

Women's Work on the Land.

A letter was read from the Women's Defence Relief Corps bringing to the notice of farmers the fact that they had many women ready for work on the land.

The Chairman remarked that if a few strong men could be sent on the land it would be a great advantage to agriculture. (Hear, hear.)

It was decided to leave members to apply for help if they wished.

Daily Express.
20.10.16.

WOMEN AID THEIR WORK.

MORE FARM HANDS AND CAMP COOKS WANTED.

"The great object of the Women's Legion is to provide capable women for work which will release men who are needed for military service," said Lady Londonderry, president of the legion, at a meeting held yesterday afternoon to put before representatives of the Press the requirements and work of this splendid organisation.

In a brief outline of the work accomplished, Lady Londonderry told how the legion had trained and put into employment many hundreds of women for work on the farms, and was training more to be of use directly their services were needed. She described the excellent work of the motor section, which is sending out experienced women drivers to replace men for motor transport work under the military authorities, and stated that more than 2,000 women, also members of the legion, were now employed as military cooks at camps, hospitals, and messes all over the kingdom.

Mr. Walter Long, in paying tribute to the successful work that the Women's Legion has carried out, said that women were doing work now that experts had declared was impossible for them to do satisfactorily, and were doing it well, but that there was a great need for more of them to train for agricultural purposes, in view of the necessity for calling more men to the colours. He advised the use of temporary huts for women workers drafted to the farms from other districts, as at present the question of accommodation was a very difficult matter to solve.

Lord Crawford, President of the Board of Agriculture, urged the immense importance of keeping up the food supply of the nation, and stated that the greater the increase in home production, the greater the saving in money paid to other countries, on shipping and men's labour for porterage, etc. He said that the Women's Legion had the warm support of the Government, and he hoped they could increase the supply of motor tractors and mechanical devices for saving labour, such as the legion is now hiring out to the small farmers who cannot afford to buy them for themselves. The men now employed in important agricultural work will not be called up for a few months, but every effort should be made to ensure, he said, a future supply of women to take their places when they must leave in the early spring.

Lady Selborne, who is president of the agricultural section of the legion, said that in many cases she thought the farmers rather prided themselves on not employing women workers, and that when compelled to employ them at the last moment they were inclined to complain if their work was not as efficient as that of the men they had lost. She thought much could be done if the farmers would start employing women at once and let them learn the work gradually.

The legion is urgently in need of funds to pay for trainings for the women, to supply more motor tractors and labour-saving appliances, and for the erection of huts for temporary workers.

Lord Chaplin, who proposed the vote of thanks to Lord Crawford, said that where we used to feed twenty-five millions with our own produce, we now feed four millions and that the supply of home produce must be increased. He did not think there would be difficulty as far as the farmers were concerned as long as the Government would let them know exactly what was required of them.

Women are constantly required by the legion for agricultural work, canteen work, camp cooking, etc. Further information can be obtained from the secretary, Women's Legion, 72, Upper Berkeley-street, W.

SHIP CLEANING.

Apparently there is little that women cannot accomplish in the world of labour. Perhaps the most startling incident in connection with work taken up by women since the war is the overhauling of the dredger Richard Marsh in the Thames.

This dredger, which was sunk off Rainham about two years ago, has been raised, and the work of scraping, cleaning, boiler-scaling—in fact, all labour in connection with a general overhauling—is now being satisfactorily carried out by a staff of sixteen women and girls.

EXPERT ADVICE.

Free expert advice on all matters concerning women's employments, trainings, etc., can be obtained on writing to the Secretary, Women's Employment, "Daily Express," 23, St. Bride-street, E.C., enclosing stamped, addressed envelope.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

ANXIOUS TO IMPROVE HER COOKING (M. F. B.).—I think you are wise to consider the question of giving up your post as children's nurse, and I agree with you that your height (4ft. 8ins.) is a handicap in such work. You say you are good at cooking and would like to take it up professionally. It should be possible for you to work your way up in a private household under a good cook. In this way you would not have any expense. It is quite likely that this paragraph may attract the attention of some one who will be only too glad to help you. You might also write to Miss Massey, 10, Baker-street, W., who may know of such a vacancy.

WAR WORK FOR A DOMESTIC SERVANT (A. T., Nuneaton).—Please dispense with the idea that because you are in domestic service you are not helping your country. Domestic workers of all kinds are very much needed at the present time, and a skilled worker, whatever her branch of employment, is a national asset. You do not tell me what kind of domestic work you have been doing, but you say you would like to train as cook in a military camp or hospital. If, however, you have had no experience in cookery, I do not think you will find it easy to hear of this kind of post.

On the other hand, if you have a knowledge of cooking, it might be possible for you to obtain such employment, and in this case you should write to the secretary of the Women's Legion, Military Cookery Section, Duke of York's London Irish Headquarters, Chelsea, S.W. For hospital work you should apply to the special service department (V.A.D.) of the British Red Cross Society, Devonshire House, Piccadilly.

RECOGNISED MIDWIFERY TRAINING SCHOOL (L. H. O.).—You ask me to give you the name of a school of good standing where you can train as a midwife and gain a recognised certificate of efficiency. You could not do better than take the course of training at Queen Charlotte's Lying-In Hospital, Marylebone, N.W. Will you write to the secretary and ask him to give you a personal interview?

ADVICE AS TO CAREER FOR UNIVERSITY GIRL (L. D., Cambs.).—It would be more helpful if you would give me some idea of the plans you have in mind, and although you have sent me full particulars of the examinations you have passed you give me no indication of your tastes and the kind of things you like doing best. I shall be happy to advise you as far as I can if you will write again, giving me this information. In view of the fact that in future you will be absolutely dependent on yourself, I think you are wise to decide to take a recognised course of training now, rather than accept a temporary war time post.

The Daily Telegraph.
22.8.16

WOMEN'S WORK IN WAR TIME.

BREAKING DOWN PREJUDICE

We are now so accustomed to women doing man's work that it is difficult to realise that there was a time when it was looked upon with suspicion as an unwarrantable intrusion, and even regarded with contempt. Women were told, in language that had more of directness than politeness, that their place was in the home, and any disposition to activity outside the domestic sphere was somewhat resented. Even the shock of war did not bring down the walls of prejudice. War, women were told, was a man's business; they were enjoined, as before, to stay at home and keep the home fires burning. The only women who could be admitted to a small share of work on the fringe of the Great Adventure were those possessing full nursing qualifications. These alone could not be denied. Their privilege had been won by Florence Nightingale, and they were allowed to follow in the footsteps of the Lady of the Lamp.

With this exception, the exclusion of women from active war work remained for many months after the fateful Aug. 4, of 1914. Then, as it became necessary to reinforce the "contemptible little Army," whose obstinate resistance helped to foil the German plans of conquest, it was discovered that many things were wanted that could not be procured by writing out an order in the War Office, and it was conceded that women might usefully employ themselves in making socks, mufflers, and mittens. But they were told to do this at home. Anything so practical as setting up a small factory in each village for the purpose of turning out useful articles on a system would have been coldly disapproved. However, the women were not to be denied, and in many places useful work rooms were established. To show the value of communal rather than individual effort we may point to the splendid results of Queen Mary's Needlework Guild.

EXTENSION OF EMPLOYMENT.

As the war developed still further out of the expeditionary stage two circumstances arose to compel a change of view regarding women's part in the war. One was the shortage of trained men cooks to meet the demands of the rapidly growing Army; the other was the withdrawal of so many men with motoring experience from civil life. It became increasingly obvious that women's experience could be used in many respects with unquestionable advantage to the State. Women with high qualifications were set to work to train men cooks in the numbers required for the Army in the field and in training, while others were sent as cooks to the newly-formed large convalescent camps for soldiers. At the same time women motor drivers began to replace men in the private garage. When the first shock at this innovation had died down, business firms and shopkeepers began to think that, after all, it was possible that if women could drive a Limousine they could drive a tradesman's van.

It is curious to recall the days when the women commissionaire and lift-girl were regarded as daring innovations, meriting the attentions of the best descriptive writers and of the illustrated Press. From these partly useful, partly ornamental occupations we have advanced to the female omnibus and tramway-car conductors, the women ticket-collectors, and the women farm workers. In the meantime the State had taken a hint from the women's work-rooms that were springing up all over the country, and, finding that there was surely work that women could do in connection with munitions, opened the factories to them.

All along the line there has been prejudice to be overcome by the pioneers of each branch of women's labour; all along the line the prejudice has been broken down. In this pioneer work a foremost place must be given to the Women's Legion. This organisation, with Lady Londonderry at its head, has been the driving force of many useful movements.

THE WOMEN'S LEGION.

One writes of the objects of a society from habit. The Women's Legion has only one object—"To provide a capable and efficient body of women whose services can be offered to the State as may be required to take the place of men needed in the firing line or in other capacities." That is the object for which Lady Londonderry and her friends and workers

Daily Express 678.
20.9.16

678/1

Ten women chauffeurs have already been engaged for the Royal Flying Corps, and many more will be appointed if the experiment proves a success.

During the hearing of a case at Cardiff it transpired that the women at a local munition factory receive only 8s. a week after working eight hours a day.

Star.
20.9.16

FLYING WOMEN.

To release men for military duties, the Royal Flying Corps is now employing women as motor drivers, at 35s. a week and 5d. an hour overtime

Daily Mail
22-9-16

WOMEN CHAUFFEURS IN KHAKI

An experiment is being made at the headquarters of the Air Service, Adastral House, on the Embankment, by the employment of ten women motor-car drivers, with a view to economies in man-power.

These women began their duties on Saturday. They are enrolled in the Women's Legion. A khaki uniform is provided free. The rate of pay is 35s. a week and 5d. an hour overtime. If the women-drivers are efficient a number of soldier-drivers may be released for other work.

work a foremost place must be given to the Women's Legion. This organisation, with Lady Londonderry at its head, has been the driving force of many useful movements.

THE WOMEN'S LEGION.

One writes of the objects of a society from habit. The Women's Legion has only one object—"To provide a capable and efficient body of women whose services can be offered to the State as may be required to take the place of men needed in the firing line or in other capacities." That is the object for which Lady Londonderry and her friends and workers give their time and effort. Already much has been accomplished. The Legion has found the workers for canteens, from superintendents to washers-up and countermaids. It has found capable women cooks to replace men Army cooks, and—just as important—it has found women of high qualifications to train the men at camps and at military schools of cookery. The British Army has always been the best-fed army in the world, and there are now over a thousand Women's Legion cooks in its ranks who will help to carry on the same tradition. It expects to have double that number soon at work. The Legion has provided trained and experienced women to replace men as drivers of motor-cars of all descriptions. It has supplied a number of women drivers to the War Office for work in the London area, and a considerable number of women in training will also be employed by the War Office as soon as they are proficient.

The Legion has also supplied women for agricultural work, and is training many others who wish to help to gather the harvest and assist the farmer in his unprecedented difficulties. With this object in view the agricultural section of the Women's Legion purchased a 25 h.p. Mogul motor-tractor, which is now doing good work in Rutland. Several farmers have had their land ploughed and cultivated who would not otherwise have been able to do so this year on account of the shortage of labour. Many more of these tractors could be employed if the necessary funds were available. There is a long list of farmers who are all waiting eagerly for the hire of this machine, and it is one of the objects of the agricultural section to try to introduce some more of these machines into other districts.

WORKERS AND FUNDS WANTED.

Work and training for work—that is the mission of the Legion. It finds the work and the workers, and brings them together. It helps every willing woman to do what she feels she can do best. It supplies an outlet for boundless energy.

Workers and funds are urgently needed to extend the scope of the work, and all particulars of the aims and objects of the Women's Legion can be obtained by making application to the secretary, at the offices, 72, Upper Berkeley-street, W.

The Women's Legion has accomplished in one year what would have been thought before the war to be impossible. The value of its work has been recognised by the War Office, who are employing and paying some thousands of its members. The organisation is established. The initial difficulties have been overcome, and it only remains to consolidate and extend its efforts, so that no effort shall be spared which may lead to a decisive victory and a lasting peace.

Daily News & Leader.

29.9.16.

WOMEN COOKS FOR THE ARMY.

In view of the urgent need for women as Army cooks, the Marchioness of Londonderry appeals for women willing to train for this work. A school to train women for the military cookery section has been started at Dartford by the Women's Legion. The course of instruction lasts from three to four weeks, and there are vacancies for 30 pupils in each course. Free rations and quarters are provided at the camp, and when competent the women are drafted on, and receive pay at the rate of £20 per annum, with rations and accommodation. Over 1,200 cooks and waitresses have already been supplied by the Women's Legion. Applicants for training should write the Secretary, Pupils' Department, Women's Legion, Military Cooking Section, Room 4, Centre Block, Duke of York's Headquarters, Chelsea.

Daily Express
3.10.16

The Liverpool aeroplane factories are asking for women workers, who are offered 12s. a week during their seven or eight weeks' free training, and are then started at 22s. 6d. a week, with liberal increases for exceptional ability.

Weekly Dispatch.
8.10.16.

TRIBUTE TO WOMEN WAR WORKERS.

A HIGH tribute to women as war workers was paid yesterday by Major-General Sir Francis Lloyd, commanding the London District, who inspected at Wellington Barracks the National Motor Volunteer Squadron, composed of about 400 motor vehicles. A number of the cars were driven by women, all being under the command of Major-General D. C. F. Macintyre, C.B.

The drivers and mechanics, including two of the women, after the inspection were drawn up and addressed by Major-General Lloyd, who said he was greatly impressed by the completeness of the drill and discipline of the corps and its readiness to turn out for duty at a moment's notice. He particularly wished to say how much he appreciated the excellent services women were rendering in this branch of war work, for which they deserved to be thanked.

He would do everything in his power to see that the corps received full recognition at the hands of the authorities.

Daily News & Leader.
11.10.16.

Women between the ages of 18 and 45 who are willing to serve as Army cooks should apply to the Women's Legion, Military Cooking Section, Duke of York's Headquarters, London, S.W. Wages £20, with all found.

Daily Mail.
21.8.16.

6
678

WOMEN ARMY DRIVERS.

A GREAT SUCCESS.

After we have wrestled in the throes of war for two years, one of the nation's most valuable assets has been realised—the employment of women as motor-car drivers for home service.

In April last the Women's Legion, under Lady Londonderry, prevailed on the Army Council to give some of the many eager women drivers a month's trial.

It needs no great imagination to picture the apprehension with which a grudging consent was given and the subsequent astonishment at the unexpected success which attended the experiment. As a result of this effective probation the motor transport of the Women's Legion is now officially recognised by the War Office as a civilian subordinate branch of his Majesty's Army.

Already a great many women are now employed in various directions, driving cars for the War Office in munition areas and conveying the wounded.

A khaki uniform, including a small Army overcoat of exactly the same type as those already supplied to the men, with Army Service Corps badges, is to be issued, for which a special grant will be made by the War Office.

The rates of payment are:—

Superintendents, 52s. 6d. a week and travelling expenses; head drivers or squad leaders, 40s. a week and overtime for those returning to the garage after 6 o'clock; mechanic drivers, 35s. a week and overtime; probationer drivers, 25s. a week (35s. when actually driving).

* * * * *

One of the chief arguments and difficulties which have always been suggested as an impregnable barrier to the successful employment of women has been the possible antagonism of the men with whom the women are necessarily thrown into contact. That fallacy has now been permanently destroyed by the evident welcome which has been extended to the new-comers.

When I recently visited a garage where a squad of women are employed there was no suggestion of resentment whatever; in fact, the attitude of friendliness was most apparent.

War has established a wonderful bond of sympathy and understanding between the sexes, and in no sphere has it shown itself more strongly than in the Army garage yards where women have been drafted. They have been accepted and warmly welcomed as comrades and fellow-soldiers. The men understand the true feelings which prompt a woman to answer the roll-call at 8 o'clock every morning for seven days a week and cheerfully endure the long hours of work. They admire the courage and resolution with which she undertakes her duties and silently express their appreciation of her assistance by many a kindly action.

* * * * *

The section is under the command of Miss Christobel Ellis, who has done a great deal of excellent work for the Red Cross in Serbia and Russia and has driven a motor-transport wagon for some time on the British front in France and Flanders.

The Women's Legion are endeavouring to establish motor-driving as a new profession for women after the war, and, in addition to supplying drivers for the Army, are constantly sending out women as "chauffeuses" to private owners and to large stores and contractors as drivers of light commercial and delivery vans.

That the work appeals to many women is obvious from the long waiting list of the Women's Legion at their headquarters, 72, Upper Berkeley-street, W., for they have been inundated with offers of service from experienced women in all parts of the country.

The excellent work the women are doing and their efficiency as drivers, of which our streets bear witness, will undoubtedly create the demand that the supply warrants. The prejudice and lack of confidence which have been serious bars of opposition to the woman driver are fast diminishing, and daily more men are being relieved for more urgent needs and their places being taken by women. The motor-car with two men on the box is becoming a thing of the past, and it is curious to note that one woman is replacing the two men.

Time was when a woman at the wheel was a unique sight. To-day man must fight and woman must work. The example of the Army in replacing men with women in their motor-cars is a splendid one, and the women are worthy of the confidence given to them. T.

Daily Mail.
14.10.16

GREEN CROSS.

The first ambulance to reach the scene of two of the worst accidents in the first London Zeppelin raid was one belonging to the Women's Reserve Ambulance. In recognition of the excellent services rendered that night by this plucky little band of voluntary women workers the society has been officially attached to the D Division of the Metropolitan Police for Air Raid Defence.

In the event of an impending air raid they are called up for duty and held in readiness to act as transport for the Red Cross. Always they are on the alert waiting for the call. and when the call comes they are ready and prepared for the long hours of strenuous duty which is required of them. This is but one of the many instances of the very valuable assistance that the members of the Green Cross Society—so called from the green Maltese Cross which constitutes their distinguishing badge—are rendering to their country.

A MILITARY FIGURE.

SUB.-COMMANDER MRS. KILROY KENYON

A little over a year ago the society was founded on lines laid down by the Hon. Mrs. Haverfield, founder of the Women's Volunteer Movement and now the commandant-in-chief of the Green Cross, with the object of providing a trained, disciplined, and efficient body of women for use in hospitals, motor transport, orderly, or any other form of war work or national service that may be required. It has succeeded particularly in collecting and utilising the services of that vast body of women who, while prevented from giving the whole of their days to war service, are anxious to direct their spare time into a useful channel.

To-day over 400 members are engaged as night canteen workers, messengers, hospital orderlies; upon orderlies' work in soldiers' clubs and war-hospital supply depots; and as motor transport drivers and mechanics.

Some of them are able to give their whole time to the various kinds of work, others only a few hours a week, but the administration and organisation are so excellent, and the shifts of workers so carefully arranged, that every ounce of available energy is turned to account.

* * * * *

A few days ago I visited a soldiers' club accommodating nightly some 600 men of the overseas contingent, where a large shift of W.R.A. workers are kept busy from seven in the morning until eight at night washing dishes, serving meals, making beds, and, in fact, performing every one of the many duties, except scrubbing floors, necessary in such an establishment.

I watched them dispensing teas to the soldiers with the professional air of trained waitresses. Their serviceable khaki uniform—the attractiveness of which can be gathered from the photograph of Sub-Commander Mrs. Kilroy Kenyon—comprised soldier-coat and short skirt, and seemed particularly in keeping with their work among the men in khaki, who have learned to regard them as fellow-workers and not only show a keen appreciation of their efforts but display a very admirable respect for the uniform which makes them comrades in the ranks of the Great Army.

The adoption of this uniform has been the subject of much discussion and disapproval, yet the women all tell me that it has proved invaluable to them, inasmuch as it has enabled them to extend their services into places and spheres which otherwise would have been impossible to them.

The motor transport work of the corps is a very large and important branch of the society. They own six motor-cars and three ambulances and have the loan or services of about thirty more cars. An average mileage of over two thousand per week is accomplished driving wounded and conveying munitions for the Trench Warfare Committee, meeting leave-trains at night when omnibuses and trains have ceased to run, collecting limbless patients from the various railway centres and driving them to the Queen Mary Auxiliary Hospital, Roehampton House, three times a week, transporting wounded for "outings," and answering innumerable emergency calls from various hospitals every morning and night. The garage is run entirely by members of the society, who not only drive the cars but do all the running repairs and cleaning.

* * * * *

Northern Daily Journal. 67

28/10/16

678

THE DEMAND FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

Despite the number of women who have replaced men workers, there is a serious shortage of labour in every direction. The Minister of Munitions requires thousands of educated women in shell or aeroplane factories. Salaries begin at one pound or twenty five shillings per week during training, but in a few weeks much more can be earned. This Minister appeals not only to those educated women obliged to earn their living, but to those of independent means who desire to help their country in the hour of need. Philanthropic wealthy women, anxious to improve the conditions under which their working sisters live, can now gain personal experience of factory life. When peace comes, the industrial world will require reorganisation, and clever, earnest women of influence and leisure, who have responded to the call, will then be able to turn their knowledge to the best account.

THE MOTORISTS AND PLOUGHWOMEN OF THE LEGION.

The Women's Legion has received official recognition from the War Office, and from several other State Departments. The Army Council last April gave some of the women drivers a trial, and afterwards appointed them to the British Army, of which they now form a civilian branch for Motor Transport. These women drivers are as efficient as men in repairing, cleaning, and washing vehicles of every description. Their commandant, Miss Christobel Ellis, is a highly-skilled chauffeuse, and has worked as a driver in Belgium, Russia, Serbia, and France, as well as at the British front. The Board of Agriculture has also officially recognised the Legion which has over a thousand members working on the land in conjunction with the Country Farm Labour Committees. Miss Brocklebank, of the Executive Committee, advised the purchase of a motor tractor for ploughing. It was such a success that a friend of hers presented another to the Legion, and yet another has been promised, for thanks to the good work of the women and the motor plough, hundreds of acres of land have been brought into cultivation, and the prejudices of the farmers against female labour have been greatly overcome.

many instances of the very valuable assistance that the members of the Green Cross Society—so called from the green Maltese Cross which constitutes their distinguishing badge—are rendering to their country.

A little over a year ago the society was founded on lines laid down by the Hon. Mrs. Haverfield, founder of the Women's Volunteer Movement and now the commandant-in-chief of the Green Cross, with the object of providing a trained, disciplined, and efficient body of women for use in hospitals, motor transport, orderly, or any other form of war work or national service that may be required. It has succeeded particularly in collecting and utilising the services of that vast body of women who, while prevented from giving the whole of their days to war service, are anxious to direct their spare time into a useful channel.

To-day over 400 members are engaged as night canteen workers, messengers, hospital orderlies; upon orderlies' work in soldiers' clubs and war-hospital supply depots; and as motor transport drivers and mechanics.

Some of them are able to give their whole time to the various kinds of work, others only a few hours a week, but the administration and organisation are so excellent, and the shifts of workers so carefully arranged, that every ounce of available energy is turned to account.

* * * * *

A few days ago I visited a soldiers' club accommodating nightly some 600 men of the overseas contingent, where a large shift of W.R.A. workers are kept busy from seven in the morning until eight at night washing dishes, serving meals, making beds, and, in fact, performing every one of the many duties, except scrubbing floors, necessary in such an establishment.

I watched them dispensing teas to the soldiers with the professional air of trained waitresses. Their serviceable khaki uniform —the attractiveness of which can be gathered from the photograph of Sub-Commander Mrs. Kilroy Kenyon—comprised soldier-coat and short skirt, and seemed particularly in keeping with their work among the men in khaki, who have learned to regard them as fellow-workers and not only show a keen appreciation of their efforts but display a very admirable respect for the uniform which makes them comrades in the ranks of the Great Army.

The adoption of this uniform has been the subject of much discussion and disapproval, yet the women all tell me that it has proved invaluable to them, inasmuch as it has enabled them to extend their services into places and spheres which otherwise would have been impossible to them.

The motor transport work of the corps is a very large and important branch of the society. They own six motor-cars and three ambulances and have the loan or services of about thirty more cars. An average mileage of over two thousand per week is accomplished driving wounded and conveying munitions for the Trench Warfare Committee, meeting leave-trains at night when omnibuses and trains have ceased to run, collecting limbless patients from the various railway centres and driving them to the Queen Mary Auxiliary Hospital, Roehampton House, three times a week, transporting wounded for "outings," and answering innumerable emergency calls from various hospitals every morning and night. The garage is run entirely by members of the society, who not only drive the cars but do all the running repairs and cleaning.

* * * * *

There is no nonsense about the Green Cross women; they are out to work as earnestly as the men are out to fight and to win. The training they have imposed upon themselves is in every respect as stringent as that of the Army. They drill twice a week, and the discipline that marks them is martial to the backbone.

"Army discipline and strict control are essential to the successful organisation of a body of workers," the commandant, Mrs. Charles Beatty, told me on the occasion of a recent visit to their headquarters at 199, Piccadilly, W. "Every member of the W.R.A. is under strict orders, which she obeys implicitly. We do not ape the men," she continued as she rang a bell at her side, which was promptly answered by one of the staff of "privates"—who took her orders standing erect and at attention the while; with a "Yes, sir," and a salute she left to obey the command without question—"but endeavour to relieve them wherever possible for the business of fighting."

The admirable extent to which that object is achieved may be deduced from the splendid work they are doing.

G. IVY SANDERS.

women drivers are as efficient as men in repairing, cleaning, and washing vehicles of every description. Their commandant, Miss Christobel Ellis, is a highly-skilled chauffeuse, and has worked as a driver in Belgium, Russia, Serbia, and France, as well as at the British front. The Board of Agriculture has also officially recognised the Legion which has over a thousand members working on the land in conjunction with the Country Farm Labour Committees. Miss Brocklebank, of the Executive Committee, advised the purchase of a motor tractor for ploughing. It was such a success that a friend of hers presented another to the Legion, and yet another has been promised, for thanks to the good work of the women and the motor plough, hundreds of acres of land have been brought into cultivation, and the prejudices of the farmers against female labour have been greatly overcome.

Evening News.
20.10.16

"LAND" LADIES WANTED

Mr. Walter Long and Fitness for War Work.

"Anyone not fit for the lunatic asylum is fit for war work."

This remark was made by Mr. Walter Long at a meeting called by Lady Londonderry, President of the Women's Legion, to encourage women to take the places of men on the land.

Mr. Long swept all difficulties away, even to suggesting that women should take their homes with them, as accommodation was scarce in the country. He pointed to the example of the Belgian Colony at Earl's Court, who live in movable huts.

Lady Selborne appealed for money for the Women's Legion to buy machines to hire out to small farmers.

"Agricultural work is no more difficult for women," she said, "than making 6in. shells."

Lord Crawford gave the time limit for women to make up their minds.

"No farmer's man," he stated, "will be withdrawn before January 1, and no milkman before March 1."

"Herb-growing," said Lady Londonderry, "has been added to the activities of the Women's League. Two counties have already been organised and drying sheds are being erected."

The Motor Transport Section of the Women's Legion now supplies drivers for the Army Service Corps and the Royal Flying Corps. Nearly 2,000 cooks and waitresses for the Army are also supplied.

Daily News and Leader
22.11.16

WOMEN MAIL DRIVERS.

Hopeful Prospects of a Bold Experiment

Beginning with the eleven o'clock shift on Monday night next women chauffeurs, wearing the uniform of the Women's Volunteer Reserve, will for the first time drive the Royal Mail vans.

Yesterday "Colonel" Charlesworth was hard at work at the Women's Volunteer Reserve garage at South Kensington testing the women drivers she had trained. The male expert who watched the testing said the women did considerably better than many of the men—"at least they give their engines a chance."

"They will be paid 35s. a week," Mrs. Charlesworth said, "with a bonus of from 3s. to 12s. 6d. a month, according to the way they drive the car, their punctuality, dispatch, etc. There is work for many more women. The places of many of the three hundred men now at the garage are open to women if they can prove themselves proficient to do the work necessary."

Large numbers of women grooms are also wanted to replace men in Messrs. McNamara's stables, where there are 700 horses to be cared for. The wages of the grooms, who will be on Government work, are £1 10s. a week.

Daily Dispatch
24-12-16

WOMEN COOKS FOR THE ARMY.

"The War Office will Want All They Can Get."

Early in the New Year every available soldier cook and waiter will be removed from his present employment for service over-seas, and the demand for women to take their places must be met.

The salary for assistant cooks and waitresses is now £20 per annum, board, accommodation, and free uniform provided, and there is a likelihood of the salary being raised in the near future.

The military cookery section of the Women's Legion, of which the Marchioness of Londonderry is chairman, is anxious to enrol a large number of women as cooks and waitresses, and application can be made to the Secretary, Women's Legion Military Cookery Section, Room 4, Centre Block, Duke of York's Headquarters, Chelsea, London, S.W.

Over 2,000 women are serving as Army cooks now, and they have made good. They are more economical than men cooks and they are cleaner and more efficient.

Yorkshire Herald.
21.10.16

WOMEN'S WORK IN THE WAR.

The women of this country are playing an important and noble part in winning the war. Their moral influence in stimulating and sustaining our men at the front has been immense and incalculable. No more can estimate be put on the value of the voluntary work they have rendered to men on service in the provision of comforts and to wounded in acts of kindness and mindfulness innumerable. The thousands of cases where women have gone into munition works and where in ordinary civil employment they have taken the place of the former male workers have been a material factor not only in ensuring that the supply of war material should be adequate for the successful prosecution of the war, but also that the productive industries of the country should be maintained and our financial stability thus preserved. Such forms of service as these, it is cheering to know, are being expanded daily.

Much has been done in this way by the Women's Legion, the organisation of which the Marchioness of Londonderry is the able and energetic President. Started only a little over a year ago, under its auspices no fewer than 900 women have been employed in the Army Service Corps, the Royal Flying Corps and in hospitals; 2,000 have been trained as cooks and are now engaged in camps and depots in all parts of the country; many other have secured work in farming, gardening and ambulance service. By these means a good many men have been released for the fighting line and most material military service rendered. These facts mentioned by Lady Londonderry at the "At Home" held at the headquarters of the organisation, justified the observation of Mr. Walter Long how such work proved that though we had been unprepared for war because we were trying to lead a life of peace we had been able to turn ourselves into a highly organised and wonderfully productive nation.

But, notwithstanding all that has been done, there is yet a call for more and more service of the same sort. Especially is there such a demand for more women workers on the land. The prejudice against this form of employment for women has already been largely broken down by the success that they have proved and now more are needed to follow the example of the pioneers. This was forcibly urged by the Earl of Crawford, President of the Board of Agriculture, at the meeting referred to, as well as by Mr. Long. The former once again pointed out the urgency of increasing agricultural production. Every quarter of corn grown at home, as he put it, strengthens us against our enemies because it helps us to avoid spending money abroad and sending ships and men for it. For that reason the Government have been desirous of showing every possible consideration for farmers in retaining their men, none of whom will be withdrawn from arable farms before 1st January or dairy farms before 31st March. That will give a little breathing space for agriculture, but it is being insisted upon by the military authorities as absolutely essential that young men under 30 should be released for the Army from all industries except in very special circumstances, and hence the need for making sure that the greatest number possible of women shall be trained to take their share in the important production of food in order that when these young men are withdrawn we may still be able to keep

WOMEN MAIL DRIVERS.

Hopeful Prospects of a Bold Experiment

Beginning with the eleven o'clock shift on Monday night next women chauffeurs, wearing the uniform of the Women's Volunteer Reserve, will for the first time drive the Royal Mail vans.

Yesterday "Colonel" Charlesworth was hard at work at the Women's Volunteer Reserve garage at South Kensington testing the women drivers she had trained. The male expert who watched the testing said the women did considerably better than many of the men—"at least they give their engines a chance."

"They will be paid 35s. a week," Mrs. Charlesworth said, "with a bonus of from 3s. to 12s. 6d. a month, according to the way they drive the car, their punctuality, dispatch, etc. There is work for many more women. The places of many of the three hundred men now at the garage are open to women if they can prove themselves proficient to do the work necessary."

Large numbers of women grooms are also wanted to replace men in Messrs. McNamara's stables, where there are 700 horses to be cared for. The wages of the grooms, who will be on Government work, are £1 10s. a week.

Newcy Disp Tel
24-12-16

WOMEN COOKS FOR THE ARMY.

"The War Office will Want All They Can Get."

Early in the New Year every available soldier cook and waiter will be removed from his present employment for service over-seas, and the demand for women to take their places must be met.

The salary for assistant cooks and waitresses is now £20 per annum, board, accommodation, and free uniform provided, and there is a likelihood of the salary being raised in the near future.

The military cookery section of the Women's Legion, of which the Marchionese of Londonderry is chairman, is anxious to enrol a large number of women as cooks and waitresses, and application can be made to the Secretary, Women's Legion Military Cookery Section, Room 4, Centre Block, Duke of York's Headquarters, Chelsea, London, S.W.

Over 2,000 women are serving as Army cooks now, and they have made good. They are more economical than men cooks and they are cleaner and more efficient.

Fewer than 900 women have been employed in the Army Service Corps, the Royal Flying Corps and in hospitals; 2,000 have been trained as cooks and are now engaged in camps and depots in all parts of the country; many other have secured work in farming, gardening and ambulance service. By these means a good many men have been released for the fighting line and most material military service rendered. These facts mentioned by Lady Londonderry at the "At Home" held at the headquarters of the organisation, justified the observation of Mr. Walter Long how such work proved that though we had been unprepared for war because we were trying to lead a life of peace we had been able to turn ourselves into a highly organised and wonderfully productive nation.

But, notwithstanding all that has been done, there is yet a call for more and more service of the same sort. Especially is there such a demand for more women workers on the land. The prejudice against this form of employment for women has already been largely broken down by the success that they have proved and now more are needed to follow the example of the pioneers. This was forcibly urged by the Earl of Crawford, President of the Board of Agriculture, at the meeting referred to, as well as by Mr. Long. The former once again pointed out the urgency of increasing agricultural production. Every quarter of corn grown at home, as he put it, strengthens us against our enemies because it helps us to avoid spending money abroad and sending ships and men for it. For that reason the Government have been desirous of showing every possible consideration for farmers in retaining their men, none of whom will be withdrawn from arable farms before 1st January or dairy farms before 31st March. That will give a little breathing space for agriculture, but it is being insisted upon by the military authorities as absolutely essential that young men under 30 should be released for the Army from all industries except in very special circumstances, and hence the need for making sure that the greatest number possible of women shall be trained to take their share in the important production of food in order that when these young men are withdrawn we may still be able to face the future with confidence.

It is the case, as pointed out by the President of the Board of Agriculture, that we are now approaching the really critical months of the whole war. The need for men is indeed greater now than at any previous [illegible] [illegible] powers, which change [illegible] are turning in our favour [illegible] slackening, but rather the reverse. If we are to make good our gains and push back the enemy still further till he is finally beaten to his knees it is necessary at all times to have strong reserves upon which to draw. What Lord Crawford added was therefore also true that the war will not only be settled on the plains of Flanders and France, but will likewise be settled on the agricultural land of our own country, and it is accordingly the duty of all to make every possible provision for meeting the coming contingency.

Daily Express.
8/11/16

678/16

678

WOMEN AND THEIR WORK.

POSTS FOR 600 COOKS AND WAITRESSES.

The scheme inaugurated by the Women's Legion for supplying military camps and messes with women cooks and waitresses has proved so successful that the organisers constantly receive applications to staff various camps in all parts of the British Isles.

Practically all the suitable applicants who responded to a recent appeal for helpers with this useful war work are now in employment, and the secretary states that another 300 women cooks and 300 waitresses are urgently needed.

These women are employed as Government workers and receive a wage of £20 a year, also free board and lodging and sixpence weekly towards their laundry expenses. The selected applicants are required to serve for one month on probation, at the end of which time, if their work is satisfactory, they will be asked to sign an agreement to serve for one year or the duration of the war should it end sooner.

The women wear the regulation uniform of the Women's Legion, which is supplied free when the agreement is signed. The work is simple and is quickly learned under the direction of the superintendents in charge of the messes and camp kitchens, but good health and physique are necessary for those who wish to take up this kind of employment. The age limit is forty-five years, older women not being strong enough for the work required. It should be understood that the selected applicants may be sent to camps in any part of the country.

There is also a demand for girls who have completed their training in cookery at recognised polytechnics or training schools of cookery, and who hold first class diplomas in all training school subjects. If willing to serve one month's paid probation at the rate of £20 a year, these girls can be taken on and drafted into an Army camp kitchen to learn the work. At the end of the month, when they have become accustomed to Army methods and have proved suitable, they will immediately be promoted to posts as head cooks in other camps at the rate of £40 per annum, with free board and lodging and laundry allowance.

Applications for all posts as Army cooks, head cooks, or waitresses must be addressed to the Secretary, Women's Legion Military Cookery Section, Room 4, Centre Block, Duke of York's Headquarters, Chelsea, S.W.

EXPLOITS ON THE BATTLEFIELD.

That the fighting quality is not altogether lacking in the gentler sex and that women have played important rôles in warfare from the days of the Amazons to the present era are well known, but it is only the most erudite perhaps who have any idea as to who these women were and how and why they fought.

Mr. Francis Gribble gives a most interesting sketch of the doings of women warriors in ancient and modern history, in his last book, "Women in War," and it is a pity that space forbade him to enlarge on their exploits, as one lays down the book with a sense of unanswered questions lurking in the mind.

The conclusion drawn, however, is that women on the whole bring trouble rather than aid when they enter the battlefield, unless it be on some special mission of inspiration or mercy such as Joan of Arc's or Florence Nightingale's. There have been women who have held beleaguered castles and encouraged war-weary soldiers to victorious achievements, but too many great ladies have meddled and plotted and caused riots and insurrections with devastating results.

Queens have plunged whole nations into misery, and there are women who have fought for self-glorification—in Mlle. de Montpensier's case one might almost say for self-advertisement.

Many reasons have led women into combat, and most curious of all, perhaps, was a need for flannel petticoats, for which the women of Barcelona fought a fierce and vixenish battle a hundred years ago.

Russia has her women warriors, Great Britain adds a few names to the list. France provides the most, and, strangely enough, Germany not one, for, as the author says, "Germans have always been heavy-footed in their endeavours to confine even exceptional women to the domestic sphere of usefulness."

The last chapter, recounting the martyrdom of Nurse Edith Cavell, brings this volume of historical lives to our own days, and here in the twentieth century we have one of the finest women in war of all—the non-combatant, a victim of vile brutality, who to the end exercised her errand of mercy and laid down her life because she had saved others.

"Women in War." By Francis Gribble. (Sampson Low, Marston, and Co., Limited. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Star.
20/11/16

WOMEN COOKS FOR ARMY.

Hundreds Wanted to Release Men for Service.

Lady Londonderry, as chairman of the Military Cookery Section of the Women's Legion, is appealing through "The Star" for more women cooks and waitresses for the Army.

The experiment of employing women has been so successful that the Army authorities are making ever-increasing demands upon the Legion, and there is scarcely any limit to the number that could be enrolled.

"We have now found over 2,000 women for military depots, convalescent camps, and hospitals in different parts of England, Scotland, and Ireland," a lady at the Duke of York's Headquarters told a "Star" man, "still comes the cry for more.

Immediate Demands.

"Our immediate demands are for about 300 cooks and 300 waitresses, but the number we really require is indefinite.

"They should be between 18 and 45, and be prepared after a month's trial to sign on for twelve months, or for the duration of the war should it terminate sooner.

"The pay is £20 per annum and uniform—dark brown tweed dress, with light brown overalls and cap—and those who join have the satisfaction of very definitely helping on the war, for whenever they step in they allow soldier cooks and soldier waiters to step out for the front.

"Take, for instance, the Epsom Hospital, where there are 1,000 convalescents. There a lady superintendent, three head cooks, and 60 girls have been able to release that number of able-bodied fighting men.

Women Praised.

"The officers at the various camps and hospitals have been loud in their praise of women for their economy and cleanliness."

The women have nothing whatever to do with the canteens, and their work is confined to duties in the cookhouse and waiting at meals.

The hours in some cases, especially in summer time, have been rather long, but the work is pleasant and not very heavy. Butchers, of course, are retained to do the cutting up and heavy work.

It is interesting to know that domestic servants have hitherto taken a large share in this patriotic work, although many recruits have also came from the middle and upper classes.

The Star.
20/11/16

TO COOK FOR TOMMY ATKINS.

Women in training as Army cooks.

Cairo Press
15/11/16

678/17 678.

WOMEN AND THEIR WORK.

ANALYTICAL CHEMISTS IN FACTORIES.

By PROFESSOR J. O. ARNOLD.
(Professor of Metallurgy in Sheffield University.)

The war has brought about among other things a serious shortage in analytical chemists, and has, moreover, largely restricted the number of men being trained for analysts, especially in university laboratories.

For example, the War Office some little time ago requested the Chemical Department of Sheffield University to supply chemists for service abroad, but the department was unable to comply with this demand owing to many of its trained students having joined the colours.

More recently, owing to the urgent need of man-power at the front next spring, it became evident that there was danger that even the junior analysts in the numerous armament works at Sheffield might be called upon. To prepare for this emergency—which in many cases has become imminent—the Metallurgical Department of Sheffield University has instituted practical classes for rapidly training women assistant analysts, competent in a more or less mechanical manner to relieve the stress likely to be thrown in the near future upon the senior analysts and chemists of the steel works, and thus prevent any serious falling-off in the output of munitions.

Applications from young women for admission to the course already exceed 100. These, as required, will be trained in successive groups of about twenty-five for one month, to learn to carry out the estimation of the simpler and routine elements of steel—namely, carbon by colour, silicon, manganese, sulphur, phosphorus, and iron. Of course, such a very limited training cannot produce any approximation to a steel works chemist.

It is not generally realised that the chemistry of steel is almost infinitely complex, since over twenty elements may be involved in its constitution—namely, the simple and invariably present elements already mentioned, and possibly, in addition, the following also:—Aluminium, arsenic, chromium, cobalt, copper, hydrogen, molybdenum, nickel, nitrogen, oxygen, tantalum, niobium, titanium, tungsten, uranium, and vanadium.

Assuming a previous knowledge of inorganic chemistry, the university course necessary for training a graduate to deal analytically with the constitutional elements of the complicated solid generically known as steel, must last from three to six years according to the ability of the undergraduate.

Apart altogether from the present question of the rapid training of women to assist in making steel analyses to meet the emergency which has arisen, there seems to be no reason why women should not, for instance, take a degree or associateship in ferrous or non-ferrous metallurgy, and adopt the analytical chemistry of metals and ores as a profession. Indeed, many women are now employed analytically in junior positions, and on the whole the verdict concerning them has been favourable.

The laboratory work of women has been described to the writer by a chief chemist as "diligent, cleanly, and conscientious." But naturally, in common with men analysts, a woman would require much works' experience and post-graduate study before fully qualifying for the now fairly remunerative position of chief analyst in an industrial laboratory.

No Name given.

WOMEN TO DRIVE MAIL VANS.

The woman chauffeur has reached the height of her ambition—she is to be allowed at last to drive the royal mail vans. A start will be made in London next Monday, beginning with the eleven o'clock night shift, when six women drivers, wearing the uniform of the Women's Volunteer Reserve, will drive the one-ton lorries which convey the outgoing mails from the G.P.O. to the railway stations, where they will wait for the incoming mails.

These six are only the pioneers of a large number of women drivers wanted to drive the royal mail vans, in order to release as many as possible of the 300 men now employed by Messrs. McNamara, the Government contractors.

The women drivers will be paid 35s. a week, with a bonus of from 3s. to 12s. 6d. a month according to the way in which they drive their vans, their punctuality, and general ability.

Economist.
11/11/16

Women's Land Service.—Previous to the war there existed only one association, namely, the Women's Farm and Garden Union, which dealt with women's work on the land, and early in 1916, in view of the necessity for maintaining our home-grown food supplies, a grant was allowed by the Board of Agriculture to organise the training of women in farm work. The Women's National Land Service Corps, which has just issued its first report, was launched as a war offshoot of the society, to deal with the problem of emergency war work as opposed to permanent employment. Many prejudices on the part of farmers have had to be overcome, and as it is recognised that much harm may be done by sending out unsuitable women, the committee of the corps have taken considerable pains to prevent indiscriminate recruiting, and a point is even made of impressing on applicants the drawbacks of the work. There is an urgent need for more women to come forward to train for agricultural work, and the corps appeals for recruits to act as milkers, carters, &c. It arranges for six weeks' training at a cost of £1 per week, including maintenance, and applications are invited to the secretary at the headquarters of the corps, 50 Upper Baker street, N.W.

Burton Daily Mail.
Nov 15, 1916

THE WOM[illegible] ARMY.

A very interesting report just issu[illegible] the headquarters of the W[illegible] National Land Service Corps at 50, U[illegible] Baker Street, London, W., summarises t[illegible] results of eight months of most valuable work undertaken by the Corps and its directors up to September 30th, 1916. The organisation was first formed in February of this year, and its name and its operations have in the comparatively short interval achieved such wide repute and approval that it has already come to be regarded as a familiar national institution. The original aim of the foundation was to "speed up" the recruitment of all classes of women for work on the land, in response to the cry, which had become general throughout agricultural Britain, for female assistance to enable our greatest industry to meet the conflicting demands of the army for more fighting men and of the country for increased supplies of home-grown produce. The maintenance of the home-grown food supply was set before the first recruits of the Women's National Land Service Corps as a main object, and the question, without doubt, had already become serious. Herds of cows were being sold because of the difficulty of getting milkers; crops were unweeded or unharvested; the acreage of fallow increased, and the amount under corn decreased. The situation which confronted the organisers of the Women's Corps was not an easy one. It did not run on ordinary economic lines: "On the one hand," says the report, "farmers did not apply for the services of women, being sceptical as to their use, and this belief was unfortunately exaggerated in many districts by the unsuitable type of women sent out by various amateur agencies at the beginning of the war. On the other hand, village women did not offer their services in very large numbers, partly because they did not realise the necessity; while the financial inducement was absent owing to the lowness of the agricultural wage and the fact that many women were already better off with their separation allowances. The work was also in many places [illegible] stress likely to be thrown in the near future upon the senior analysts and chemists of the steel works, and thus prevent any serious falling-off in the output of munitions.

Applications from young women for admission to the course already exceed 100. These, as required, will be trained in successive groups of about twenty-five for one month, to learn to carry out the estimation of the simpler and routine elements of steel—namely, carbon by colour, silicon, manganese, sulphur, phosphorus, and iron. Of course, such a very limited training cannot produce any approximation to a steel works chemist.

It is not generally realised that the che-

Economist.

11/11/16

Women's Land Service.—Previous to the war there existed only one association, namely, the Women's Farm and Garden Union, which dealt with women's work on the land, and early in 1916, in view of the necessity for maintaining our home-grown food supplies, a grant was allowed by the Board of Agriculture to organise the training of women in farm work. The Women's National Land Service Corps, which has just issued its first report, was launched as a war offshoot of the society, to deal with the problem of emergency war work as opposed to permanent employment. Many prejudices on the part of farmers have had to be overcome, and as it is recognised that much harm may be done by sending out unsuitable women, the committee of the corps have taken considerable pains to prevent indiscriminate recruiting, and a point is even made of impressing on applicants the drawbacks of the work. There is an urgent need for more women to come forward to train for agricultural work, and the corps appeals for recruits to act as milkers, carters, &c. It arranges for six weeks' training at a cost of £1 per week, including maintenance, and applications are invited to the secretary at the headquarters of the corps, 50 Upper Baker street, N.W.

experience and post-graduate study before fully qualifying for the now fairly remunerative position of chief analyst in an industrial laboratory.

No Name given.

WOMEN TO DRIVE MAIL VANS.

The woman chauffeur has reached the height of her ambition—she is to be allowed at last to drive the royal mail vans. A start will be made in London next Monday, beginning with the eleven o'clock night shift, when six women drivers, wearing the uniform of the Women's Volunteer Reserve, will drive the one-ton lorries which convey the outgoing mails from the G.P.O. to the railway stations, where they will wait for the incoming mails.

These six are only the pioneers of a large number of women drivers wanted to drive the royal mail vans, in order to release as many as possible of the 300 men now employed by Messrs. McNamara, the Government contractors.

The women drivers will be paid 35s. a week, with a bonus of from 3s. to 12s. 6d. a month according to the way in which they drive their vans, their punctuality, and general ability.

Burton Daily Mail.

Nov 15, 1916

THE WOM[illegible] ARMY.

A very interesting report just issu[illegible] the headquarters of the W[illegible] National Land Service Corps at 50, U[illegible] Baker Street, London, W., summarises t[illegible] results of eight months of most valuable work undertaken by the Corps and its directors up to September 30th, 1916. The organisation was first formed in February of this year, and its name and its operations have in the comparatively short interval achieved such wide repute and approval that it has already come to be regarded as a familiar national institution. The original aim of the foundation was to "speed up" the recruitment of all classes of women for work on the land, in response to the cry, which had become general throughout agricultural Britain, for female assistance to enable our greatest industry to meet the conflicting demands of the army for more fighting men and of the country for increased supplies of home-grown produce. The maintenance of the home-grown food supply was set before the first recruits of the Women's National Land Service Corps as a main object, and the question, without doubt, had already become serious. Herds of cows were being sold because of the difficulty of getting milkers; crops were unweeded or unharvested; the acreage of fallow increased, and the amount under corn decreased. The situation which confronted the organisers of the Women's Corps was not an easy one. It did not run on ordinary economic lines: "On the one hand," says the report, "farmers did not apply for the services of women, being sceptical as to their use, and this belief was unfortunately exaggerated in many districts by the unsuitable type of women sent out by various amateur agencies at the beginning of the war. On the other hand, village women did not offer their services in very large numbers, partly because they did not realise the necessity; while the financial inducement was absent owing to the lowness of the agricultural wage and the fact that many women were already better off with their separation allowances. The work was also in many places considered derogatory." To read this review of the initial obstacles is to realise how vastly the outlook has been changed in the interval

WOMEN ALREADY IN THE ARMY.

THE BATTALION OF COOKS.

There are women who have been in the Army for eighteen months; they wear khaki; they are rationed; and they live in hutments with their unit.

They look upon it as "a good life." They are officered by women, and promotion is from the ranks. "Sergeant Fat" was a private until she showed particular aptitude in clarifying the enormous quantities of fat which have to be melted down in the cook-house.

The women's captain herself—Miss Thompson in private life—was head cook for many months. An old sergeant taught her her job, although she has a domestic science certificate. Cooking for the Army is a slightly different thing to a demonstration lesson to a dozen ladies.

One of the head cooks laughs now and says: "When I go home and start making a pudding I am afraid I shall be putting 75lb. of rice on to boil!"

Sixty-six women of the Women's Legion cook for 4,000 soldiers in this camp. Altogether there are now some 2,000 women Army cooks.

A DAY'S DINNER!

In one of three kitchens the following were the quantities for a day's dinner:—

600lb. stew
1,000lb. roast beef
300lb. beans
7½cwt. potatoes.
300lb. suet pudding
50lb. of sago
15 gallons of milk.

"I hate sheep!" said a head cook. She was thinking of the extra work involved in cutting mutton up. Beef is sliced by a machine after it is cooked. The men also have a grudge against sheep; they call them "Australian rabbits." They are each allowed 1lb. of meat, including gristle and bone, and sheep are rather bony.

But the women cooks have quite got the men out of "grousing." They like the women's cooking, and the attitude of the head cook is politely but firmly, "Take it or leave it." They generally take it—and come back for more. Over-rations are always served out if the mess-men want them.

It is a sight to see them arrive for the dinner at 12.30. The dining-rooms are quite a short distance from the cook-houses, but each man brings a large hot-water tin.

The men stand behind a long table which shuts them off from the rest of the cook-house. The Dining-room Sergeants are about to keep order, and the girls have to get 200 tins off and to re-fill many of them. They have been in the kitchen since 6.30, and are anxious to get finished up before their own dinner.

NO GRUMBLING.

It is no light task, this cooking for soldiers. A former cook-housekeeper who has only been a week at the work is a little taken aback with it. It is not exactly the kind of cooking to which she has been accustomed. Picking nets of potatoes out of steam boilers needs a little hardening of the fingers; tipping up a boiler holding many pounds of beans to strain them off is not done without knack.

Those boilers have to be cleaned as soon as they are emptied, for each cook is responsible for her own, and if she does not do it properly she knows she will earn the name of "Tank-tickler."

"Public opinion" is the all-prevailing influence in this camp. No one grumbles at the work, for everyone does the same. Besides, each woman is a soldier, and falls in with military discipline.

It is true that one girl wept at first at the magnitude of the task, but she soon got used to it. To a "general" domestic servant laying out 59lb of bacon was no small matter, and when she learned that even that was only a half-ration, it was enough to frighten her a little. Each girl has her own job One is head of the puddings. She is making puddings all day. Another does breakfast, and then gives a hand where she is wanted. And every week or so there is a "general post," so that no work shall become monotonous.

"DOING SOMETHING."

All kinds of women are in this unit. There are those with means of their own; there are those who have never done a day's work before; and there are workers of every sort. They put up with the heavy work because, as one girl expressed it, "I feel I'm doing something great"—she counts it great to serve the country.

And the domestic servants have never had such freedom before. They have developed a wonderful liking for country life. They wear boys' boots, hob-nailed, and they care so little for appearances that two head-cooks went to town in them one day. They found, however, that hob-nails did not grip pavements. One girl slid down the steps of the Strand Theatre, and the other landed in the street.

When they don't want to leave the camp they visit the Concert Hall in the evening. There is an entertainment every night. There are comedians among the soldiers, concert parties visit the camp, and they have their own kinema.

Cold weather is nothing to the women-soldiers. Colds they consider are due to carelessness.

LOOKING AHEAD.

Reveille means the same to them as it does to the soldiers, and at 6.30 a.m. they cheerfully tramp through the slush to the cook-house. They spend the day more or less in steam, for the cooking is all done by this means, but if they can stand the work, they can stand the steam. Very few girls give up. Their mess-room is comfortable, though a stranger might think it draughty, and they have cubicles in their sleeping huts. These they make as homely as possible. One girl has 100 photographs pinned up on the wall. The huts are inspected every day. They are what the Canadian soldiers they are with call "dandy" huts.

The girls know more Canadian slang than they care to confess. They find themselves talking of "poultice-wallopers"—the R.A.M.C. men—and "Daddy"—a long-legged man—and "Red"—one of tawny complexion.

There is a favourite cook-house with the men. Everything they want can be got in that kitchen. It is smaller than the others, and when supplies are short it is rationed first. And the head cook is very partial to her little cook-house. The men know it, and tell her that she needs to go for a "rest-cure" to the top kitchen, which is a trial to everybody.

What will happen when this woman's army is disbanded? What will these women do when the soldiers no longer need their cooking? Some of the women in this camp have already decided. They are going to Canada to cook for the men who will no longer be soldiers.

PEGGY SCOTT.

Daily Express 22.2.17

678/18

678

MOTOR DRIVERS AND MECHANICS WANTED.

The Commandant of the Motor Section of the Women's Legion, whose headquarters are at 72, Upper Berkeley-street, W., states that at the present time the Legion has a large number of vacancies for women motor drivers and technical storekeepers, also for women engineers and experienced vulcanisers. They are all Government posts, and the pay is about 32s. weekly, sometimes more, according to the work and experience required.

WOMEN'S WORK FOR THE NATION.

MANIFOLD ACTIVITIES OF THE W.V.R.

The Lord Mayor (Alderman A. D. Brooks) presided at the annual meeting of the Midlands Women's Volunteer Reserve, at Birmingham Council House, yesterday.

Colonel Mrs. Hopkins presented the annual report, which stated that the past year had been busy, though perhaps less voluntary and more paid work had been done. The record of work accomplished showed a wide field of operations, including canteen work, provision of guard daily at the Art Gallery, gauging for the Ministry of Munitions, investigation of farmers' and dairymen's appeals for exemption from military service, and allotments work. In addition, a motor ambulance purchased by the W.V.R. street collection of 1915 had been sent to France, and a smaller ambulance bought from the 1916 collection was now working in Birmingham with W.V.R. drivers. The mending for the 1st Southern General Hospital had been done every week, and during four months 2,500 garments were repaired and 1,000 treasure bags supplied to the hospital. Over 5,000 magazines and books had been collected, repaired, and distributed to soldiers abroad and in hospitals at home, and 10,000 books were distributed to various works. Camps and rest cottages had been run at Barnt Green, Hendsworth, Selly Oak, and Burwarton; farm work and fruit-picking carried out at Bidford; and workers, both paid and voluntary, had been found for recruiting offices, substitution offices, Admiralty offices, Ministry of Munitions, canteens, welfare work, shell inspection, Post Office, factories, farm work, motor driving, lorry driving for the G.W.R., and as Boy Scout masters and gate orderlies for V.A.D. hospitals. Details were also given in the report of the activities of branches throughout the Midlands, one interesting item being that the Walsall Branch, in addition to gardening, had taken up carpentering and made cots for infants out of banana crates. The report further stated that the corps was the first body in Birmingham to form itself into a War Savings Association, and since August had subscribed £1,770, with a membership of 520.

NATIONAL SERVICE ANTICIPATED.

The Lord Mayor, in moving the adoption of the report, said one of the most remarkable features of the national effort in connection with the war had been the noble part played by women, and he was deeply impressed by the value and the manifold character of the work carried on by the corps. They had, in fact, undertaken a wonderful system of substitution. They no doubt realised that the country would require the active services of as many men as could be found for equipping the army, and carrying on munition work, and therefore they encouraged women to take over work previously done by men. In that way women had rendered extremely useful service to their country and the Empire. They had really anticipated some time ago the National Service scheme. By their effort they had undoubtedly released for the army many men engaged in industrial life, and in other directions they had enabled both men and women to engage in the production of essentials. From that point of view one could not too strongly applaud the great and patriotic efforts which had been made by the members of the corps and by the women of England generally. There were soldiers whose duty it was to fight; there were industrial soldiers; and further there were soldiers of mercy and good works, and he thought the members of the corps fell distinctly into the last category. (Hear, hear.)

Mrs. Beale, seconding the adoption of the report, emphasised the beneficial effect the training the women were receiving would have on the life of the city in the future.

The report was adopted.

Colonel Sturges proposed the re-election of officers, and expressed appreciation of the great assistance given by members of the Corps at Curzon Hall.

The Bishop of Birmingham, in seconding, drew a comparison between the Englishwoman and her French and German sisters, and complimented the Englishwoman on the possession of initiative not found elsewhere. The Bishop also expressed the opinion that the work women were now doing would make men more and more desirous of showing acts of chivalry.

The resolution was adopted, and on the proposal of Captain Matheson, seconded by Captain Rathbone, a vote of thanks was accorded the Lord Mayor.

Manchester Guardian.
2.-10.-17.

Women Guards for Forage Camps.

I hear the War Office has invented a new occupation for women. It is asking for a thousand women to act as guards at the big forage camps throughout the country. They are not to be drawn from the ranks of the Women's Army, but are to form a separate body. The task of recruiting them has been entrusted to that well-drilled and disciplined company the Women's Volunteer Reserve, whose commandant, Mrs. Charlesworth, has organised them very efficiently.

I believe the idea is that the guards shall be recruited as far as possible from the districts in which they are to be stationed, that they will have a special uniform and presumably rather special powers. They will, at least, know exactly what to do if they discover suspicious persons trespassing within the camps or loitering near them. Their duties will be rather arduous, and their hours will therefore be short—two hours on duty and two hours off. There will be double guards at night, and the sentry will always be within sound of the reserve guard.

The life will be healthy enough, and no doubt plenty of women will volunteer for it, even with the prospect of spending a winter in the open. One more masculine tradition will perish. These women guards of forage camps will have no fear of rats or mice.

THE GIRL IN BLUE.

WOMEN'S ROYAL NAVAL SERVICE.

The Admiralty have approved of the employment of women on various duties on shore hitherto performed by naval ratings, and have decided to establish a Women's Royal Naval Service for this purpose. The members of this service will wear a distinctive uniform, and the service will be confined to women employed on definite duties directly connected with the Royal Navy. It is not intended for the present to include those serving in the Admiralty departments, or the Royal Dockyards, or other civil establishments under the Admiralty.

At the request of the Board, Dame Katharine Furse, G.B.E., has accepted the position of Director of the Women's Royal Naval Service, and will be responsible, under the Second Sea Lord, for its administration and organisation, including the control of the members when off duty and the care of their general welfare. A further announcement will be made shortly as to the mode of recruitment for the service, and as to the branches of it for which immediate entries are required, and no applications or inquiries should be made until this announcement has been issued.

Dame Katharine Furse, one of the first ladies to receive the new Order of the British Empire, was until recently Commandant-in-Chief of the Women's Voluntary Aid Detachment.

Nursing Mirror
2-3-18

678 E

Sport and General.

L.C.C. AMBULANCE WOMEN, WHO WORK IN AIR RAIDS.

The Standard
8/9/15

ANTI-CONSCRIPTION DECLARATION.

TRADE UNION CONGRESS.

UNANIMOUS VOTE AT BRISTOL.

EMPHATIC PROTEST.

The Trade Union Congress, representing about three million workers, unanimously passed a resolution at Bristol yesterday protesting against "the efforts of a section of the reactionary Press to foist conscription on the country," stating that conscription would always prove a burden to the workers and would divide the nation at a time when absolute unanimity was essential and expressing the opinion that no reliable evidence had been produced to show that the voluntary system was inadequate to meet the requirements of the Empire.

The first business at the resumed meeting of the Trade Union Congress at Bristol yesterday was the consideration of the anti-conscription resolution, which was proposed by the president (Mr. J. A. Seddon). The resolution was:—

"That the delegates of this congress, representing three million organised workers, record their hearty appreciation of the magnificent response made to the call for volunteers to fight against the tyranny of militarism. We emphatically protest against the sinister efforts of a section of the reactionary Press in formulating newspaper policies for party purposes and attempting to foist on their country conscription, which always proves a burden to the workers, and will divide the nation at a time when absolute unanimity is essential.

"No reliable evidence has been produced showing that the voluntary system of enlistment is not adequate to meet the Empire's requirements. We believe that all the men necessary will be obtained through the voluntary system, properly organised, and we heartily support and will give every aid to the Government in their present effort to secure the men necessary to prosecute the war to a successful issue."

Mr. Seddon said the motion contained four points—(1) appreciation of the response already made; (2) a protest against the machinations of a reactionary Press; (3) a complaint that the Government had been at fault in not taking the people into their confidence; and (4) an assurance that organised labour, if taken into the confidence of the Government, would rise to the height of a great occasion (cheers). They were face to face with a tremendous issue affecting the whole future of democracy.

So far as the Press was concerned they had had many policies from the coroneted creator of Carmelite House. They had had standard bread and sweet peas (laughter); they had had attempts to make and unmake Cabinets, and to create and uncreate the Commander-in-Chief of the British Army.

TO RUSH THE COUNTRY.

Now came a sinister and diabolical attempt to rush the country into conscription and to force the hands of the Government. It was time for democracy to say that no man, however powerful in the Press, should supplant free expression of opinion. The sacred rights of voluntaryism must not be invaded. No doubt mistakes had been made, but that was no reason for splitting the nation into two at a time when unity was the great essential. He pointed to the Oversea Dominions as proof that we have a priceless privilege in voluntary service. The Government had given no information as to the possibility of invasion, nor had it supplied statistics showing that the voluntary system had broken down.

Trade unionists did not ask for unwarranted confidence, but if the Government was prepared to fulfil its obligation it would find the workers prepared to do their share in this conflict.

Mr. T. Shaw (Weavers), in seconding the resolution, said he would as soon trust the Prussian junker as the junker behind this conscription agitation. As soon trust Bethmann-Hollweg as "Damn-the-consequences Milner" (laughter and cheers). The Government was utterly powerless without the miners, the railwaymen, and the transport workers. By bringing in a Conscription Bill Ministers would split the country, and might find their own career ended.

Mr. A. G. Walkden (Railway Clerks) said a certain Sunday newspaper seemed to do all the thinking for the Tory party. They wanted to change our military system, but they must not forget what happened when the railway strike occurred in France.

Mr. Dubery (Fawcett Association) invited the Congress to come down to the practical side of the question. Military policy in this country of organisation, not amongst the workers, but at the head of affairs, was largely to blame. What they wanted to know was what the lads who came home crippled were going to get from the Government (hear, hear). If the landowners and wealthy class, who thought their country would be taken from them, were as afraid of the workers as they were of the Germans coming to invade them they would have had better conditions to-day (cheers). He believed there were organised forces in the country who were able and willing to defeat conscription if it were to be forced upon them against their will (cheers). If they declared, as they would declare, against conscription, then it would be the duty of organised labour to prevent conscription from taking place (cheers).

The resolution was then put, and carried with great enthusiasm and with unanimity.

The result of the voting was received by the delegates rising and waving their papers and handkerchiefs. It was resolved to send copies of this resolution to the Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George, and Lord Kitchener.

NO PROFIT-MONGERING.

MR. LL. GEORGE'S MESSAGE TO THE CONGRESS.

The president then read the following telegram from Mr. Lloyd George, the Minister of Munitions, addressed to the president:—

"I observe in the report of your able speech the following words: 'The share of labour in meeting the danger is seen in the increasing output of munitions and the willingness of skilled trades to do all possible. We invite the Minister of Munitions to be equally keen in carrying out his promise to deal with war profits.' I have already under the Munitions Act placed 714 firms under control. That includes the bulk of important firms in this kingdom engaged wholly or mainly in manufacturing munitions of war. In every case the profits are limited in accordance with the terms of the Munitions Act, so that benefit of any suspension of trade union regulations shall accrue to the State and not to the employer. No profit-mongering is possible in these works. As your words, quite unintentionally I feel certain, might convey the impression that the Government has not carried out its part of the bargain with trade unions to limit profits, I beg you to make this clear to the congress, and to urge them to persuade the unions throughout the kingdom to carry out their part of the bargain by suspending during the period of war all regulations and practices which have the effect of restricting the output of material so urgently required for the protection of our gallant troops at the front and for the achievement of victory for the nation."

The reading of the message was received with some cheers.

Resolutions on the agenda were then discussed. One related to the organisation of domestic servants, and Mr. Ward (Erith) said that after 30 years' experience of trade unionism he had never tackled such material as domestic workers (laughter). He was speaking as a trade unionist organiser, and in no other sense.

The congress adopted a resolution dealing with agricultural land, which urged the Government to introduce a Bill to give effect to the compulsory cultivation of all agricultural land, and when and wherever practicable to acquire and retain land to be worked and controlled by the State.

The congress then adjourned until to-day.

WOMEN'S WAGES.

"BIGGEST TRADE UNION FIGHT YET TO COME."

In connection with the Trades Union Congress at Bristol, the annual conference of the Women's Trade Union League was held last night.

Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, the chairman of the league, presided, and amongst those who attended were Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P. (Minister of Education) and Mr. D. J. Shackleton (Government Insurance Commissioner). Miss Coddington, of Bristol, was presented with a badge in recognition of the work she had done for women workers of the city, and in response she remarked that the average wage of women workers in Bristol was only 9s. a week.

Miss Mary Macarthur presented the annual report, which stated that just after the outbreak of war the question of wages became critical, owing to the ill-considered action of the Board of Trade in calling upon women of all classes to register for "war service" without advising those who did so as to the rates of wages they ought to demand. Miss Macarthur added that it did not do to rely solely on Cabinet Ministers' promises, but the women must stir themselves and join trade unions if their lot was to be improved.

Mr. Clynes, M.P., in moving the adoption of the report, said it gave a record of accomplishment of which any organisation might be proud. It was an accomplishment achieved, too, under far greater difficulties than the ordinary trade unions had to overcome, for it was harder to combine women, to lead, inspire, and instruct them, than it was to lead, inspire, and instruct men. The problem of the competition of women in the near future would be more acute than it had been in the past.

Mr. Ben Turner (Batley), in seconding, said men had held women too cheaply. Women ought to have a minimum wage of £1 a week, and it was a crime against civilisation to pay them less.

Councillor Sennington (Bristol) urged that women's pay ought to be based on the work they agitation. As soon trust Bethmann-Hollweg as "Damn-the-consequences Milner" (laughter and cheers). The Government was utterly powerless without the miners, the railwaymen, and the transport workers. By bringing in a Conscription Bill Ministers would split the country, and might find their own career ended.

Mr. A. G. Walkden (Railway Clerks) said a certain Sunday newspaper seemed to do all the thinking for the Tory party. They wanted to change our military system, but they must not forget what happened when the railway strike occurred in France.

Mr. Dubery (Fawcett Association) invited the Congress to come down to the practical side of the question. Military policy in this country would have to be reconsidered after the war. The first necessity was an open foreign policy.

Mr. J. Stokes (Glass Blowers) said that had the advice given by himself and others at previous congresses been adopted, we should have had a larger voluntary Army than we now possessed. He was in favour of a citizen army, but he was utterly opposed to any form of a conscript army for England. He did not believe this was the last war. So long as capitalism prevailed there were enormous possibilities in the direction of international conflicts.

INSIDIOUS CAMPAIGN.

Mr. F. Bramley (Furnishing Trades) asked for a resolution in more definite terms.

Mr. J. R. Clynes, M.P. for North-East Manchester, protested against an insidious newspaper campaign, and said that should the Allies fail we should be a beaten and demoralised democracy.

Mr. Carmichael (Shop Assistants) was for letting the Cadburys and the Northcliffes fight out their own battles.

Mr. J. Hill (Boilermakers) said he had visited the soldiers at the Front, and found that the demand was for munitions. It would be for the Government to say whether they could better help the Allies by drawing more men from industry at home.

Mr. Ben Tillett declared the whole Labour movement was at the back of the Government. If he personally believed conscription was going to help us in the war he would vote for it straight away. What they had to consider in modern warfare was material.

Mr. Pilkington (Burnley) regarded the resolution as tame and unsatisfactory. From the way the resolution had been framed they might be good little Liberal boys (laughter). He was against conscription because there was no equality in it. If the working man went to the war his dependants were left without means, whereas those of the wealthy were well provided for. Again, if there was to be conscription there must be conscription of capital also (cheers). If conscription came about the people who now ruled in the industrial sense would also rule in the military sense (hear, hear).

Miss M. Talbot (Shop Assistants) was not in favour of conscription, but at the same time she was proud of the men who had gone.

Mr. Havelock Wilson said he supported the resolution against conscription because he did not believe there was any necessity for conscription in this country (cheers). He thought he could find a ready means of stopping this talk of conscription, and that would be to take about half a dozen of the most prominent newspaper proprietors and hang them up at a lamp-post (Mr. Will Thorne: "Get on with the job," and laughter). He did not think they would hear very much about conscription after that. Where was the talk about conscription except by those gentlemen who were making money in running their newspapers on sensational reports? (hear, hear). He did not find amongst the people any demand for conscription. He recalled that these newspapers were the same as recommended German methods, and said: "If we had German methods in this country we would know how to deal with the agitators." It was the German methods that they wanted to impose upon the workers (hear, hear). He did not agree with some of the remarks that had been made about the Government not having consulted them. He did not, in fact, know any time when Labour had been more consulted than during the progress of this war (hear, hear).

THE MINERS' VIEW.

Mr. Robert Smillie (president of the Miners' Federation) said he thought it would be a mistake if the conference passed the resolution without a statement as to where the miners stood (hear, hear). Personally, he would have preferred a resolution of pure and simple anti-conscription (hear, hear). He was strongly against a portion of the motion without being in favour of conscription. The miners had contributed to the war probably as large a proportion of their membership as any other class of workers in this country (hear, hear). He had heard it said that there had been a lack of munitions, and there had been an attempt to foist on to the shoulders of the workers of this country the blame for that kind of thing. He wanted to say it was the bungling at headquarters, and not the rank and file of the workers. The Home Office, the Board of Trade, and the War Office could not agree. The War Office would take the men, though the other Government departments knew that men taken from certain trades meant lowering the efficiency of the trades and seriously interfering with the production of munitions. In the mining industry more men had been taken away than enabled them to keep up the output, and that seriously affected the export trade. Wan which any organisation ought be proud. It was an accomplishment achieved, too, under far greater difficulties than the ordinary trade unions had to overcome, for it was harder to combine women, to lead, inspire, and instruct them, than it was to lead, inspire, and instruct men. The problem of the competition of women in the near future would be more acute than it had been in the past.

Mr. Ben Turner (Batley), in seconding, said men had held women too cheaply. Women ought to have a minimum wage of £1 a week, and it was a crime against civilisation to pay them less.

Councillor Sennington (Bristol) urged that women's pay ought to be based on the work they did, and not on the fact that they were women.

Miss Sloan (London) moved a resolution (which was carried) protesting against the low rate of remuneration still prevalent in many women's occupations, and urging upon the trade union movement the necessity of vigorously supporting the organisation of women.

Miss Sloan dealt on the ignorance and hopelessness of many of the girls employed in factories as to conditions of work. She said she was speaking to a girl in Bristol the other night about passing resolutions in favour of an advance of wages, and the girl asked: "How many resolutions do you have to pass before we get the rise?" (laughter).

Mr. D. J. Shackleton said he had had some little experience of the league in the position which he occupied, and he knew the work it had done. He wanted especially to appeal for finance for the movement, and added that the biggest battle of the trade union movement in regard to women was before them.

679/2

MISS EVA GORE-BOOTH ON THE DANGER OF CONSCRIPTION.

Miss Eva Gore-Booth writes to the "Manchester Guardian":—

Sir,—Some time ago Mr. Asquith promised that conscription should not be brought in without something like general consent. To those who mix with working people the present situation seems to have in it the elements of tragedy. Surely it is futile for those in authority to go on ignoring the fact that, whilst a large body of citizens think that their highest duty is towards their country and are willing to sacrifice not only their prosperity and their lives but their free will and right of private judgment to the needs of the moment and the decision of the Government, there is also a mass of people who, rightly or wrongly, put their duty to their own conscience (what they would probably call their duty to God) far above the claims of the State or the expediency of the moment, to whom to be forced to kill a fellow-creature (no matter for what cause) would be an inconceivable and unbearable outrage, and who would refuse at any cost to give up what is to them the most precious thing in life, the independence and integrity of their own souls.

Such a position may be scoffed at, but it is only fair to remember that we have all been brought up in absolute confidence that the right of freedom of conscience would never again be questioned in England. On the Continent anti-militarists have had ample warning of what would be expected of them; to escape conscription they have made their homes here or in America. We have seen the mischievous results of conscription in Germany, in the militarisation of the State and what Lord Haldane called the "abdication" of the anti-militarists, which means, of course, their emigration to a free country, and the reaction on the State of the fact that nobody can hold any of its offices who has not served in the army. If conscription is sprung on us here in the middle of a war, when men of military age are not allowed to leave the country, the results must be a far more crushing tyranny than that imposed by the Continental system. Men of extreme opinions who if they had been in Germany would have escaped by making their homes in a free country, would be faced by the alternative of either doing what they themselves think wrong or defying the law.

We all know from past experience which course English people are likely to take in such an emergency. Are we going to add to the misery of this awful war the bitterness, divisions, and hatred that must be the result of a campaign of force, persecutions, martyrdom, and revolt?—Yours, etc.,

EVA GORE-BOOTH.

Manchester and Salford Women's Trade and Labour Council, 5, John Dalton Street, Manchester, December 6th.

WOMEN CLERKS AND THE UNION.

At a meeting of the Sectional Organising Committee of the Lancashire and Ben Tillett Supports Liquor Interest.

Mr. Ben Tillett spoke at the Regent Theatre, Salford, to protest against the action of the Central Control Board as an "encroachment upon the personal liberties of the workers." Councillor J. M M'Lachlan presided.

Mr. F. Lowe (Painters' Society) moved and Mr. J. Gorman (Amalgamated Society of Engineers) seconded, the following resolution:—"That this meeting views with great alarm the action of the Central Control Board and its violation of constitutional government, and hereby strongly protests against the Star Chamber methods adopted by the Board. We also resent the libelling of our women-folk in charging them with excessive drinking. Further, this meeting pledges itself to resist by all legitimate means further encroachment upon the personal liberties of the workers."

Mr. Tillett, spoke in support of the resoultion said he had taken his present attitude because he knew that the Government, in using the Control Board, was not aiming at the "trade" itself, but at the liberties of the working classes and was creating a distinctive and repressive piece of class administration, with a view of getting more control, not merely over the liberty of the workers, but over their lives. He did not care if they fought the "trade," because the "trade" could and ought to be able to protect itself; but if, under the false cry—and it was indeed a false cry—that excessive drunkenness existed they attacked the workers, that was so unfair that one must resent it. If the working class were drunken, and if drunkenness was a crime, other classes must also be censured and have their liberty restricted. It was not fair that there should be, at this period of war, class distinctions; at such a time class distinction was not merely suicidal, but criminal. (Hear, hear.) The goody-goodies and the busybodies of the country had not interfered during the recruiting agitation as to whether a man should be a soldier whether he drank or not. They did not care who went to the trenches, and he asked why, therefore, they should have distinctions made by teetotallers and busybodies who were glad enough to skulk behind the dead bodies of our lads in France—(cheers, and a voice, "Some of them"),—or those who were making munitions of war. If they would take a gun in their hands the people would honour them. (Hear, hear.) The attitude of those persons was a direct insult to the working class. He was not saying that they had not among them women who were foolish enough to drink, but long before and since the war there had been a diminution of drunkenness. He had not yet met a single employer who had said that men were neglecting or refusing to do their work. If a man was incapacitated he did not want him forced; but, in these perilous times if a man refused to work because of laziness or "booze" he would have him shot.

At this point there was some little interruption, and the Chairman appealed for order.

Mr. Tillett, continuing, said he realised the gravity and importance of the position held by men like Mr. Asquith. He felt that he had a very terrible responsibility thrust upon him. He agreed

LORD ROSEBERY AND "JUDAS KISS" OF GERMANY

Lord Rosebery, in opening a club for men of the oversea forces in Edinburgh on Saturday, said there have been two great surprises in this gigantic war. One surprise has been for ourselves and the other for the enemy. The surprise for ourselves was this—that we could not conceive it possible that a great civilised country which believed itself to stand at the head of the culture of the world, which had achieved a prosperity beyond all human dreams, swelling in 40 years from 40 millions of population to nearly 70, which had made a commerce unexampled in the history of the world, having potent armies and potent fleets for its defence,—we could not believe it possible that this nation was all the time with genial smiles and with Judas kisses—its Chief visiting England amid the acclamations of a simple-hearted people attended by the chief of his spies,—we could not believe it possible that this Empire by a deliberate and infamous conspiracy against the liberties of the world was all the time plotting a war of which no human being can see the limits, but which every child can see means the ruin and devastation of Europe.

The other surprise was the surprise which has been afforded Germany, or rather Prussia. She had disseminated spies everywhere; she thought she was sure of stirring disaffection everywhere; she had emissaries in India, Egypt, Canada, and Australia; she had everywhere men perfidiuosly working, through newspapers and otherwise, all stirring up a spirit of disaffection to the British Empire. What has been the result? From the moment war was declared every part of the Empire leaped up as if by one impulse, and rushed to the assistance of the mother country. (Applause)

That is the glorious surprise our enemies have unconsciously prepared for us—that henceforth, come weal come woe, the British Empire is a world-wide fact with which the universe has yet to deal. So long as we stick together—and our union is now thickly cemented with blood shed in this war—no danger can happen to us we are not capable of confronting. (Applause.)

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which has now for thirty-one years carried on its beneficent work throughout the country, was the subject of a number of addresses in different parts of Manchester and surrounding districts.

Last year the Society dealt with 150,000 children in England, Ireland, and Wales While, it is recorded, there has been in recent months a striking improvement in the conditions of child-life generally, there is still great need to inform people of what to do in cases of child-neglect or ill-treatment. Many thousands of children from the Manchester district were dealt with in the year, and very many homes have owed their reformation

MR. W. S. ROWNTREE ON PREHISTORIC MAN.

At the New Islington Hall Mr. W. S. Rowntree, Yorkshire, gave a lecture, illustrated by lantern slides, on "Prehistoric man and his times."

Mr Rowntree began his review of the early history of man by brief references to the iron and bronze ages, and he then summarised in a non-technical and iteresting manner all the important things that are known, and much that is surmised, about neolithic and palaeolithic periods. He described the principal discoveries of relics of neolithic man, the polished and unpolished flint weapons and implements he used, and the circles and tumuli he constructed. He explained that the remains, and particularly the skulls, of neolithic men which had been found in various parts of the world showed that no marked change had occurred in the physical development of mankind since that remote age, which extended back about twelve thousand years.

After describing the cave painters and the drawings on reindeer bones, produced in the pleistocene period, Mr. Rowntree suggested that the palaeolithic men who were associated with the reindeer might have trekked northward as the cold regions grew more restricted, and that possibly they were represented among modern peoples by the Esquimeaux. The discovery of cave paintings in Africa, considered in conjuction with the fact that remains found at Mentone were of a negroid type, suggested that the bushmen of Africa might have descended from the cave painters.

THE GROWTH OF MIND.

Mr. Rowntree described the chief characteristics of the Neanderthal and Piltdown skulls, and pointed out that although they represented a low stage of development they were nevertheless the skulls of men. He spoke of the apeman of Java, and showed the resemblances to the anthropoid ape. By means of a genealogical tree on the screen he explained the modern theories of the rise of the principal races of man, and at the close of his lecture he briefly considered the causes which brought about the development of man along lines so strangely different from those of the rest of the animal kingdom. The acquisition of the faculty of walking upright and the consequent freeing of the hands for many purposes, he said, must have greatly stimulated the growth of brain cells, and this process would be accelerated by the discovery of fire and the use of weapons, the beginning of speech, and the domestication of animals.

The music was given by Miss Minnie Williams, Madame A. Peers, and Mr. John Wills.

LABOUR ORGANISATION NOT TO BE USED LIGHTLY.

Mr. A. Bellamy president of the National Union of Railwaymen, spoke at a mass meeting of railway workers at Battersea Town Hall on the "triple industrial alliance."

The alliance, he said, was not going to be used lightly on any account. It must never be used unless it could be used effectively and without something arose which was of sufficient value to justify its use for the advantage of the workers in one particular industry.

judgment to the needs of the moment and the decision of the Government, there is also a mass of people who, rightly or wrongly, put their duty to their own conscience (what they would probably call their duty to God) far above the claims of the State or the expediency of the moment, to whom to be forced to kill a fellow-creature (no matter for what cause) would be an inconceivable and unbearable outrage, and who would refuse at any cost to give up what is to them the most precious thing in life, the independence and integrity of their own souls.

Such a position may be scoffed at, but it is only fair to remember that we have all been brought up in absolute confidence that the right of freedom of conscience would never again be questioned in England. On the Continent anti-militarists have had ample warning of what would be expected of them; to escape conscription they have made their homes here or in America. We have seen the mischievous results of conscription in Germany, in the militarisation of the State and what Lord Haldane called the "abdication" of the anti-militarists, which means, of course, their emigration to a free country, and the reaction on the State of the fact that nobody can hold any of its offices who has not served in the army. If conscription is sprung on us here in the middle of a war, when men of military age are not allowed to leave the country, the results must be a far more crushing tyranny than that imposed by the Continental system. Men of extreme opinions who if they had been in Germany would have escaped by making their homes in a free country, would be faced by the alternative of either doing what they themselves think wrong or defying the law.

We all know from past experience which course English people are likely to take in such an emergency. Are we going to add to the misery of this awful war the bitterness, divisions, and hatred that must be the result of a campaign of force, persecutions, martyrdom, and revolt?—Yours, etc.,

EVA GORE-BOOTH.

Manchester and Salford Women's Trade and Labour Council, 5, John Dalton Street, Manchester, December 6th.

WOMEN CLERKS AND THE UNION.

At a meeting of the Sectional Organising Committee of the Lancashire and Cheshire Council of the Railway Clerks' Association, at Preston, on Saturday, the branches reported that there had been a great influx of new members of the association, and particularly of female clerks.

The meeting heartily endorsed the action being taken by the association in regard to the alleged victimisation of female clerks by the Great Central Railway, which is to be discussed in Parliament.

NEW HARRISON
KNITTER
A Profitable and Pleasurable Occupation.
Knits Stockings, Socks, Garments
The best investment for a living
Worked by man, woman or child.
Insurance against time of need.
519a Harrison Knitter Works, Upper Brook St., Manchester.
London Branch—54 Goodge St., Tottenham Ct. Rd. W LISTS FREE

Star Chamber methods adopted by the Board. We also resent the libelling of our women-folk in charging them with excessive drinking. Further, this meeting pledges itself to resist by all legitimate means further encroachment upon the personal liberties of the workers."

Mr. Tillett, spoke in support of the resoultion said he had taken his present attitude because he knew that the Government, in using the Control Board, was not aiming at the "trade" itself, but at the liberties of the working classes and was creating a distinctive and repressive piece of class administration, with a view of getting more control, not merely over the liberty of the workers, but over their lives. He did not care if they fought the "trade," because the "trade" could and ought to be able to protect itself; but if, under the false cry—and it was indeed a false cry—that excessive drunkenness existed they attacked the workers, that was so unfair that one must resent it. If the working class were drunken, and if drunkenness was a crime, other classes must also be censured and have their liberty restricted. It was not fair that there should be, at this period of war, class distinctions; at such a time class distinction was not merely suicidal, but criminal. (Hear, hear.) The goody-goodies and the busybodies of the country had not interfered during the recruiting agitation as to whether a man should be a soldier whether he drank or not. They did not care who went to the trenches, and he asked why, therefore, they should have distinctions made by teetotallers and busybodies who were glad enough to skulk behind the dead bodies of our lads in France—(cheers, and a voice, "Some of them"),—or those who were making munitions of war. If they would take a gun in their hands the people would honour them. (Hear, hear.) The attitude of those persons was a direct insult to the working class. He was not saying that they had not among them women who were foolish enough to drink, but long before and since the war there had been a diminution of drunkenness. He had not yet met a single employer who had said that men were neglecting or refusing to do their work. If a man was incapacitated he did not want him forced; but, in these perilous times if a man refused to work because of laziness or "booze" he would have him shot.

At this point there was some little interruption, and the Chairman appealed for order.

Mr. Tillett, continuing, said he realised the gravity and importance of the position held by men like Mr. Asquith. He felt that he had a very terrible responsibility thrust upon him. He agreed with Mr. Asquith in his views upon the war, and he sympathised with Lord Kitchener in the responsibility placed upon him, but he did not believe those responsible men were parties to the repressive action of the Central Board. (Cheers.) He believed any measure of this kind introduced into the House of Commons would meet with great hostility, and would not go through, and he was positive the Lords would throw it out. When we started the war we had just over a hundred thousand men. As if by magic, four millions had sprung into the field, and 96 per cent. of them were of the working class. We had now as much munitions of war as the Germans after their forty-four years of preparation. A class that could produce such results was a class to be honoured and not degraded, as they would be by the restrictions of the Central Board. (Cheers.)

ing potent armies and potent fleets for its defence,—we could not believe it possible that this nation was all the time with genial smiles and with Judas kisses—its Chief visiting England amid the acclamations of a simple-hearted people attended by the chief of his spies,—we could not believe it possible that this Empire by a deliberate and infamous conspiracy against the liberties of the world was all the time plotting a war of which no human being can see the limits, but which every child can see means the ruin and devastation of Europe.

The other surprise was the surprise which has been afforded Germany, or rather Prussia. She had disseminated spies everywhere; she thought she was sure of stirring disaffection everywhere; she had emissaries in India, Egypt, Canada, and Australia; she had everywhere men perfidiuosly working, through newspapers and otherwise, all stirring up a spirit of disaffection to the British Empire. What has been the result? From the moment war was declared every part of the Empire leaped up as if by one impulse, and rushed to the assistance of the mother country, (Applause)

That is the glorious surprise our enemies have unconsciously prepared for us—that henceforth, come weal come woe, the British Empire is a world-wide fact with which the universe has yet to deal. So long as we stick together—and our union is now thickly cemented with blood shed in this war—no danger can happen to us we are not capable of confronting. (Applause.)

CRUELTY TO CHILDREN.

The National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which has now for thirty-one years carried on its beneficent work throughout the country, was the subject of a number of addresses in different parts of Manchester and surrounding districts.

Last year the Society dealt with 150,000 children in England, Ireland, and Wales While, it is recorded, there has been in recent months a striking improvement in the conditions of child-life generally, there is still great need to inform people of what to do in cases of child-neglect or ill-treatment. Many thousands of children from the Manchester district were dealt with in the year, and very many homes have owed their reformation to the tactful supervision of the Society's inspectors. In that period the branch had 1,562 complaints, involving 4,969 children. Yet there were only 37 prosecutions, of which 36 resulted in convictions. Of the cases dealt with during the year 1,458 were described as cases of neglect and starvation and 80 as cases of ill-treatment and assault. The public communicated 1,130 of the complaints, and the police, school, and other officials sent particulars of the rest.

Besides references to the work of the Society at different places of worship, twenty-two meetings were held, at which there were large gatherings. Among the speakers were Mr. Robert Parr, director of the Society, Mr. F. J. Mehew, Mr. J. C. Teasdale, Mr. W. H. Roberts, Miss Aylmer, Mrs Schooling, Miss Sladen, and Miss Blackie (of the Central Office), Mr. J. Marsden and Mr. W. H. Francis, and Mr. S. H. Bond (Preston).

skulls, of neolithic men which had been found in various parts of the world showed that no marked change had occurred in the physical development of mankind since that remote age, which extended back about twelve thousand years.

After describing the cave painters and the drawings on reindeer bones, produced in the pleistocene period, Mr. Rowntree suggested that the palaeolithic men who were associated with the reindeer might have trekked northward as the cold regions grew more restricted, and that possibly they were represented among modern peoples by the Esquimeaux. The discovery of cave paintings in Africa, considered in conjuction with the fact that remains found at Mentone were of a negroid type, suggested that the bushmen of Africa might have descended from the cave painters.

THE GROWTH OF MIND.

Mr. Rowntree described the chief characteristics of the Neanderthal and Piltdown skulls, and pointed out that although they represented a low stage of development they were nevertheless the skulls of men. He spoke of the apeman of Java, and showed the resemblances to the anthropoid ape. By means of a genealogical tree on the screen he explained the modern theories of the rise of the principal races of man, and at the close of his lecture he briefly considered the causes which brought about the development of man along lines so strangely different from those of the rest of the animal kingdom. The acquisition of the faculty of walking upright and the consequent freeing of the hands for many purposes, he said, must have greatly stimulated the growth of brain cells, and this process would be accelerated by the discovery of fire and the use of weapons, the beginning of speech, and the domestication of animals.

The music was given by Miss Minnie Williams, Madame A. Peers, and Mr. John Wills.

LABOUR ORGANISATION NOT TO BE USED LIGHTLY.

Mr. A. Bellamy president of the National Union of Railwaymen, spoke at a mass meeting of railway workers at Battersea Town Hall on the "triple industrial alliance."

The alliance, he said, was not going to be used lightly on any account. It must never be used unless it could be used effectively and without something arose which was of sufficient value to justify its use for the advantage of the workers in one particular industry.

They might take it that when it was to the advantage of the workers in one industry it would be to the advantage of the workers of the United Kingdom.

"Our friends," he said, "need not fear that it is going to be used whenever there is a little bit of trouble in a little centre."

Mr. Bellamy stated that at the present moment no one recognised the solidarity of the railwaymen more than the companies. The railwaymen now received a war bonus of 5s. a week, and that had to last so long as the railways were under Government control. If the men had anything in them it would last a good deal longer than that.

Mr. J. Bermingham, the organising secretary, said that trouble in the railway world was more remote now, if things were carefully watched, than it had ever been before.

679/3

British Citizen

Saturday, December 18th, 1915.

Mrs. Philip Snowden's Stories of America.

Mrs. Philip Snowden has reached England from America, where she talked with President Wilson and met Mr. Hy. Ford, the motor millionaire, whose peace ship is coming to Europe. She gave a "Daily News" representative some of her impressions.

It appears that Mrs. Snowden had far less to do with Mr. Ford than the cables from America led most people to imagine. At the same time she formed a very clear estimate of his character.

"This is how it happened," she said "Two days before I was due to sail from America the President asked me and Frau Roska Schwimmer, who has been closely identified with the peace movement on the side of the Central Powers, to come to see him in order that he might hear our views on the utility of a neutral nation's peace conference at which the United States would be represented.

"When I got to Washington I found that a peace meeting had been arranged for the same day, and that without mentioning the matter to me the organisers had billed me all over the place to speak. Another of the speakers was Mr Ford, whom I had never seen or communicated with. One could only bow and obey the order to say something in public before going on to the private audience with President Wilson."

Mrs. Snowden caught her first glimpse of Mr. Ford as she was sitting on the platform. A youngish-looking man whom she took to be a junior secretary came in late. He seemed to feel rather out of place and was obviously shy.

A BASHFUL ORATOR.

"I was astonished," she says, "when he rose in response to the chairman's call for the famous Mr. Ford. He came forward bashfully and said: 'Friends, I've never spoken in public in my life before, and all I can say is that here's my slogan "The boys must be out of the trenches by Christmas, never to go back again." Then he sat down. I fancy he must have meant to say a great deal more but that was all he had the nerve for."

After the meeting Mrs. Snowden chatted with Mr. Ford for five minutes. He talked with the utmost enthusiasm about the mission of the peace ship, and seemed absolutely confident of success.

"He struck me as a singularly earnest and sincere fellow, with something about him of the real greatness of simplicity," declared Mrs. Snowden. "I don't think he has any idea what he is out against, but he has never been beaten yet in anything he has undertaken, and can't see how this job differs from the rest. There can be no doubt that he is prepared to spend his huge fortune on this crusade, and even the people who believe he is throwing his money away find him such a good sort that they don't like to discourage him."

From the meeting Mrs. Snowden went on to the White House, where she talked to the President about America's role as peacemaker.

WHAT THE PRESIDENT SAID.

Her report of the interview is as follows: "I impressed upon the President that the idea of a conference of neutral nations was something of a straw, but that it was the duty of civilisation at

PEACE OF ALL MANKIND.
DR AKED'S STRONG FAITH IN THE FORD PEACE MISSION.

A dispatch signed by Mr. Henry Ford whose peace party on board the Oscar II. is now on their way to Europe, has been received by Reuter's Agency by wireless. The dispatch consists of an address by Dr. C. F. Aked, pastor of the First Congregational Church, San Francisco.

"Europe is painting itself vermillion in its own heart's blood," he said "Crimson madness has descended upon the nations of the world, but this cannot be the end. Massacre by machinery cannot be the last word of the 20th century. Science and humanity cannot tolerate it. God in His heaven cannot bear it for ever, and who knows but what we ourselves may bring those diplomats and rulers and statesmen around their table face to face to talk things over quietly a little soon than they would have done if Henry Ford had not brought us upon this ship?

"Who shall say what is to be the effect upon the mind of mankind of this demonstration that he is giving of a belief in something mightier than all the powers of the embattled hosts. Until Saturday I never saw Mr. Ford. I do not know his plans. I do not know what is in the mind of any one of you. I do not know what we are setting out to accomplish. I do not know how we propose to accomplish it, but I am as certain as I am of my own existence that good, and lasting good and only good will come of it."

NEW £1,000 LIMIT.

WAR LOAN DEPOSITS IN THE POST OFFICE.

Mr. Montague (Financial Secretary to the Treasury), moving the second reading of the War Loans (Supplemental Provisions) Bill in the House of Commons, said it was a commonplace machinery bill. The object was to make provision for the establishment at the Post Office of a register of the War Loan stock held by small investors through the Post Office. It was also proposed to remove or modify for the duration of the war the limit now placed upon the amount allowed to be deposited in the Post Office Savings Bank, and also to remove the limit on the holding of Government stock in the Post Office. This would enable trade unions and friendly societies to register their stock in the new Post Office register. They proposed also to make regulations for the issue of bearer bonds through the Post Office.

Sir F. Banbury asked what would be the new limit of deposits?

Mr. Montague said with regard to the amount of investment allowed to be held on the Post Office register it was proposed to be £1,000, and with regard to the limit of deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank, they were awaiting the finding of the Committee which had been appointed to consider proposals for attracting small investors in the War Loan before deciding it.

The second reading was agreed to.

Why Should We Save?

BIGGEST SACRIFICES FROM MONEYED CLASSES.

The movement for "Personal Economy by Voluntary Effort for National Needs" was advocated at a meeting held in the Liverpool Town Hall and mainly attended by ladies.

Mr. Hartley Withers said the fact to be faced was that the Government had to get during the next year 1,600 million tons of goods and services out of the country. Our productive power, however, was limited. If the Government wanted 1,600 million tons and could only get 400 millions by borrowing abroad, the only thing to be done was to give them the remaining 1,200 million tons of goods and services ourselves. To do this we had to save our money. By doing so we were doing two things. We were first of all keeping money in our own pockets ready for the tax-gatherer and also keeping it ready for the Government next time they offered a loan on subscription.

Every shilling we spent that was not absolutely necessary for our health and efficiency was something done to help the Germans, because we were diverting to our own use and spending upon our own comforts and luxuries money which ought to be spent in providing the army with the things that were wanted, or we were diverting work and energy which ought to be devoted to the export trade. We could all help in the matter of the adverse balance of trade which had been created by merely going without everything we could possibly do without, although we did not want to economise in such a manner as would impair our health, efficiency, courage and confidence

An argument that was often advanced was "Why should we save when the Government is wasting money with both hands?" (Applause.) He thought the conclusive answer was that the people who talked about the extravagance of the Government forgot what an enormous achievement the Government had carried out, and was carrying out, at the present time—an achievement which had made this sleepy old country wake up and become the greatest, or at any rate one of the greatest, military Powers in the world. Anything we could go without now helped not only in the prosecution of the war but for the difficult time which would come upon the restoration of peace.

Mr. Charles J. Stewart, the Public Trustee, referred to the work of the Association of United Workers in this matter, and emphasised the great responsibility that lay upon the women of England who had their chance at this moment, and he did not think it was putting it too high to say that it was in their power to bring about an early and victorious peace. It was really from the moneyed classes that the sacrifices must come, because, taken at the highest, he did not think more than one-tenth of the millions required could be supplied by the working classes.

A resolution was passed to support the work of the Association of United Workers, and recommending the appointment of a local council of lady presidents

MIDDLE-CLASS WOMEN AND WORKING GIRLS IN FACTORIES.

Isabella O. Ford writes to the "Daily News":—

Sir,—I read Miss MacArthur's "Word of Friendly Counsel" with much interest. But I want to add something to what she has no admirably said about the way in which one can "fully learn what the life and labour of the average working-girl are like."

When the middle-class woman has finished her 12 hours' shift in a munition fatcory she goes home to a comfortable house, and if she has been on a night shift, to a comfortable aired bed in a quiet bed room.

When the working girl comes back in the early morning she finds in most cases an unaired bed, which the day worker has only just left—for in houses containing three very small bedrooms (sometimes only two), with families of seven, eight, or nine persons in them, there is no room for single beds—and in a close, stuffy room. If the window is kept open the street smells, all worse since so many street-sweepers have enlisted, and the smells from factories fill the room, and the continual noice outside, the ceaseless crying of someone's baby somewhere near, the jolting of heavy lorries and wagons, the monotonous cries of the street sellers with little rattling carts, the perpetual sound of machinery, all hese noises hinder sleep. Besides, the girl must more often than not, help in the house work as well as sleep.

Hundreds of streets in one Yorkshire city, now making munitions, consist entirely of back-to-back houses. If anyone really wishes to understand industrial life, and be one with the workers, and not merely an outsider, they must sleep in a back-to-back house. They will never forget the haunting smell of closeness, nor how every sound in the house is heard everywhere in it. There is no quiet and no privacy possible in such dwellings.

As for the food—when tea has to be bought in small quantities it has an entirely different taste from tea bought in large quantities in a middle-class house. The milk!—well, one wonders what it is made of! But the well-to-do woman will seldom, if ever, experience these things; for if she goes into these houses she will be given the best of everything (only the poor understand the highest courtesy, I sometimes think), and a wall of politeness will cut her off from obtaining this priceless valuable knowledge. Unless she goes feeling within her that there is not one shadow of difference between her and her hosts, except that they know infinitely more about life and its teachings than she has ever known, and perhaps ever will know; and that they often in ordinary daily life have to rise, and do rise, to heights of courage, devotion, and self-sacrifice that she in her prosperous sheltered home may never realise or understand in the least. Then they will treat her as a friend and comrade.

But these things must be seen from the inside.

ISABELLA O. FORD.

Dec. 13th.

ORDER.

The British Weekly Citizen.

EDITED BY S. MORTIMER HOLDEN.

EVERY FRIDAY. — PRICE ONE PENNY.

To the Publisher,

from America led most people to imagine. At the same time she formed a very clear estimate of his character.

"This is how it happened," she said "Two days before I was due to sail from America the President asked me and Frau Roska Schwimmer, who has been closely identified with the peace movement on the side of the Central Powers, to come to see him in order that he might hear our views on the utility of a neutral nation's peace conference at which the United States would be represented.

"When I got to Washington I found that a peace meeting had been arranged for the same day, and that without mentioning the matter to me the organisers had billed me all over the place to speak. Another of the speakers was Mr Ford, whom I had never seen or communicated with. One could only bow and obey the order to say something in public before going on to the private audience with President Wilson."

Mrs. Snowden caught her first glimpse of Mr. Ford as she was sitting on the platform. A youngish-looking man whom she took to be a junior secretary came in late. He seemed to feel rather out of place and was obviously shy.

A BASHFUL ORATOR.

"I was astonished," she says, "when he rose in response to the chairman's call for the famous Mr. Ford. He came forward bashfully and said: 'Friends, I've never spoken in public in my life before, and all I can say is that here's my slogan "The boys must be out of the trenches by Christmas, never to go back again." Then he sat down. I fancy he must have meant to say a great deal more but that was all he had the nerve for."

After the meeting Mrs. Snowden chatted with Mr. Ford for five minutes. He talked with the utmost enthusiasm about the mission of the peace ship, and seemed absolutely confident of success.

"He struck me as a singularly earnest and sincere fellow, with something about him of the real greatness of simplicity," declared Mrs. Snowden. "I don't think he has any idea what he is out against, but he has never been beaten yet in anything he has undertaken, and can't see how this job differs from the rest. There can be no doubt that he is prepared to spend his huge fortune on this crusade, and even the people who believe he is throwing his money away find him such a good sort that they don't like to discourage him."

From the meeting Mrs. Snowden went on to the White House, where she talked to the President about America's role as peacemaker.

WHAT THE PRESIDENT SAID.

Her report of the interview is as follows: "I impressed upon the President that the idea of a conference of neutral nations was something of a straw, but that it was the duty of civilisation at such a time to catch even at straws.

"He said he was in close and continuous touch with the belligerent nations through the ordinary diplomatic channels, and at the same time taking every opportunity of finding out what unofficial people like myself were thinking. Just as soon as he could satisfy himself that there was a real chance of the belligerents being brought together he would act, but he was not convinced that that moment had arrived. The whole point with him was one of the right time.

"He concluded by stating that what we had said would receive his earnest, sympathetic, and prayerful consideration —those were his exact words—and we left him feeling that we had certainly not spoken entirely in vain."

mats and rulers and statesmen around their table face to face to talk things over quietly a little soon than they would have done if Henry Ford had not brought us upon this ship!

"Who shall say what is to be the effect upon the mind of mankind of this demonstration that he is giving of a belief in something mightier than all the powers of the embattled hosts. Until Saturday I never saw Mr. Ford. I do not know his plans. I do not know what is in the mind of any one of you. I do not know what we are setting out to accomplish. I do not know how we propose to accomplish it, but I am as certain as I am of my own existence that good, and lasting good and only good will come of it."

NEW £1,000 LIMIT.

WAR LOAN DEPOSITS IN THE POST OFFICE.

Mr. Montague .Financial Secretary to the Treasury), moving the second reading of the War Loans (Supplemental Provisions) Bill in the House of Commons, said it was a commonplace machinery bill. The object was to make provision for the establishment at the Post Office of a register of the War Loan stock held by small investors through the Post Office. It was also proposed to remove or modify for the duration of the war the limit now placed upon the amount allowed to be deposited in the Post Office Savings Bank, and also to remove the limit on the holding of Government stock in the Post Office. This would enable trade unions and friendly societies to register their stock in the new Post Office register. They proposed also to make regulations for the issue of bearer bonds through the Post Office.

Sir F. Banbury asked what would be the new limit of deposits?

Mr. Montague said with regard to the amount of investment allowed to be held on the Post Office register it was proposed to be £1,000, and with regard to the limit of deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank, they were awaiting the finding of the Committee which had been appointed to consider proposals for attracting small investors in the War Loan before deciding it.

The second reading was agreed to.

we had to save our money. By doing so we were doing two things. We were first of all keeping money in our own pockets ready for the tax-gatherer and also keeping it ready for the Government next time they offered a loan on subscription.

Every shilling we spent that was not absolutely necessary for our health and efficiency was something done to help the Germans, because we were diverting to our own use and spending upon our own comforts and luxuries money which ought to be spent in providing the army with the things that were wanted, or we were diverting work and energy which ought to be devoted to the export trade. We could all help in the matter of the adverse balance of trade which had been created by merely going without everything we could possibly do without, although we did not want to economise in such a manner as would impair our health, efficiency, courage and confidence

An argument that was often advanced was "Why should we save when the Government is wasting money with both hands?" (Applause.) He thought the conclusive answer was that the people who talked about the extravagance of the Government forgot what an enormous achievement the Government had carried out, and was carrying out, at the present time—an achievement which had made this sleepy old country wake up and become the greatest, or at any rate one of the greatest, military Powers in the world. Anything we could go without now helped not only in the prosecution of the war but for the difficult time which would come upon the restoration of peace.

Mr. Charles J. Stewart, the Public Trustee, referred to the work of the Association of United Workers in this matter, and emphasised the great responsibility that lay upon the women of England who had their chance at this moment, and he did not think it was putting it too high to say that it was in their power to bring about an early and victorious peace. It was really from the moneyed classes that the sacrifices must come, because, taken at the highest, he did not think more than one-tenth of the millions required could be supplied by the working classes.

A resolution was passed to support the work of the Association of United Workers, and recommending the appointment of a local council of lady presidents the early morning she finds in most cases an unaired bed, which the day worker has only just left—for in houses containing three very small bedrooms (sometimes only two), with families of seven, eight, or nine persons in them, there is no room for single beds—and in a close, stuffy room. If the window is kept open the street smells, all worse since so many street-sweepers have enlisted, and the smells from factories fill the room, and the continual noice outside, the ceaseless crying of someone's baby somewhere near, the jolting of heavy lorries and wagons, the monotonous cries of the street sellers with little rattling carts, the perpetual sound of machinery, all hese noises hinder sleep. Besides, the girl must more often than not, help in the house work as well as sleep.

Hundreds of streets in one Yorkshire city, now making munitions, consist entirely of back-to-back houses. If anyone really wishes to understand industrial life, and be one with the workers, and not merely an outsider, they must sleep in a back-to-back house. They will never forget the haunting smell of closeness, nor how every sound in the house is heard everywhere in it. There is no quiet and no privacy possible in such dwellings.

As for the food—when tea has to be bought in small quantities it has an entirely different taste from tea bought in large quantities in a middle-class house. The milk!—well, one wonders what it is made of! But the well-to-do woman will seldom, if ever, experience these things; for if she goes into these houses she will be given the best of everything (only the poor understand the highest courtesy, I sometimes think), and a wall of politeness will cut her off from obtaining this priceless valuable knowledge. Unless she goes feeling within her that there is not one shadow of difference between her and her hosts, except that they know infinitely more about life and its teachings than she has ever known, and perhaps ever will know; and that they often in ordinary daily life have to rise, and do rise, to heights of courage, devotion, and self-sacrifice that she in her prosperous sheltered home may never realise or understand in the least. Then they will treat her as a friend and comrade.

But these things must be seen from the inside.

ISABELLA O. FORD.

Dec. 13th.

ORDER.

The British Weekly Citizen.

EDITED BY S. MORTIMER HOLDEN.

EVERY FRIDAY. — PRICE ONE PENNY.

To the Publisher,

"BRITISH WEEKLY CITIZEN,"

8, Nevills Court, London, E.C.

Please post me every week "The British Weekly Citizen" for

	s.	d.
Three months post paid	1	6
Six " " "	3	0
Twelve " " "	6	0

Signed .....

Address .....

29-12-15

Women's Kingdom.

Women and Conscription.

I was present last Thursday week, in the Portman Rooms, Baker Street, at a women's meeting arranged by the Women's International League. This gathering should have taken place three weeks ago at the Memorial Hall, but was postponed owing to the disturbance that broke up a meeting of the Union of Democratic Control, the owners of the hall thereupon cancelling the letting. Mrs. Swanwick, president of the British branch of the League, occupied the chair; and the speakers, singularly representative of different aspects of the feminist movement, were all members of the Executive Committee. Mrs. Despard was also on the platform, and at the close of the meeting expressed her "intense sympathy" with its objects. They were two-fold: (1) To state women's case against conscription; (2) to demand the inclusion of women in the event of the Reform of the Parliamentary Franchise. With reference to the first of these, the chairman's claim for the League, "We stand for democracy," may be taken as indicative of the ground of one of the most strenuous objections of the women's movement to conscription. It is the future rather than the immediate effect of compulsory military service that inspires the warnings of women who have championed the cause of liberty so well. Mrs. Swanwick referred with justifiable contempt to "the freedom that says. 'You shall enlist voluntarily—or we'll compel you!'"

Industrial Conscription.

The great menace touched upon by every speaker, and instantly endorsed by the audience, is that, as Mrs. Pethick Lawrence said, "The conscriptionists want to get control over the industrial worker." Another speaker, Mrs. Barton, gave evidence of the grip of the "mailed fist" already upon the shoulder of the worker. "It is intolerable to think of this pressure in peace as well as in war. . . Conscription, so far from being National Service, is national disservice." The over-riding of conscience involved in compulsory military service was not left out of account in the women's case against conscription. "Right is might" has been the base of the opposition to their claim for liberty. "We learnt in prison our freedom," said Mrs. Lawrence, referring to her militant days, "but how terrible if it had been possible for militants to compel other people to take part in their campaign. . . Conscription is moral slavery." Conscription, in the view of the women on the platform and on the floor at this meeting, is the offspring of German militarism, whether in Germany, France, or England, and as such is the foe, in every age and nation, of women, their work, their development, and their liberty. And not of women only—neither men nor women can be reckoned alone—but also of democracy. A resolution, expressing the conviction that any form of "industrial or military conscription" would be "a grave blow to liberty and social progress in this country," was passed.

The Suffrage Resolution.

The second resolution, proposed by Miss Margaret Bondfield, concerned the suffrage question that is engaging attention in all quarters. Miss Bondfield traced the chequered career of the Registration Bill in a characteristically racy speech. She stated an irresistibly strong case for the inclusion of women in the electorate if and when any change is made in the present registration laws. Sir John Simon's speech, she continued, suggests that "special registers" will be provided so that "the men at the front shall not be losers" (i.e., at the next election). "This," she said, "would sweep away the 'time considerations,'" which, of course, vitally affect registration as things are at present. It would constitute, in fact, an electoral reform. "If service to the nation is to be the basis of enfranchisement," cried Miss Bondfield, concluding a passage ringing with the splendid work that women have done, their heroism and endurance throughout this last year, "we must have adult suffrage." Miss Maude Royden seconded the resolution, which demanded, as "appropriate recognition of the service, sacrifice, and suffering" of women, their inclusion in any electoral Parliamentary reform measure. Miss Royden, with whatever subject she may be dealing, always creates a spiritual atmosphere. One could not but be impressed by its strength as she urged that motherhood should have articulate voice in the councils of the nation. Women's work during the war had, like men's, been splendid [illegible] in the event of the Reform of the Parliamentary Franchise. With reference to the first of these, the chairman's claim for the League, "We stand for democracy," may be taken as indicative of the ground of one of the most strenuous objections of the women's movement to conscription. It is the future rather than the immediate effect of compulsory military service that inspires the warnings of women who have championed the cause of liberty so well. Mrs. Swanwick referred with justifiable contempt to "the freedom that says, 'You shall enlist voluntarily—or we'll compel you!'"

Industrial Conscription.

The great menace touched upon by every speaker, and instantly endorsed by the audience, is that, as Mrs. Pethick Lawrence said, "The conscriptionists want to get control over the industrial worker." Another speaker, Mrs. Barton, gave evidence of the grip of the "mailed fist" already upon the shoulder of the worker. "It is intolerable to think of this pressure in peace as well as in war. . . Conscription, so far from being National Service, is national disservice." The over-riding of conscience involved in compulsory military service was not left out of account in the women's case against conscription. "Right is might" has been the base of the opposition to their claim for liberty. "We learnt in prison our freedom," said Mrs. Lawrence, referring to her militant days, "but how terrible if it had been possible for militants to compel other people to take part in their campaign. . . Conscription is moral slavery." Conscription, in the view of the women on the platform and on the floor at this meeting, is the offspring of German militarism, whether in Germany, France, or England, and as such is the foe, in every age and nation, of women, their work, their development, and their liberty. And not of women only—neither men nor women can be reckoned alone—but also of democracy. A resolution, expressing the conviction that any form of "industrial or military conscription" would be "a grave blow to liberty and social progress in this country," was passed.

The Suffrage Resolution.

The second resolution, proposed by Miss Margaret Bondfield, concerned the suffrage question that is engaging attention in all quarters. Miss Bondfield traced the chequered career of the Registration Bill in a characteristically racy speech. She stated an irresistibly strong case for the inclusion of women in the electorate if and when any change is made in the present registration laws. Sir John Simon's speech, she continued, suggests that "special registers" will be provided so that "the men at the front shall not be losers" (i.e., at the next election). "This," she said, "would sweep away the 'time considerations,'" which, of course, vitally affect registration as things are at present. It would constitute, in fact, an electoral reform. "If service to the nation is to be the basis of enfranchisement," cried Miss Bondfield, concluding a passage ringing with the splendid work that women have done, their heroism and endurance throughout this last year, "we must have adult suffrage." Miss Maude Royden seconded the resolution, which demanded, as "appropriate recognition of the service, sacrifice, and suffering" of women, their inclusion in any electoral Parliamentary reform measure. Miss Royden, with whatever subject she may be dealing, always creates a spiritual atmosphere. One could not but be impressed by its strength as she urged that motherhood should have articulate voice in the councils of the nation. Women's work during the war had, like men's, been splendid and sacrificial, said this well-known pacifist, but, as guardian of the future, woman, alike in war and peace, pays the price of motherhood—a worthy sacrifice not less costly or less noble than that of the men who are to-day destroying the lives that women have bestowed.

Saturday Review 1-1-16 670

Great things will be looked for from the Government in the New Year; and there is no doubt that, if the Cabinet is to last into the summer, it will have to give people a much better impression than it has given during the last six months. For the Serbian fiasco, and the position generally in the Balkans, the public should recognise that the British Cabinet is by no means wholly to blame; for Great Britain is not a Dictator to the Allies. But feebleness and fumbling at home is another matter; and feebleness and fumbling have been too often apparent over Men, Munitions, and Money. It is rather surprising that the Government has so far discovered few convincing critics; it has been attacked a great deal; but few of these attacks have been sustained; whilst those which have been sustained have been petty as a rule, not made by powerful or "well judgemented" minds.

The truth is that all our politicians to-day, critics as well as criticised, have been bred up in the politics of peace. The war sense comes but slowly. It cannot be bred at once in a country which is spared the worst horrors of war. Notoriously Mr. Asquith's gifts and habits as a Premier are the gifts and habits of peace. Two years ago there was nothing he would less have imagined for himself than being called to lead and decide for a nation at war. All his long political past is against him, and it is only fair that we should allow for this. Few men can change the tenour of their political lives as successfully as Pitt. Mr. Asquith has torn a leaf or two from that remarkable book of conversion; but he is not, it is too obvious, half as bold in war as he was tactical in peace; and no one would claim for him the stature of Pitt in either capacity. He cannot strike Pitt's right and determined attitude—unambiguous and uncompromising—the attitude we expect of a leader of men. It is notorious that Pitt loved peace, and only went into his great war with infinite reluctance and at the last possible moment. He was a born peace Minister, and this fact has encouraged many critics to assume that he was necessarily a bad war Minister. The view is quite untenable, and not at all logical. He did not enter willingly into war, but, once he had entered, he was resolute and thorough in speech and conduct.

The heroes of the Cabinet have decided to break their hearts and keep the pledge. It is understood they reached this decision on Tuesday after a long and grave discussion. So the "Voluntary System" is really dead now; the "Voluntary System", which has been the "pride and glory", even the "spiritual home", of the Radical and Socialist parties and their newspapers all through the war—and which seems to have made up to them for the dead and dying and mangled on the country's daily casualty lists. A few of the Twenty-Two, it is said, are so distressed by this supreme act of sacrifice—scarcely equalled since Abraham built an altar and made ready to offer up Isaac—that they may retire. It is all very moving—if you choose to take it with high seriousness, which is not easy.

But now that the pledge is to be kept and the unmarried men—who, by the way, include juveniles of 40 years and 364 days, with bald heads, big stomachs, and a carpet-slipper habit in the evening—are to be run in, one would like to know exactly why it is "only fair" that the Bachelors should go and taste cold steel before the Benedicks. We have seen that "only fair" statement made in a score of public prints, and have heard it shouted everywhere. But why is it "only fair"? Surely Benedick has rather more, as a rule, to defend, to fight for, than Bachelor? He has a home of his own, a wife of his own, children perhaps of his own; he has—though this is not invariable—more money of his own, more chattels, more pigs, cows, and poultry, than has Bachelor. Why should Benedick expect Bachelor to go to the wars first and take gladly the javelins into his breast, and thereby defend his—Benedick's—belongings, wife, and home?

The truth is, this "only fair" talk, this thoughtless stuff about the iniquity of young unmarried "slackers" staying at home whilst poor, dear married men are torn off to the wars, has been largely claptrap. But, if any decision was to be reached at all this side of Christmas 1916, it has been necessary, because only by devising a good "cry", and spreading it among the crowd like wildfire were our statesmen able at length to reach a conclusion. It was necessary to sweep in the anti-conscriptionists by some such catchy, crowd-charming device of the kind. All the same, now the dodge has been done, one may say that it was and is repugnant to good sense and lead and decide for a nation at war. All his long political past is against him, and it is only fair that we should allow for this. Few men can change the tenour of their political lives as successfully as Pitt. Mr. Asquith has torn a leaf or two from that remarkable book of conversion; but he is not, it is too obvious, half as bold in war as he was tactical in peace; and no one would claim for him the stature of Pitt in either capacity. He cannot strike Pitt's right and determined attitude—unambiguous and uncompromising—the attitude we expect of a leader of men. It is notorious that Pitt loved peace, and only went into his great war with infinite reluctance and at the last possible moment. He was a born peace Minister, and this fact has encouraged many critics to assume that he was necessarily a bad war Minister. The view is quite untenable, and not at all logical. He did not enter willingly into war, but, once he had entered, he was resolute and thorough in speech and conduct.

The heroes of the Cabinet have decided to break their hearts and keep the pledge. It is understood they reached this decision on Tuesday after a long and grave discussion. So the "Voluntary System" is really dead now; the "Voluntary System", which has been the "pride and glory", even the "spiritual home", of the Radical and Socialist parties and their newspapers all through the war—and which seems to have made up to them for the dead and dying and mangled on the country's daily casualty lists. A few of the Twenty-Two, it is said, are so distressed by this supreme act of sacrifice—scarcely equalled since Abraham built an altar and made ready to offer up Isaac—that they may retire. It is all very moving—if you choose to take it with high seriousness, which is not easy.

But now that the pledge is to be kept and the unmarried men—who, by the way, include juveniles of 40 years and 364 days, with bald heads, big stomachs, and a carpet-slipper habit in the evening—are to be run in, one would like to know exactly why it is "only fair" that the Bachelors should go and taste cold steel before the Benedicks. We have seen that "only fair" statement made in a score of public prints, and have heard it shouted everywhere. But why is it "only fair"? Surely Benedick has rather more, as a rule, to defend, to fight for, than Bachelor? He has a home of his own, a wife of his own, children perhaps of his own; he has—though this is not invariable—more money of his own, more chattels, more pigs, cows, and poultry, than has Bachelor. Why should Benedick expect Bachelor to go to the wars first and take gladly the javelins into his breast, and thereby defend his—Benedick's—belongings, wife, and home?

The truth is, this "only fair" talk, this thoughtless stuff about the iniquity of young unmarried "slackers" staying at home whilst poor, dear married men are torn off to the wars, has been largely claptrap. But, if any decision was to be reached at all this side of Christmas 1916, it has been necessary, because only by devising a good "cry", and spreading it among the crowd like wildfire were our statesmen able at length to reach a conclusion. It was necessary to sweep in the anti-conscriptionists by some such catchy, crowd-charming device of the kind. All the same, now the dodge has been done, one may say that it was and is repugnant to good sense and principle, screamed about as it has been. The only solid and sound argument for sending Bachelor first is that Bachelor costs less: yet that good argument hardly anyone has had the courage to use.

Daily News & Leader.
5-1-16

COMPULSION—AYE OR NO.

To-morrow's Great Labour Congress.

3,000,000 WORKERS TO BE REPRESENTED.

The Military Service Bill which Mr. Asquith is to introduce to-day will be considered by a thousand Labour leaders from all parts of the country on Thursday morning at the Central Hall, Westminster. The gathering will be a congress of Labour wider in its scope of representation than any held in recent times. It will comprise not only the representatives of trade unions, but also delegates from other bodies intimately bound up with the cause of Labour. The Independent Labour Party will be there; so will the Trade Councils and also the Labour Representation Committees. This means that the voice of the congress will be the voice of organised Labour as a whole, and not of any special section of it alone. Well over 3,000,000 workers will be represented by those present at the congress.

Mr. Bowerman, M.P., the secretary of the governing committee of the Trade Union Congress, has had an arduous task in organising so swiftly an extemporised national gathering of this kind, but he is a resourceful and energetic executive chief, and as the result of his labours there will be collected together probably the most diversified and most powerful Labour conference this country has ever seen. Acceptances from the various trade unions and other bodies are coming in by every post.

The chair at the congress will be occupied by Mr. Harry Gosling, a level-headed leader, with tact as well as courage, and under his presidency the meeting will certainly run smoothly. Exactly what form the proceedings will take is not yet certain, but an agenda will probably be formed to-night at a private meeting to be held after the Prime Minister's speech. Certainly one resolution, and perhaps more than one, will be submitted to the meeting, and it goes without saying that a way will be found for a decisive answer aye or no to the question of compulsion. All Labour gatherings of this kind are models of public procedure, and there need be no doubt that there will be definite and clear-cut decisions with regard to the matters raised.

The miners, the railway workers, the transport workers, and the textile operatives of the North will provide a very large proportion of the membership represented. Among the acceptances already to hand is one from the South Wales Miners, whose executive the other day, it will be remembered, passed a resolution against compulsion. Amongst the public men who may be expected to make a declaration of their views are Mr. Arthur Henderson, Mr. John Hodge, and Mr. J. H. Thomas. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald will almost certainly speak if he is among the Independent Labour Party representatives. Great interest will also centre round the speech of Mr. Smillie, the President of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain.

SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

A Conscientious Objection to Conscription.

The following letter has been sent to members of the Cabinet and of the House of Commons:

"Compulsory Military Service. On behalf of the Committee of the Society of Friends specially appointed to have charge of this matter, we write to inform you that if any measure having the above for its object should become law the opposition of our society to it will in no sense be modified or withdrawn; such opposition is fundamental and is based upon a conscientious objection to all warfare.

"We are further to inform you that if any such measure should become law the support and co-operation of members of the Society will be available for those outside their own body whose conscientious objection is based upon the same grounds as their own.

"Signed on behalf of the Committee:
Edward Grubb,
Joan Mary Fry,
Robert M. Mennell.

A BIRMINGHAM FIASCO.

A Conscription resolution carried the voice of organised Labour as a whole, and not of any special section of it alone. Well over 3,000,000 workers will be represented by those present at the congress.

Mr. Bowerman, M.P., the secretary of the governing committee of the Trade Union Congress, has had an arduous task in organising so swiftly an extemporised national gathering of this kind, but he is a resourceful and energetic executive chief, and as the result of his labours there will be collected together probably the most diversified and most powerful Labour conference this country has ever seen. Acceptances from the various trade unions and other bodies are coming in by every post.

The chair at the congress will be occupied by Mr. Harry Gosling, a level-headed leader, with tact as well as courage, and under his presidency the meeting will certainly run smoothly. Exactly what form the proceedings will take is not yet certain, but an agenda will probably be formed to-night at a private meeting to be held after the Prime Minister's speech. Certainly one resolution, and perhaps more than one, will be submitted to the meeting, and it goes without saying that a way will be found for a decisive answer aye or no to the question of compulsion. All Labour gatherings of this kind are models of public procedure, and there need be no doubt that there will be definite and clear-cut decisions with regard to the matters raised.

The miners, the railway workers, the transport workers, and the textile operatives of the North will provide a very large proportion of the membership represented. Among the acceptances already to hand is one from the South Wales Miners, whose executive the other day, it will be remembered, passed a resolution against compulsion. Amongst the public men who may be expected to make a declaration of their views are Mr. Arthur Henderson, Mr. John Hodge, and Mr. J. H. Thomas. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald will almost certainly speak if he is among the Independent Labour Party representatives. Great interest will also centre round the speech of Mr. Smillie, the President of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain.

SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

A Conscientious Objection to Conscription.

The following letter has been sent to members of the Cabinet and of the House of Commons:

"Compulsory Military Service. On behalf of the Committee of the Society of Friends specially appointed to have charge of this matter, we write to inform you that if any measure having the above for its object should become law the opposition of our society to it will in no sense be modified or withdrawn; such opposition is fundamental and is based upon a conscientious objection to all warfare

"We are further to inform you that if any such measure should become law the support and co-operation of members of the Society will be available for those outside their own body whose conscientious objection is based upon the same grounds as their own.

"Signed on behalf of the Committee:
Edward Grubb,
Joan Mary Fry,
Robert O. Mennell.

A BIRMINGHAM FIASCO.

A Conscription resolution emptied the Birmingham Council Chamber yesterday Alderman Hayes asked the Council to say that if Conscription were adopted it should be general and not sectional. There was much demur to the question being raised. When the Alderman began to argue it so many members left that a quorum was no longer available. Four Labour members were among those who hastened the development. There was a good deal of jeering, and angry exchanges took place between Conscriptionists and anti-Conscriptionists till the Lord Mayor vacated the chair.

WOMAN'S VIEW.

The Executive Committee of the Women's Labour League (at an emergency meeting) decided yesterday to instruct its delegates to oppose any acceptance of measures for compulsory military service.

The committee regretted that the Prime Minister's pledge had been allowed to stand without opposition, and held that it was incumbent upon the Labour movement to demand the fullest information, especially as to military and industrial needs.

"WHY THIS UNDUE HASTE?"

The Executive Committee of the British Socialist Party, in a manifesto issued last night relative to the Military Service Bill which Mr. Asquith will introduce to-day, ask, "Why are the Conscriptionists so eager to rush through this measure? The War Office cannot even now cope with the training and equipment of those who have volunteered and attested. What sinister motives lie behind all this undue haste? Let the Ministers take the nation into their confidence, which they have never done. Let them speak to the people as from man to man, and not as from autocratic rulers to subjects. Until they do so we can look only with suspicion upon a partial measure of compulsion, which can easily be extended to every department of industry for war purposes."

File copy 679. 679/7

LABOUR LEADER, THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1916.

LABOUR LEADER

A Weekly Journal of Socialism, Trade Unionism & Politics.

TWENTY-SEVENTH YEAR. No. 1. Vol. 13. [Registered at the G.P.O. as a Newspaper.] JANUARY 6, 1916. [Sent to any Address in Great Britain for 1/8 per quarter: Abroad 2/2 per quarter.] PRICE ONE PENNY.

Prudential Assurance Co.
LIMITED.
HOLBORN BARS, LONDON.

INVESTED FUNDS exceed £90,000,000
CLAIMS PAID - - - £112,000,000

Co-operative Insurance Society, Ltd.
(The Joint Insurance Department of the C.W.S. and the S.C.W.S.)
Chief Office:
109, Corporation St., Manchester.
Agencies in connection with Co-operative Societies.

INDUSTRIAL AND ORDINARY LIFE ASSURANCE, FIRE, WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION, AND OTHER CLASSES OF INSURANCE.

A COURSE OF EIGHT LECTURES
ON
Principles of Social Reconstruction
WILL BE GIVEN IN THE
Caxton Hall, Westminster,
BY THE
Hon. BERTRAND RUSSELL, F.R.S.
Lecturer and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Author of "Problems of Philosophy," "Justice in War-Time," "The Policy of the Entente," &c.
ON TUESDAYS.
Jan. 18, Jan. 25, Feb. 1, Feb. 8, Feb. 15, Feb. 22, Feb 29, and March 7,
At 5-30 p.m.
Tickets for the Course, One Guinea; tickets for Single Lecture, 3s., and full particulars may be obtained from Mrs. M. A. HAMILTON, 38, Gordon Place, Kensington, W.; Mrs. DELISLE BURNS, 26, Springfield Road, St. John's Wood, N.W.; or Miss LLEWELYN DAVIES, 11, Hampstead Square, N.W. 6672

THE ECONOMICS OF SOCIALISM
By C. E. SMITH
A volume of Addresses delivered to the Birmingham Socialist Centre Study Classes on the theory and practice of Socialism.
Paper Covers, Price 6d. Post Free, 8d.
THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, LIMITED,
Blackfriars Street, Manchester;
St. Bride's House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

THE FATEFUL CONFERENCE.

Organised Labour will to-day be called upon to decide the most momentous issue by which it has ever been faced. In its hands lie not merely the future of Labour but the destiny of the nation.

The representatives of Labour are accustomed to confronting issues of moment. Their votes frequently decide questions involving the well-being of many thousands of men. By their training and experience they may be expected to approach this supreme issue with the calm consideration and reasoned deliberation which it demands.

There never was an occasion when it was necessary that Labour should guard more jealously its independence of judgment or appreciate more fully its own dignity and worth. Organised Labour has always reserved to itself the right of coming to its own conclusion on matters of public moment.

LABOUR'S HISTORIC ATTITUDE.

It is unnecessary to emphasise the historic opposition of Labour to Conscription. That opposition has been based on three grounds—its abhorrence of militarism and its faith in civic democracy, the menace to industrial liberty involved in Conscription, and the outrage which Conscription would inflict upon the conscience of thousands of men. So deep-rooted has that opposition been that even under the changed conditions of the war Organised Labour has not hesitated to voice it resolutely. Four months ago the Trade Union Congress unanimously declared that Conscription "always proves a burden to the workers, and will divide the nation at a time when absolute unanimity is essential." It is obvious that only the gravest development of circumstances can justify the acceptance in January of a system so repulsive in September.

But, it may be argued, the Government does not propose to introduce a system of Conscription. Its proposal is confined in enforcing service from single men before calling up married men.

At the moment the proposal of the Government may be limited in this way. But we shall be blind to all the circumstances of the situation if we suppose for one moment that the Government will be satisfied with the degrees of compulsion now proposed, should it succeed in imposing it.

A NORTHCLIFFE CONSPIRACY.

Let the workers not forget the origin of the present proposal. It is to be found in the Northcliffe Press and the Conscriptionist members of the Cabinet who have for many months worked in conjunction with the Times and Daily Mail. It was the Northcliffe Press which first raised the cry, "Single men first." It saw quite clearly that if the principle of compulsion were once accepted, it would be a very easy matter to secure its extension. The compulsionists have played a very clever game. But Labour, if it does not fall into the trap set for it, can still frustrate their design.

And let it not be forgotten that the Conscriptionists are not going to be satisfied with compulsion for the army. They are determined to impose compulsion upon the workers in industry, and particularly upon munition workers. Already this proposal has been made within the Cabinet, and those who are urging it will not rest content until they have gained their ends. Mr. Lloyd George has been one of the foremost advocates of industrial compulsion, and his experiences on the Clyde are believed to have intensified his advocacy.

If Labour accepts the principle of compulsion it will surrender the whole case against Conscription, military or industrial. If the principle is applied to unmarried men now, it will be applied to married men before many weeks [illegible] greatest care can the financial assistance which the British Government is giving be maintained. The position is far graver than is generally recognised, and unless industry, and especially our export trade with America, is maintained, we, and our Allies with us, may suffer from a financial collapse which would be quite as serious as a military defeat. Every man withdrawn from industry and placed in the army is not only lessening the productivity of the nation, he is actually adding to the cost the nation has to bear. This consideration not only makes compulsion unnecessary, it makes it a menace to the success of the British arms.

If the Labour Conference desires to assist the Government in maintaining the security of the nation, let it propose to it the Conscription of property as an alternative, not as a supplement, to the Conscription of life. Were the Government to commandeer the material wealth of the nation beyond what is necessary for the comfortable existence of the people, it would immediately be able to make our financial position secure, it would stop at one stroke the lavish expenditure of the wealthy upon luxuries and would kill the unnecessary industries which are employing labour unusefully. More than that, it would be enabled to remunerate the men in the army as they ought to be remunerated. Hundreds of thousands of men are hesitating to join the forces because they have responsibilities which they cannot possibly meet at the present army rates. Conscript wealth and Great Britain will be able to pay its soldiers as generously as do Australia and Canada. Conscript wealth, and the Conscription of life will be unnecessary.

THE PREMIER'S "PLEDGE."

The Times has argued that national honour demands that the Premier's "pledge" to the married men should be kept. It has even gone so far as to suggest that, after our expression of indignation with Germany's action in violating Belgian neutrality, we should be guilty of hypocrisy if we consented to the Premier's "scrap of paper" being torn up. But what are the facts about this pledge? It was made without the sanction of Parliament, without the sanction even of the Premier's colleagues in the Cabinet. Can such a pledge be counted binding on Parliament? Can it be counted binding on the nation? Can it be counted binding on Labour?

The fact that the Cabinet has since felt obliged to associate itself with the Premier's pledge constitutes no reason why Parliament or Labour should accept it. This is still ostensibly a democratic country and the Premier and the Cabinet are still the servants, not the masters, of the people. Labour should view very seriously every step that is taken towards compromising the rights of Parliament and should assert with firmness and dignity its own independence.

And the pledge of the Premier to the married men is not his only pledge. He assured Parliament that compulsion would not be introduced without the "general consent" of the nation. Who can possibly say that such "general consent" has been expressed? On every hand there are signs of resolute opposition to Conscription.

MILITARISM AND LABOUR.

We appeal to the representatives of Labour to take more than a temporary view of the issue they have to decide. They have supported the prosecution of the war to liberate Europe from the bondage of militarism and to secure the triumph of democracy over despotism. By accepting the Government's proposal they would extend the power of [illegible]

INVESTED FUNDS exceed £50,000,000
CLAIMS PAID - - - £112,000,000

Co-operative Insurance Society, Ltd.

(The Joint Insurance Department of the C.W.S. and the S.C.W.S.

Chief Office:
109, Corporation St., Manchester.
Agencies in connection with Co-operative Societies.

INDUSTRIAL AND ORDINARY LIFE ASSURANCE, FIRE, WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION, AND OTHER CLASSES OF INSURANCE.

A COURSE OF EIGHT LECTURES
ON
Principles of Social Reconstruction
WILL BE GIVEN IN THE
Caxton Hall, Westminster,
BY THE
Hon. BERTRAND RUSSELL, F.R.S.
Lecturer and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Author of "Problems of Philosophy," "Justice in War-Time," "The Policy of the Entente," &c.
ON TUESDAYS,
Jan. 18, Jan. 25, Feb. 1, Feb. 8, Feb. 15, Feb. 22, Feb 29, and March 7,
At 5-30 p.m.
Tickets for the Course, One Guinea; tickets for Single Lecture, 3s., and full particulars may be obtained from Mrs. M. A. HAMILTON, 38, Gordon Place, Kensington, W.; Mrs. DELISLE BURNS, 26, Springfield Road, St. John's Wood, N.W.; or Miss LLEWELYN DAVIES, 11, Hampstead Square, N.W. 6672

THE ECONOMICS OF SOCIALISM
By C. E. SMITH
A volume of Addresses delivered to the Birmingham Socialis Centre Study Classes on the theory and practice of Socialism.
Paper Covers, Price 6d. Post Free, 8d.
THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, LIMITED,
30, Blackfriars Street, Manchester;
St. Bride's House, Salisbury Square, London, E.C.

Will our readers please note that all copies of the I.L.P. DIARY FOR 1916.
(Cloth and Leather Editions), have been sold, and further copies cannot be supplied. The demand this year has been exceptional, and although we are sorry to disappoint so many customers, we regret it is impossible for us to print another edition.
The NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, Ltd.,
30, Blackfriars Street, Manchester.

the most momentous issue which it has ever been faced. In its hands lie not merely the future of Labour but the destiny of the nation.

The representatives of Labour are accustomed to confronting issues of moment. Their votes frequently decide questions involving the well-being of many thousands of men. By their training and experience they may be expected to approach this supreme issue with the calm consideration and reasoned deliberation which it demands.

There never was an occasion when it was necessary that Labour should guard more jealously its independence of judgment or appreciate more fully its own dignity and worth. Organised Labour has always reserved to itself the right of coming to its own conclusion on matters of public moment.

LABOUR'S HISTORIC ATTITUDE.

It is unnecessary to emphasise the historic opposition of Labour to Conscription. That opposition has been based on three grounds—its abhorrence of militarism and its faith in civic democracy, the menace to industrial liberty involved in Conscription, and the outrage which Conscription would inflict upon the conscience of thousands of men. So deep-rooted has that opposition been that even under the changed conditions of the war Organised Labour has not hesitated to voice it resolutely. Four months ago the Trade Union Congress unanimously declared that Conscription "always proves a burden to the workers, and will divide the nation at a time when absolute unanimity is essential." It is obvious that only the gravest development of circumstances can justify the acceptance in January of a system so repulsive in September.

But it may be argued, the Government does not propose to introduce a system of Conscription. Its proposal is confined in enforcing service from single men before calling up married men.

At the moment the proposal of the Government may be limited in this way. But we shall be blind to all the circumstances of the situation if we suppose for one moment that the Government will be satisfied with the degrees of compulsion now proposed, should it succeed in imposing it.

A NORTHCLIFFE CONSPIRACY.

Let the workers not forget the origin of the present proposal. It is to be found in the Northcliffe Press and the Conscriptionist members of the Cabinet who have for many months worked in conjunction with the Times and Daily Mail. It was the Northcliffe Press which first raised the cry, "Single men first." It saw quite clearly that if the principle of compulsion were once accepted, it would be a very easy matter to secure its extension. The compulsionists have played a very clever game. But Labour, if it does not fall into the trap set for it, can still frustrate their design.

And let it not be forgotten that the Conscriptionists are not going to be satisfied with compulsion for the army. They are determined to impose compulsion upon the workers in industry, and particularly upon munition workers. Already this proposal has been made within the Cabinet, and those who are urging it will not rest content until they have gained their ends. Mr. Lloyd George has been one of the foremost advocates of industrial compulsion, and his experiences on the Clyde are believed to have intensified his advocacy.

If Labour accepts the principle of compulsion it will surrender the whole case against Conscription, military or industrial. If the principle is applied to unmarried men now, it will be applied to married men before many weeks have passed. If the principle is applied to the army now, it will open wide the door to industrial Conscription in the very near future.

NO MILITARY NECESSITY.

It is urged that the step the Government proposes to take is a military necessity, that without it the war cannot be won. This argument may find an unreasoned response in the passion of the moment, it cannot possibly find a response where reason still controls decision and action.

The number of men who would make effective fighting units under the Government's present scheme is estimated at 200,000. It is ridiculous to suggest that this number can possibly make the difference between victory and defeat. In a war of this character such a body of men can wield no perceptible influence. To assert that without the acceptance of the Government's proposal the war cannot be won is to assert that the war cannot be won at all.

From the point of view of achieving military victory, it is very doubtful whether the expansion of the army will not harm the Allied cause more than assist it. The help the British Government is rendering the Allies financially and in the supply of munitions is even more imperative than the contribution of men which it is making. Only with the Government is giving be maintained. The position is far graver than is generally recognised, and unless industry, and especially our export trade with America, is maintained, we, and our Allies with us, may suffer from a financial collapse which would be quite as serious as a military defeat. Every man withdrawn from industry and placed in the army is not only lessening the productivity of the nation, he is actually adding to the cost the nation has to bear. This consideration not only makes compulsion unnecessary, it makes it a menace to the success of the British arms.

If the Labour Conference desires to assist the Government in maintaining the security of the nation, let it propose to it the Conscription of property as an alternative, not as a supplement, to the Conscription of life. Were the Government to commandeer the material wealth of the nation beyond what is necessary for the comfortable existence of the people, it would immediately be able to make our financial position secure, it would stop at one stroke the lavish expenditure of the wealthy upon luxuries and would kill the unnecessary industries which are employing labour unusefully. More than that, it would be enabled to remunerate the men in the army as they ought to be remunerated. Hundreds of thousands of men are hesitating to join the forces because they have responsibilities which they cannot possibly meet at the present army rates. Conscript wealth and Great Britain will be able to pay its soldiers as generously as do Australia and Canada. Conscript wealth, and the Conscription of life will be unnecessary.

THE PREMIER'S "PLEDGE."

The Times has argued that national honour demands that the Premier's "pledge" to the married men should be kept. It has even gone so far as to suggest that, after our expression of indignation with Germany's action in violating Belgian neutrality, we should be guilty of hypocrisy if we consented to the Premier's "scrap of paper" being torn up. But what are the facts about this pledge? It was made without the sanction of Parliament, without the sanction even of the Premier's colleagues in the Cabinet. Can such a pledge be counted binding on Parliament? Can it be counted binding on the nation? Can it be counted binding on Labour?

The fact that the Cabinet has since felt obliged to associate itself with the Premier's pledge constitutes no reason why Parliament or Labour should accept it. This is still ostensibly a democratic country and the Premier and the Cabinet are still the servants, not the masters, of the people. Labour should view very seriously every step that is taken towards compromising the rights of Parliament and should assert with firmness and dignity its own independence.

And the pledge of the Premier to the married men is not his only pledge. He assured Parliament that compulsion would not be introduced without the "general consent" of the nation. Who can possibly say that such "general consent" has been expressed? On every hand there are signs of resolute opposition to Conscription.

MILITARISM AND LABOUR.

We appeal to the representatives of Labour to take more than a temporary view of the issue they have to decide. They have supported the prosecution of the war to liberate Europe from the bondage of militarism and to secure the triumph of democracy over despotism. By accepting the Government's proposal they would extend the power of militarism and sacrifice democracy to despotism. If Britain can pass through the war without fastening upon herself the shackles of militarism, after the war she will possess an unchallengeable right to lead the nations in the path of peace. If she succumbs to militarism, her claim to that honourable rôle will be less pronounced. To issue from the war without resorting to Conscription would be an invitation to other nations to turn their back on militarism. To adopt Conscription would be an invitation to them to retain and strengthen militarism. And under such circumstances who can doubt that we also would retain and strenghten militarism?

One last factor we ask the representatives of Labour to bear in mind. There are thousands of young men in this country who cannot, under any circumstances, participate in war. So strong is their belief in the sacredness of human life, so intense is their sense of the solidarity of the human race, that they will be compelled, from conscientious conviction, to decline to engage in military service, even if they come within the provisions of a Conscription measure. Many of these men have found these convictions within the Labour movement. Many of them have served the Labour movement because of these convictions. Are they to be forgotten by the Labour movement now?

These are the new :
Chief Offices of the PLANET

Friendly Assurance
Collecting Society,

CORPORATION STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

The only Insurance Society in the Country Founded and Managed by Socialists and Labour Men.

OWNED AND CONTROLLED BY THE MEMBERS.

CONSCRIPTION AND CONSCIENCE

Presidential Address to Convention
:: of No-Conscription Fellowship ::

BY

CLIFFORD ALLEN.

PRICE 1d. Post free, 1½d.

To be obtained from 8, Merton House, Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, E.C., or from The National Labour Press, Ltd., London and Manchester.

BIRTH.

LUTTRELL.—On December 31, 1915, at Ward House, Bere Alston, the wife of Hugh Fownes Luttrell, of a son. —6—1

MARRIAGE.

BRYAN : ELLIS.—On New Year's Day, Saturday, January 1, 1916, at the City of London Registry Office, HERBERT BRYAN to M. A. ELLIS (both of the City of London I.L.P.). —6—1

THE

LABOUR LEADER

THE OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE I.L.P.

30, BLACKFRIARS STREET, MANCHESTER.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1916.

[The circulation of the LABOUR LEADER has increased by 19,000 copies during the past twelve months, and it continues to increase each week.]

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

The Greatest Fight of Our History. The reports which have appeared in the press of the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill enacting compulsory military service have proved accurate, and we have now entered the last stage of the greatest struggle of our history. We enter it with confidence and determination. Although a Coalition Government, representing the three political parties of the State, has declared for compulsion, the opposition the measure has aroused is so strong and resolute that it is by no means certain that the Bill will become an Act. Within the Cabinet there has been serious division of opinion. Sir John Simon has submitted an uncompromising [illegible] miners and the Clyde workers, is uncompromising in its opposition. With such forces on our side we can well take heart. We believe it is still within the bounds of possibility to smash the Government measure, and even if we fail to prevent its enactment, our resistance will meet with such a degree of support that it may well occasion its drastic modification or repeal. In this supreme crisis it behoves every member of the I.L.P. to work for the cause as he has never worked before. There is something for everyone to do, and everyone should do it. Members of Parliament should be bombarded with letters, the Government and the Labour Party should be bombarded with resolutions by every possible organisation, the press must be bombarded with communications. We must not be satisfied with forwarding protests from I.L.P. branches. Every I.L.P. member should get his Trade Union branch to forward resolutions, the local Labour Parties and Trades Councils, Adult Schools and similar organisations. In every locality meetings of protest should be organised, if possible in conjunction with other organisations. We believe we can yet so mobilise the forces of opposition as to overwhelm our British "Prussians."

* * *

The Labour Conference. What the decision of to-day's Labour Conference will be we should not like to prophesy. It is probable that the division of opinion will be close, and that a few votes may decide the issue either way. We profoundly regret the decision of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain to abstain from attending the conference. We understand its decision is based on its long-standing opposition to the recognition of the status of the General Federation of Trade Unions and its refusal to participate in any gathering to which the General Federation is a party. Without entering into the merits of that controversy, we may, we think, express the opinion that [illegible] announced his ultimatum to the Cabinet, and he has clearly before his mind the goal of industrial Conscription. And if the Trade Union movement accepts military Conscription, how can it oppose industrial Conscription?

* * *

The I.L.P. Will Resist. So far as the I.L.P. is concerned, reports from all parts of the country indicate that the imminence of the menace has only served to intensify its opposition and its determination to resist. Closely as we know the I.L.P., the spirit revealed has surprised us. There has never been in our movement so deep a determination as exists at the present moment, and the Government which ignores it will do so at its own cost. Thousands of our members have declared their determination to resist any measure should it be enacted, and, if the single men have to suffer first, their comrades will rally unitedly to their support. At a time like this we are "all members one of another"; we stand or fall together. It would be better that the I.L.P. should lose everything else and save its soul than that it should save anything by selling its soul. Our witness to our principles at this moment is the supreme necessity. If we make it, the authorities can do what they like, the I.L.P. will live on—its spirit is unconquerable. By our side will stand thousands of others. Within the No-Conscription Fellowship, the Society of Friends, and the Fellowship of Reconciliation there are many thousands of men ready to suffer any penalty rather than outrage their convictions. They may be called upon to suffer, but from the sacrifice they make will arise a power which, we are confident, will do more to break the power of militarism and end war than any other influence. So let us be of good cheer and retain stout hearts. The triumph of principles for which we stand is assured, and by our loyalty to them the day of triumph will be hastened.

* * *

The I.L.P. Constructive Proposal. In the controversy about compulsion we must not forget our larger advocacy—the demand for an early peace based on principles which, so far as is humanly possible, will guarantee its permanence. In other countries the peoples are in ever-growing volume demanding an end of the strife and we must not cease in our endeavours to awaken a similar agitation here. In all the continental nations at war the forces of Labour and Socialism are rapidly developing, where they have not already accepted an anti-war attitude, and we must do what we can to develop a similar movement here. We must iterate and reiterate our demand for a declaration by the Government of its objective in the war, and do everything to popularise the view that the war should be ended by negotiation rather than by military conquest or the process of attrition. Only as these conceptions gain adherence can the terrible holocaust end.

* * *

Extending Militarism, Not Ending It. The war was inaugurated as a holy crusade against militarism. It is proving, as we feared it would, an unholy crusade to strengthen militarism. Arising from the war the American nation has decided enormously to strengthen its army and navy. The Government has decided to make the United States the second naval Power of the world, involving an increase in personnel of 7,500 men, whilst the army is to be increased by the addition of 40,000 Regulars and 400,000 "disciplined citizens" similar to our own Territorial forces. The extension of the American Navy will no doubt lead to the extension of the British Navy and to the extension of the military preparations of Continental Powers. We fear there is every sign that the power of militarism will be tremendously increased, not lessened, by the war. The only hope lies in a revulsion of feeling on the part of the people.

* * *

Labour's "Honours." We do not feel we can speak confidently of the degree of satisfaction with which the Labour movement regards the honours list. Has Labour a sufficiently large share of the [illegible] movement here. Mr. Hodge can be relied upon to do his bit to persuade the workers to accept a small dose of Conscription, and it should not be forgotten that he has already, as leader of the Labour Party, flouted a decision of the Party in order to serve his great friend, the Minister of Compulsion. When his record is considered we are sure our readers will agree that the King would not have bestowed too great an honour upon the member for Gorton had he made him a baron.

* * *

The Descent Upon "Forward." We cannot say the news of the raid upon the offices of the Glasgow Forward comes to us as a surprise. If we needed any lesson on the relationship between military rule and civic liberty our own recent experience taught it. On another page our readers will find an account of the raid which has followed the Forward's brave and outspoken advocacy of the principles of internationalism and human brotherhood and of the policy of the I.L.P. We take this opportunity of congratulating Mr. Thomas Johnston, the editor, on the magnificent work he has done, and we think the good results of the raid upon our offices fully justify us in congratulating him also upon the acknowledgment he has received from the military authorities. The disadvantages of suppression are only temporary; the advantages are permanent. Democracy, however, must be more vigilant if it is to retain its rights. The freedom of the press must be made secure, the right of unrestricted utterance must be safeguarded, the liberty of conscience must be finally established. These three essential principles of a free people are in peril to-day. The people must decide whether Democracy or military arrogance shall prevail. The present attack upon the Forward is not altogether to be deplored; it may help to convince the delegates at to-day's conference of the evils that inevitably follow hard upon the iron heels of Conscription. If this is possible under British Militarism as it is to-day, what will be possible when it is strengthened by the tyranny of compulsion?

* * *

One Suppressed: One Born! We are very glad indeed to see the first issue of the Woman Worker. Unlike many new journalistic ventures, the paper does not enter into competition with a number of other publications meeting the same need. It was wanted, badly wanted. Trade Unionism among men is not yet what it should be, but Trade Unionism among women is terribly inadequate. The rapid entry of women into industries with which they have hitherto had no acquaintance is preparing many difficulties for Labour when the world returns to peace. The only way to meet the difficulties is to organise the women workers, and that means time and energy. The Labour movement will have to see that it is done, and that no time is lost. In this work the Woman Worker, edited by Mary R. Macarthur and Susan Lawrence, will be an invaluable asset. Our great hope is that the new journal will very soon be compelled to announce that it is unable to accomplish its task in its present dimensions, and that the reception given to its first issue will be such that an enlarged Woman Worker will become an immediately practicable proposal.

* * *

Introduction of the Bill. As we go to press news comes through of the Prime Minister's statement in introducing the Compulsion Bill in the House of Commons. It is worthy of note that Mr. Asquith himself declared his opinion that no case has been made out for general compulsion, and those who are concerned with the maintenance of British traditions will certainly carry the opinion further, and, coupling it with his statement that "as a whole the figures are wonderful and encouraging, and should convince our Allies and enemies that the people of this country have their heart in the war and are prepared to meet any call," will ask what case is there for inserting the thin end of the compulsion wedge at all? Sir John Simon expressed his opinion that the Bill should be resisted, and undoubtedly it [illegible]

CONSCRIPTION AND CONSCIENCE

Presidential Address to Convention
:: of No-Conscription Fellowship ::

BY

CLIFFORD ALLEN.

PRICE 1d. Post free, 1½d.

To be obtained from 8, Merton House, Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, E.C., or from The National Labour Press, Ltd., London and Manchester.

BIRTH.

LUTTRELL.—On December 31, 1915, at Ward House, Bere Alston, the wife of Hugh Fownes Luttrell, of a son. —6—1

MARRIAGE.

BRYAN : ELLIS.—On New Year's Day, Saturday, January 1, 1916, at the City of London Registry Office, HERBERT BRYAN to M. A. ELLIS (both of the City of London I.L.P.). —6—1

THE

LABOUR LEADER

THE OFFICIAL ORGAN OF THE I.L.P.

30, BLACKFRIARS STREET, MANCHESTER.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 6, 1916.

[The circulation of the LABOUR LEADER has increased by 19,000 copies during the past twelve months, and it continues to increase each week.]

REVIEW OF THE WEEK.

The Greatest Fight of Our History. The reports which have appeared in the press of the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill enacting compulsory military service have proved accurate, and we have now entered the last stage of the greatest struggle of our history. We enter it with confidence and determination. Although a Coalition Government, representing the three political parties of the State, has declared for compulsion, the opposition the measure has aroused is so strong and resolute that it is by no means certain that the Bill will become an Act Within the Cabinet there has been serious division of opinion. Sir John Simon has adopted an uncompromising attitude, and now that he has resigned we believe it is his intention to give a lead to the opposition both in the House of Commons and the country. Mr. McKenna and Mr. Runciman have raised the whole issue of the danger of expanding the Army, and they will only remain in the Cabinet if recognition is given to their point of view. We understand it is also the intention of Mr. John Burns to break his silence and come out strongly against compulsion, and, though the anti-Conscriptionists in the House of Commons may prove to be a distinct minority, they are exceedingly determined, and may be counted on to offer the most vigorous resistance. In the country it is already clear the political truce and the so-called national unity have been shattered. Influential Free Churchmen like Dr. Clifford and important newspapers like the Manchester Guardian and, to a less degree, the Daily News, have declared strongly against compulsion, and, whatever the decision of the Labour Conference to-morrow, it is clear that a very important section of the Labour movement, including the South Wales miners and the Clyde workers, is uncompromising in its opposition. With such forces on our side we can well take heart. We believe it is still within the bounds of possibility to smash the Government measure, and even if we fail to prevent its enactment, our resistance will meet with such a degree of support that it may well occasion its drastic modification or repeal. In this supreme crisis it behoves every member of the I.L.P. to work for the cause as he has never worked before. There is something for everyone to do, and everyone should do it. Members of Parliament should be bombarded with letters, the Government and the Labour Party should be bombarded with resolutions by every possible organisation, the press must be bombarded with communications. We must not be satisfied with forwarding protests from I.L.P. branches. Every I.L.P. member should get his Trade Union branch to forward resolutions, the local Labour Parties and Trades Councils, Adult Schools and similar organisations. In every locality meetings of protest should be organised, if possible in conjunction with other organisations. We believe we can yet so mobilise the forces of opposition as to overwhelm our British "Prussians."

* * *

The Labour Conference. What the decision of to-day's Labour Conference will be we should not like to prophesy. It is probable that the division of opinion will be close, and that a few votes may decide the issue either way. We profoundly regret the decision of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain to abstain from attending the conference. We understand its decision is based on its long-standing opposition to the recognition of the status of the General Federation of Trade Unions and its refusal to participate in any gathering to which the General Federation is a party. Without entering into the merits of that controversy, we may, we think, express the opinion that this is an issue which should rise above all such differences. No one will recognise what is involved more clearly than Mr. Robert Smillie, and it is little short of a calamity that his voice should not be heard during the proceedings of the conference. Whatever the decision to-day, it is clear that within the Labour movement there is so strong a body of opinion opposed to compulsion that it will be impossible to say, quite apart from the abstention of the miners, that organised Labour is on the side of compulsion, and as time passes we are certain the opposition will grow until it will come to represent the almost unanimous view of the political and industrial movement. We believe a majority on the Executive of the Labour Party is opposed to the Government scheme, and if the same cannot be said about the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress, it only illustrates the incapacity of that body to understand the issue before it. As we point out elsewhere, the Government proposal is only a beginning. It was following upon his visit to Glasgow that Mr. Lloyd George "all members one of another"; we stand or fall together. It would be better that the I.L.P. should lose everything else and save its soul than that it should save anything by selling its soul. Our witness to our principles at this moment is the supreme necessity. If we make it, the authorities can do what they like, the I.L.P. will live on—its spirit is unconquerable. By our side will stand thousands of others. Within the No-Conscription Fellowship, the Society of Friends, and the Fellowship of Reconciliation there are many thousands of men ready to suffer any penalty rather than outrage their convictions. They may be called upon to suffer, but from the sacrifice they make will arise a power which, we are confident, will do more to break the power of militarism and end war than any other influence. So let us be of good cheer and retain stout hearts. The triumph of principles for which we stand is assured, and by our loyalty to them the day of triumph will be hastened.

* * *

The I.L.P. Constructive Proposal. In the controversy about compulsion we must not forget our larger advocacy—the demand for an early peace based on principles which, so far as is humanly possible, will guarantee its permanence. In other countries the peoples are in ever-growing volume demanding an end of the strife and we must not cease in our endeavours to awaken a similar agitation here. In all the continental nations at war the forces of Labour and Socialism are rapidly developing, where they have not already accepted an anti-war attitude, and we must do what we can to develop a similar movement here. We must iterate and reiterate our demand for a declaration by the Government of its objective in the war, and do everything to popularise the view that the war should be ended by negotiation rather than by military conquest or the process of attrition. Only as these conceptions gain adherence can the terrible holocaust end.

* * *

Extending Militarism, Not Ending It. The war was inaugurated as a holy crusade against militarism. It is proving, as we feared it would, an unholy crusade to strengthen militarism. Arising from the war the American nation has decided enormously to strengthen its army and navy. The Government has decided to make the United States the second naval Power of the world, involving an increase in personnel of 7,500 men, whilst the army is to be increased by the addition of 40,000 Regulars and 400,000 "disciplined citizens" similar to our own Territorial forces. The extension of the American Navy will no doubt lead to the extension of the British Navy and to the extension of the military preparations of Continental Powers. We fear there is every sign that the power of militarism will be tremendously increased, not lessened, by the war. The only hope lies in a revulsion of feeling on the part of the people.

* * *

Labour's "Honours." We do not feel we can speak confidently of the degree of satisfaction with which the Labour movement regards the honours list. Has Labour a sufficiently large share of the honours? We have our misgivings. It would have been an act of grace, for instance, if the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson had been elevated to the peerage. The Clyde workers are able to testify to the valuable service he has rendered to the War Cabinet, particularly to the Minister of Compulsion. A Labour representative in the House of Lords might have had a spectacular value inducing "National Unity." This effect has, of course, been achieved to some degree by seeking two Privy Councillors from the Labour Party, but we cannot feel that is a sufficient acknowledgment of the Labour Party's excellent work in maintaining the passions necessary to war and in diverting working-class thought from the channels of Internationalism in which it had been freely running. Our greatest sorrow, however, is in the profound sense of injustice aroused in us by the omission of John Hodge from the list. What can be responsible for this tragic oversight? His services have been conspicuous. But for him, France would have been labouring under the most distorted notions of the size and strength of the peace policy of the I.L.P. We take this opportunity of congratulating Mr. Thomas Johnston, the editor, on the magnificent work he has done, and we think the good results of the raid upon our offices fully justify us in congratulating him also upon the acknowledgment he has received from the military authorities. The disadvantages of suppression are only temporary; the advantages are permanent. Democracy, however, must be more vigilant if it is to retain its rights. The freedom of the press must be made secure, the right of unrestricted utterance must be safeguarded, the liberty of conscience must be finally established. These three essential principles of a free people are in peril to-day. The people must decide whether Democracy or military arrogance shall prevail. The present attack upon the Forward is not altogether to be deplored; it may help to convince the delegates at to-day's conference of the evils that inevitably follow hard upon the iron heels of Conscription. If this is possible under British Militarism as it is to-day, what will be possible when it is strengthened by the tyranny of compulsion?

* * *

One Suppressed: One Born! We are very glad indeed to see the first issue of the Woman Worker. Unlike many new journalistic ventures, the paper does not enter into competition with a number of other publications meeting the same need. It was wanted, badly wanted. Trade Unionism among men is not yet what it should be, but Trade Unionism among women is terribly inadequate. The rapid entry of women into industries with which they have hitherto had no acquaintance is preparing many difficulties for Labour when the world returns to peace. The only way to meet the difficulties is to organise the women workers, and that means time and energy. The Labour movement will have to see that it is done, and that no time is lost. In this work the Woman Worker, edited by Mary R. Macarthur and Susan Lawrence, will be an invaluable asset. Our great hope is that the new journal will very soon be compelled to announce that it is unable to accomplish its task in its present dimensions, and that the reception given to its first issue will be such that an enlarged Woman Worker will become an immediately practicable proposal.

* * *

Introduction of the Bill. As we go to press news comes through of the Prime Minister's statement in introducing the Compulsion Bill in the House of Commons. It is worthy of note that Mr. Asquith himself declared his opinion that no case has been made out for general compulsion, and those who are concerned with the maintenance of British traditions will certainly carry the opinion further, and, coupling it with his statement that "as a whole the figures are wonderful and encouraging, and should convince our Allies and enemies that the people of this country have their heart in the war and are prepared to meet any call," will ask what case is there for inserting the thin end of the compulsion wedge at all? Sir John Simon expressed his opinion that the Bill should be resisted, and undoubtedly it will be by strong forces inside and outside the House. Conscientious objectors are acknowledged, and exemption is to be permitted to them, but it must not be expected that that will remove the powerful opposition that exists in the country. The principle must not be admitted under any conditions, on any plea, for any time. The Prime Minister seemed to be aware of the unpopularity of the proposal, and his speech was one of half-hearted support. The announcement that the Group System is to be re-opened gives some ground for hope that the Government may yet turn aside from the path that is leading to disaster, and if the forces of opposition seize the opportunity to make their determination explicitly understood, that hope may be realised and Britain saved from a "Prussian" invasion.

We are reluctantly compelled to hold over until next week the article on National Congress of the French Socialist Party.

TO-DAY—THE TEST!

GREATEST FIGHT SINCE MAGNA CHARTA

BY EGERTON P. WAKE.

(National Executive of the Labour Party.)

As the representative of the Trades and Labour Councils, local Labour Parties, and Labour Representation Committees of the country upon the National Executive of the Labour Party, I take this opportunity of declaring that these bodies are solidly and entirely opposed to Conscription. These local organisations form the organising and propaganda forces of labour, they constitute the fighting efficiency of the movement, and, by reason of their close and constant touch with the members of the branches of the various sections that make up that composite body we call the Labour movement, they represent the general opinion of Labour more accurately than any other of our various forms of organisation.

UNITY OF LOCAL LABOUR BODIES.

During recent months these Councils have inundated the Government, bombarded Members of Parliament, and loaded the head offices of the national bodies with letters of protest and resolutions of opposition against any form of "compulsion," however "modified" or "temporary" the proposals may be.

Those Councils and bodies which have taken part in the work of recruiting were impelled to do so by the desire to "save the voluntary system." If the success of their efforts is now to be exploited by Conscriptionists into a means of imposing the method of compulsion, these Councils and local bodies will regard the surrender of the Government as a breach of faith and a gross betrayal.

Those Councils and bodies which refrained from associating with the work of enlistment will see in the introduction of compulsion a complete justification of their abstention.

Whatever differences may have divided these bodies since the outbreak of war, the attempt to enforce Conscription will unite the local fighting forces of Labour as, perhaps, never before, in their determination to keep the workers free from military compulsion.

No case has been made out, either on the grounds of expediency or principle, for the proposed departure from our most cherished ideals of civil liberty.

Military reasons do not demand it, economic reasons absolutely condemn it as suicidal. Lord Kitchener some months ago declared for the "war of attrition," which, in its last analysis, as the enemy admits, means the "man-power" of Germany versus the "money-power" of Britain. The "money-power" of Britain means our financial and economic resources, which depend entirely upon our wealth-producing industries. The munitions and supplies of our Army and Navy, partly also of France, the munitions of Italy, the supplies for Russia's hosts, the succour of Belgium and Serbia, the outflow of loans to our Allies, the exports to maintain our national credit, and to secure the products of the neutral world for our Allies and ourselves, and the sustenance of our people, all depend upon our industries, and these are crying out for men! Munitions are delayed, congestion is prevalent, shortage of labour is producing stagnation, and still the "Conscriptionists at any price" are proposing further to denude our industries of their most productive workers. They are heading the nation straightway to the rocks of disaster!

MIRACLES OF VOLUNTARYISM.

Voluntaryism has produced miracles. Conscription, on the continental lines, imposed upon this country 18 months ago, would not have given the War Office a larger army than the voluntary method has done, while the quality of the 3,250,000 men who had enlisted freely before the Derby scheme could not have been equalled by any compulsory method. The raising of that voluntary army is unique compulsionists, is destructive of the desired "national unity." The last stages of the Derby scheme were farcical. Thousands of attestations of married men everywhere, in munition industries and reserved occupations, were deliberately secured under the assurance that their promises would never have to be honoured. For the Conscriptionists and married men in sheltered industries now to demand compulsion for the single men is a cowardly and contemptible crime. This proposal is the worst form of compulsion; it is "Conscription by accident of occupation."

TWO UNSURMOUNTABLE OBJECTIONS.

Britain, by her Navy, her voluntary Army, her industries, her financial resources, and her stability, has already carried out far more than her bargain with the Entente Powers. Are we to assume that our Navy, our present Army, the tens of millions of Russia's forces, the millions of the French armies, and the legions of Italy, with the remnants of the Belgian forces, are all powerless to secure a triumph unless our Government goes back upon our past, is false to our national traditions, and makes a further addition of a few hundred thousand single men as conscripts to the allied forces?

Above and beyond all these minor questions lie the two unsurmountable objections.

First, the introduction of compulsion, in any shape or form, is a direct attack upon the dominance of the civil power in the realm. Specious plea of a "temporary expedient," "for the duration of the war," will not abate agitation, sacrifice, and struggle since Magna Charta. To this end Compulsion for single men is the first means. The rest will be easy. Playing upon the fears of the people for "national security," through military rivalries, by competition in armaments, Compulsion will be extended and made permanent, until the nation is militarised, "till the vast temple of our liberties a shapeless mass of wreck and rubbish lies." Though "England lives," her people will be enslaved and her soul destroyed.

Secondly, the most vital objection of all is the assumption by the State of a power not implied by any recognised contract between the individual and the civic body. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, but unto God the things that are God's!" Cæsar may tax our earnings, may restrict, limit, and condition our lives, and we will recognise the collective will in these material domains. But the giving and taking of life are not within the gift or power of Cæsar. That is the basis of the higher contract between the Creator and the creature. No attestation, Order in Council, proclamation, Act of Parliament, or any device of statecraft can absolve the individual from his obligation under that contract. The State is powerless in the realm of the spirit and conscience, where the King of Kings and peasants alike shows no respect for principalities, powers, or persons, races, creeds, or class, but under His common Fatherhood regards all His sons as brothers in the great human family of mankind.

generations. We must assist in maintaining for them the freedom we ourselves have enjoyed. Our debt to the past can only be paid by service in the present and struggle and sacrifice for the future. In the defence of this heritage, the peculiar glory of British liberty, against this insidious attack of Cæsarism, let the I.L.P., all ages, men and women alike, stand firmly in resistance, the Defence of the Realm Acts and regulations notwithstanding.

And the reward? Piercing through the red mist of war, the dust and din of conflict, the pain and passion of our struggle, the eyes of our souls see that some day the people must win! That will indeed be "The Day!" We may not see it, but we shall have laid the pathway to it. Others will walk thereon and rejoice in it.

And yet, the road is ours as never theirs!
Is not one joy on us alone bestowed?
For us the master joy, O pioneers,
We shall not travel, but we made, the road.

SHALL BRITONS BE CONSCRIPTS?

Fellow Citizens,—

The time has come to appeal to all those who value our traditional British freedom.

A determined resistance must be made to the sinister endeavour to impose upon the people, under some such formula as "compulsory attestation for single men," the evils inherent in Conscription.

National service must not be degraded to national slavery. Freedom of conscience must not be sacrificed to military necessity, nor British liberty to political expediency. Man's deepest religious and moral convictions must not be swept aside.

WE ARE CONFIDENT THIS DANGER CAN YET BE AVERTED.

We appeal to the servants of Christ and to lovers of religious freedom. Is religious persecution once again to stain the life of our country?

We appeal to our fellow workers in factory, workshop, and mine to maintain the right of every man to decide for himself the issue of life and death.

We appeal to those who rejoice in that liberty of conscience, that tolerance of thought and action, which make them honour the name of their country.

THE RESPONSIBILITY IS YOURS TO MAINTAIN INTACT THE LIBERTIES OF THE BRITISH PEOPLE.

If you fail to do this, we—men of military age—must and will resist alone, whatever the consequences.

We believe in human brotherhood, in the sanctity of human life and personality. We will not kill. While the soul of Britain lives our witness cannot be in vain.

Signed on behalf of the No-Conscription Fellowship.

CLIFFORD ALLEN, Chairman.
EDWARD GRUBB, Hon. Treasurer.
A. FENNER BROCKWAY, Hon. Secretary.
W. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Hon. Organiser.
W. H. AYLES,
A. BARRATT BROWN,
J. P. F. FLETCHER,
MORGAN JONES,
C. H. NORMAN,
LEYTON RICHARDS (Rev.),
} Committee.

THE N.C.F. AND THE CRISIS.

Tremendous Effort to Smash Compulsion

PLANS TO RESIST COMPLETE.

The National Committee and local branches of the No-Conscription Fellowship are exhibiting tremendous activity in a supreme effort to frustrate the attempt of the Government to impose Conscription upon the country.

The National Committee sat for ten hours on Sunday in London, and it is meeting again to-day. On Monday and Tuesday the National Advisory Committee, representing the Young Men's Service Committee of the Society of Friends, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and the N.-C.F. met and arranged joint action.

The N.-C.F. Committee has published a resolute manifesto, the terms of which will be found elsewhere. It is being distributed in leaflet form by the thousand, and copies have been issued as posters for exhibition. Those who can make use of either the leaflet or the poster may obtain copies by application to the Head Office. Besides being sent to the Press, the manifesto is being forwarded to all members of Parliament, to prominent men and women in every locality, to Trades Councils, and similar bodies.

The Joint Advisory Committee has asked the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Presidents of the various Free Church denominations, and Cardinal Bourne to receive deputations to state the view of the conscientious objector to military service. It is taking steps to arrange a large demonstration of protest against military compulsion in London, and all branches of the N.-C.F. have been urged to arrange similar meetings, in conjunction with other bodies, in their localities. We are asked to say that all members of the N.-C.F. are urged to carry out at once the suggestions for opposing a Bill made in the circulars issued in November and December.

Detailed plans have been prepared to resist the measure which the Government has introduced, should it become law, and to assist the dependants of all men who may suffer by resisting.

The National Committee is appealing for a fund of £1,000, to be raised within four days. The crisis is so grave and the work which the N.-C.F. is doing so important that we have little doubt that this sum will be forthcoming. The time has arrived when no sacrifice can be too great to assist those who are prepared to sacrifice their all for their anti-militarist principles. The address of the Head Office of the N.-C.F. is 8, Morton House, Salisbury Court, London, E.C.

sections that make up that composite body we call the Labour movement, they represent the general opinion of Labour more accurately than any other of our various forms of organisation.

UNITY OF LOCAL LABOUR BODIES.

During recent months these Councils have inundated the Government, bombarded Members of Parliament, and loaded the head offices of the national bodies with letters of protest and resolutions of opposition against any form of "compulsion," however "modified" or "temporary" the proposals may be.

Those Councils and bodies which have taken part in the work of recruiting were impelled to do so by the desire to "save the voluntary system." If the success of their efforts is now to be exploited by Conscriptionists into a means of imposing the method of compulsion, these Councils and local bodies will regard the surrender of the Government as a breach of faith and a gross betrayal.

Those Councils and bodies which refrained from associating with the work of enlistment will see in the introduction of compulsion a complete justification of their abstention.

Whatever differences may have divided these bodies since the outbreak of war, the attempt to enforce Conscription will unite the local fighting forces of Labour as, perhaps, never before, in their determination to keep the workers free from military compulsion.

No case has been made out, either on the grounds of expediency or principle, for the proposed departure from our most cherished ideals of civil liberty.

Military reasons do not demand it, economic reasons absolutely condemn it as suicidal. Lord Kitchener some months ago declared for the "war of attrition," which, in its last analysis, as the enemy admits, means the "man-power" of Germany versus the "money-power" of Britain. The "money-power" of Britain means our financial and economic resources, which depend entirely upon our wealth-producing industries. The munitions and supplies of our Army and Navy, partly also of France, the munitions of Italy, the supplies for Russia's hosts, the succour of Belgium and Serbia, the outflow of loans to our Allies, the exports to maintain our national credit, and to secure the products of the neutral world for our Allies and ourselves, and the sustenance of our people, all depend upon our industries, and these are crying out for men! Munitions are delayed, congestion is prevalent, shortage of labour is producing stagnation, and still the "Conscriptionists at any price" are proposing further to denude our industries of their most productive workers. They are heading the nation straightway to the rocks of disaster!

MIRACLES OF VOLUNTARYISM.

Voluntaryism has produced miracles. Conscription, on the continental lines, imposed upon this country 18 months ago, would not have given the War Office a larger army than the voluntary method has done, while the quality of the 3,250,000 men who had enlisted freely before the Derby scheme could not have been equalled by any compulsory method. The raising of that voluntary army is unique in the world's military history.

The Derby scheme, it is stated, has secured about 600,000 attestations of men immediately available. This figure will supply Lord Kitchener's weekly demand of 30,000 for nearly six months. If so, where is the immediate urgency of "compulsion"? By whose authority has Lord Derby or anyone else declared that his "scheme" was the "last effort" of voluntaryism?

The figures of enlistment before the Derby scheme must be fully published. A complete analysis of the proportions as between married and single, and as between the aristocratic, professional, commercial, and industrial classes, the numbers of these "classes" serving "in the ranks" or "with commissions," must be furnished. A full statement of reservations and exemptions, clerics and journalists for instance, as essential industries, must be issued.

The division of the nation into single and married sections, while an astute device of the

TWO UNSURMOUNTABLE OBJECTIONS.

Britain, by her Navy, her voluntary Army, her industries, her financial resources, and her stability, has already carried out far more than her bargain with the Entente Powers. Are we to assume that our Navy, our present Army, the tens of millions of Russia's forces, the millions of the French armies, and the legions of Italy, with the remnants of the Belgian forces, are all powerless to secure a triumph unless our Government goes back upon our past, is false to our national traditions, and makes a further addition of a few hundred thousand single men as conscripts to the allied forces?

Above and beyond all these minor questions lie the two unsurmountable objections.

First, the introduction of compulsion, in any shape or form, is a direct attack upon the dominance of the civil power in the realm. Specious pleas of a "temporary expedient," "for the duration of the war," will not abate the opposition of the forces of Labour, for every conscript system under which Europe is now groaning has been fastened upon the people by similar pleas. There is no mistake about what the Conscriptionist wants. Writing in the June number of the English Review, Mr. Austen Harrison, the editor, the high priest of compulsion, declared:

> Conscription does not mean merely a law introducing compulsory service; it means militarism, military government and control, system, organisation, all-round professionalism, in lieu of the amateurishness still reigning. Under Conscription the whole forces and resources of the country would be placed in the hands of the military, our popular government would cease to be for the time being.

With the industrial serfdom of the Munitions Act, the loss of open trials, freedom of press and speech, and political liberty under the Defence of the Realm Act, this pronouncement means nothing less than the extinction of all that the people of Britain have won by the assumption by the State of a power not implied by any recognised contract between the individual and the civic body. "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, but unto God the things that are God's!" Cæsar may tax our earnings, may restrict, limit, and condition our lives, and we will recognise the collective will in these material domains. But the giving and taking of life are not within the gift or power of Cæsar. That is the basis of the higher contract between the Creator and the creature. No attestation, Order in Council, proclamation, Act of Parliament, or any device of statecraft can absolve the individual from his obligation under that contract. The State is powerless in the realm of the spirit and conscience, where the King of Kings and peasants alike shows no respect for principalities, powers, or persons, races, creeds, or class, but under His common Fatherhood regards all His sons as brothers in the great human family of mankind.

Compulsion is an outrage upon the individual soul, an attempt by the State to assume the functions of private judgment and individual conscience, a trespass by temporal power upon the sacred precincts of spiritual expedience and religious conviction, and a denial by the Government of the basic truth of Christianity, the responsibility of the individual life to the eternal source of life itself, when the soul returns to Him who gave it.

AN APPEAL TO OLDER MEN.

One word of appeal to my comrades of the I.L.P. who are above the present military age of 40. Do not allow this battle to be fought by the single men affected alone. We have enjoyed our life as citizens of this land free from the cursed grip of Militarism. That immunity was secured for us by the sacrifice of those brave souls who, through centuries of struggle, built up our civil liberty. That heritage is being taken from the young manhood of to-day, and probably from future pain and passion of our struggle, the eyes of our souls see that some day the people must win! That will indeed be "The Day!" We may not see it, but we shall have laid the pathway to it. Others will walk thereon and rejoice in it.

And yet, the road is ours as never theirs!
Is not one joy on us alone bestowed?
For us the master joy, O pioneers,
We shall not travel, but we made, the road.

SHALL BRITONS BE CONSCRIPTS?

Fellow Citizens,—

The time has come to appeal to all those who value our traditional British freedom.

A determined resistance must be made to the sinister endeavour to impose upon the people, under some such formula as "compulsory attestation for single men," the evils inherent in Conscription.

National service must not be degraded to national slavery. Freedom of conscience must not be sacrificed to military necessity, nor British liberty to political expediency. Man's deepest religious and moral convictions must not be swept aside.

WE ARE CONFIDENT THIS DANGER CAN YET BE AVERTED.

We appeal to the servants of Christ and to lovers of religious freedom. Is religious persecution once again to stain the life of our country?

We appeal to our fellow workers in factory, workshop, and mine to maintain the right of every man to decide for himself the issue of life and death.

We appeal to those who rejoice in that liberty of conscience, that tolerance of thought and action, which make them honour the name of their country.

THE RESPONSIBILITY IS YOURS TO MAINTAIN INTACT THE LIBERTIES OF THE BRITISH PEOPLE.

If you fail to do this, we—men of military age—must and will resist alone, whatever the consequences.

We believe in human brotherhood, in the sanctity of human life and personality. We will not kill. While the soul of Britain lives our witness cannot be in vain.

Signed on behalf of the No-Conscription Fellowship.

CLIFFORD ALLEN, Chairman.
EDWARD GRUBB, Hon. Treasurer.
A. FENNER BROCKWAY, Hon. Secretary.
W. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Hon. Organiser.
W. H. AYLES,
A. BARRATT BROWN,
J. P. F. FLETCHER,
MORGAN JONES,
C. H. NORMAN,
LEYTON RICHARDS (Rev.),
} Committee.

THE N.C.F. AND THE CRISIS.

Tremendous Effort to Smash Compulsion

PLANS TO RESIST COMPLETE.

The National Committee and local branches of the No-Conscription Fellowship are exhibiting tremendous activity in a supreme effort to frustrate the attempt of the Government to impose Conscription upon the country.

The National Committee sat for ten hours on Sunday in London, and it is meeting again to-day. On Monday and Tuesday the National Advisory Committee, representing the Young Men's Service Committee of the Society of Friends, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and the N.-C.F. met and arranged joint action.

The N.-C.F. Committee has published a resolute manifesto, the terms of which will be found elsewhere. It is being distributed in leaflet form by the thousand, and copies have been issued as posters for exhibition. Those who can make use of either the leaflet or the poster may obtain copies by application to the Head Office. Besides being sent to the Press, the manifesto is being forwarded to all members of Parliament, to prominent men and women in every locality, to Trades Councils, and similar bodies.

The Joint Advisory Committee has asked the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Presidents of the various Free Church denominations, and Cardinal Bourne to receive deputations to state the view of the conscientious objector to military service. It is taking steps to arrange a large demonstration of protest against military compulsion in London, and all branches of the N.-C.F. have been urged to arrange similar meetings, in conjunction with other bodies, in their localities. We are asked to say that all members of the N.-C.F. are urged to carry out at once the suggestions for opposing a Bill made in the circulars issued in November and December.

Detailed plans have been prepared to resist the measure which the Government has introduced, should it become law, and to assist the dependants of all men who may suffer by resisting.

The National Committee is appealing for a fund of £1,000, to be raised within four days. The crisis is so grave and the work which the N.-C.F. is doing so important that we have little doubt that this sum will be forthcoming. The time has arrived when no sacrifice can be too great to assist those who are prepared to sacrifice their all for their anti-militarist principles. The address of the Head Office of the N.-C.F. is 8, Merton House, Salisbury Court, London, E.C.

INTERCESSION.

Oh Churches, though you call the land to prayer
With every pious show of adoration,
Though ministers and flock alike are filled
With fervid zeal. Yet how you sorely lack
The Spirit of the lowly Nazarene,
Who taught the world to love, and ever love,
Respect for human life, to shun the sword.
Use not that pure, sweet name upon your lips
While brothers' blood cries from the ground to God.
Your words ascend no farther than your thoughts,
Such prayers are wholly void and meaningless.
Oh, cease this mockery! Go, cleanse your hearts!
And ne'er approach that pure white throne to pray
Till with your brothers you are reconciled.

C. W. E.

679/10

THE MUNITIONS ACT: First Amending Bill.

By J. R. Clynes, M.P.

There are men who have so much to unlearn that they cannot be taught even by experience. Such men are often found in positions of authority. They wield great power, but the use of their strength often has the effect of weakening the purpose which they profess to serve. Some of these men have had much to do with the amendment of the Munitions of War Act. This first amendment of that Act will in turn have to be amended, and if the war lasts for long there are many parts of the original Act to which persons in authority must return to try and fit them in by further amendments with workshop necessities and with the industrial changes which munition work will continue to impose.

LESS LAW AND MORE LIBERTY.

Less law and more liberty would have produced far better results than the force provided for in so many parts of the original Act. The confidence of the vast majority of workers can be commanded sooner by proving to them that they are being treated fairly and humanely than by trying to drive them away from such workshop privileges as they have enjoyed. Not that we desired to leave workshop conditions unaltered in face of the demands made upon labour by the war. Nor have many of us accepted the descriptions which some people applied to the Munitions Act as a whole. All classes in the community, with a few notable and fortunate exceptions, have had to forfeit some opportunities, privileges, or conditions of personal freedom formerly enjoyed by them. We have not objected to necessary legislation. We object to the irritating interference which has produced no good result in increasing the output of munitions. Under proper conditions the three principal objects aimed at in the Munitions of War Act could have been attained and could have been agreed to with little complaint if the Government had sought to attain them without needless provisions which have had the effect of wasting a great amount of time and labour, and which have produced in many cases conditions of indignation and sulk instead of the cheerful and ready response for greater effort that might have been obtained by different methods

We agreed to remitting serious differences on wages and working conditions to the decision of impartial arbitrators. We agreed to set aside Trade Union customs where these customs stood in the way of increasing output of munitions, and we quite agreed to any reasonable measure of State control of industry with the object of preventing exploitation by employers and making it impossible for traders who deal with the Government to fix fancy prices for their goods or services. These three original and main objects would have found little opposition from Labour or Socialist spokesmen.

MINGLING PATRIOTISM AND PROFIT.

The need for the last of these three provisions has been admitted in the very striking asides and odd instances found in Ministers' recent speeches. The Minister of Munitions even has dwelt upon the mingling of patriotism and profit which stands to the account of several employers. Dr. Addison, M.P., when he introduced the Amending Bill, said that the Government had been paying for certain munitions much more than they ought to pay, and a threat to one firm to examine the prices contracts had the effect of reducing the cost from £30 to £20 per ton, resulting in the saving of half a million in a short time.

If workmen had been guilty of any corresponding wrong against the country they would have been fined or imprisoned. The memorandum of the Amending Bill shows that no fundamental change will be effected by the Amendments. The memorandum tells us that the Act will apply to more shops and extend the definition of munitions work.

Section 7 of the principal Act is amended so as, amongst other things, to make the issue of certificates of discharge compulsory upon the employer when he dismisses a workman or suspends him for more than three days unless the tribunal is of opinion that the workman was guilty of misconduct in order to secure dismissal, and to prevent the employer from inserting anything in the certificate other than the prescribed particulars (clause 4).

It is also provided that when an employer dismisses a workman to whom Section 7 of the principal Act applies without at least a week's notice the tribunal may award compensation to the workman unless it considers that the circumstances are such as to make the omission to give notice reasonable.

It is further provided that a munitions tribunal shall, in deciding whether a certificate should be given to a workman, take into consideration the question whether the workman has left his former work for the purpose of undertaking any class of work in which his skill or other personal qualifications could be employed with greater advantage to the national interest.

Organised labour is not to blame for these slender amendments, and only those who are trying to shape useful and necessary industrial legislation in war-time can understand the obstacles or appreciate the difficulties of securing Parliamentary attention for reasonable proposals.

WORKERS' INDIGNATION.

In at least half a dozen respects the Bill should have been drastically amended on the lines suggested in our conferences with Ministers or in accordance with the amendments put forward in the House of Commons. No provision has given more just offence, or excited greater indignation amongst workmen, than the restrictions imposed against men leaving work when they have desired to do so even for other munition employment. The employer had the power to dismiss when he chose, and the power to retain a workman, no matter how strong the workman's claim was for leaving. It is no answer to say that men could appeal to the Munitions Tribunal for a leaving certificate. Not one man in a thousand would get before such a tribunal. Men should be free to leave under the terms of the usual notice when they were leaving as individuals, and were not acting collectively as men coming on strike to enforce some demands. If the Government could not agree to go so far, they should at least have put upon the employer the onus of proving to a tribunal the necessity for keeping the workman instead of the workman having to prove to either employer or tribunal that it was necessary for him to leave.

POLICE COURT ATMOSPHERE.

Tribunals when dealing with cases should take all circumstances, such as wages, housing conditions, and domestic circumstances, into account in giving their decision. Tribunals should be shorn of their police court atmosphere, and should no longer consist of a lawyer sitting with two men reduced to ciphers. Collective responsibility and power of judgment should apply to the whole of the persons constituting the court, and as the courts have to deal more with workshop questions than points of law, Law Court procedure should be reduced and the methods of conference should take their place. Workshop and all other rules relating to the Act should be made uniform throughout the country, and should have the joint approval of representatives of workmen and of employers before the heads of firms should have any right to impose those rules on their employees. The Act should prevent workmen being reduced in status or pay and being moved to some class of work at a less rate than they previously received.

And, above all, effective provision should be made whereby complaints and grievances arising day by day can be more speedily settled and adjusted. Nothing has aroused more disgust in connection with war legislation than the hundreds of cases where groups of men have had to wait not merely weeks but months for the settlement of complaints which their Unions duly reported for them. In industry hope deferred is the greatest maker of the greatest trouble.

NOTES OF THE MOMENT.

"'Only the single men,' you say. Yes, only the thin end of the wedge."—Daily News, December 31, 1915.

* * *

Every Little Helps!

The pro-war Socialists, Syndicalists, and Labourists are very vigorous enemies of Internationalism just now, and, consequently, of any paper (or party) that is still preaching the solidarity of the world's workers which they once talked about. This explains the interesting behaviour of ex-Councillor Will Phillips, of Manchester, who, on Friday, purchased some copies of the LABOUR LEADER at the LEADER Offices in Blackfriars Street and burned them on the pavement outside. This dramatic display he followed with an impassioned outburst against us. A newspaper photographer accompanied him. The audience that gathered, however, did not appear to be suffering from the same outraged feelings; it dispersed in a very peaceable, leisurely, and good-humoured fashion. On Monday we received this letter:

> In this morning's Sunday Herald is a picture of a man, calling himself a Labour leader, publicly burning a copy of our paper, the LABOUR LEADER. Our answer to that, in Lambeth, is an order for 16 copies of the LABOUR LEADER every week, with strong hopes of an even bigger increase of circulation shortly. Good luck to you in your work for the Cause.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good!

* * *

Resolute Quaker Letter to M.P.s.

The following letter has been sent to members of the Cabinet and the House of Commons:

> On behalf of the Committee of the Society of Friends [illegible] held, when the following resolution was passed unanimously:

> We affirm our determination to resist compulsory military service, and declare now our intention to absolutely refuse to render any form of compulsory military or munitions service, whatever the consequences.

* * *

Letter to the Prime Minister.

A reader of the LABOUR LEADER, and a determined anti-Compulsionist in Selly Oak, Birmingham, has written to the Prime Minister and one or two other members of the Cabinet in this strain:

> Sir,—The Cabinet is said to have decided upon Compulsion. I write to tell you that there are some thousands of men of military age who are Pacifists and are convinced that all war is utterly unChristian. These men will, under no circumstances, undertake service which entails the killing of their fellow men, nor will most of them serve in any capacity the purpose of which is to increase efficiency in human slaughter. This is not a threat. We shall do no violence. We refuse to serve as soldiers because we repudiate all violence.—I am, yours respectfully,
>
> WILLIAM E. WILSON.

We have received similar communications from other correspondents. If the postbags of the Prime Minister and his colleagues were filled morning after morning with such letters the moral effect would be distinctly good.

* * *

Post Office Victimisation.

All the "temporary" men of enlistment age who have not attested at Mount Pleasant Office, the Inland Section of the General Post Office, have been given a week's notice. Many of these men have been employed for eight or nine months.

* * *

What Hodge and Roberts Told Bath.

[illegible] should have Compulsion—then we shall agree to it."

* * *

By the way, what has happened to Mr. Wells? Has the rapid Liberalisation of Russia suggested to him a wisdom in silence?

* * *

The Betrayal of Democracy.

Referring to the decision of the Government to legalise Compulsion, the Nation says: "This historic reversal of Liberalism and democracy was led and promoted by Mr. Lloyd George, and assented to by Mr. Henderson, the representative of Labour. These two betrayals have determined the issue for the moment, but the battle is not over yet." No, it isn't!

* * *

Twenty Years!

"Mr. McKenna," said the Times on Tuesday, "must be told, if he does not yet realise it, that a Chancellor of the Exchequer engaged in financing a war of this magnitude cannot lay down hard and fast lines on which to conduct it to its close. He must be constantly laying his plans afresh. He must devise alternative schemes for a war which may last one year more, or two, or twenty."

* * *

A Suggestion to Unmarried Resisters.

Mr. Noel Armstrong has written to the Premier stating that "as a single man who has not attested and who disagrees with all waste of blood," he will, "in the event of Conscription being enacted, decline to serve, whatever the penalty." He suggests that all single men who are united to resist should write Mr. Asquith similarly and thus give him [illegible] determined opposition a

Mrs. DESPARD ON COMPULSION

As one who knows better than most the difficulties of the workers and the dangers that beset them, you will permit me, I hope, to entreat them, through your columns not to be led astray, at this critical moment in our nation's history, by any fatal illusions. It is our business—our bounden duty—to protest in the strongest possible manner against the Compulsion Bill, so subtly thrust upon the country.

What does it mean? In the first place the concession of a principle. The people will presently discover that Compulsion of however limited a number means Compulsion of all. In the second place, the surrender of all that has given moral dignity to our army. Practical difficulties will arise, for how will the Conscript and voluntary elements in the new army mix? Man for man, ours are the finest fighting forces in the field. That is generally acknowledged, and the reason is that our men have not been fetched or compelled. They have freely given themselves. I have the honour of our own soldiers at heart when I pray that the age-long principle of individual liberty may be respected.

Why is it attacked? To those who can see at all clearly the answer is not far to find. Voluntaryism is expensive and troublesome. A cheap and a docile army is required. For, let us make no mistake, if Compulsion comes now it comes to stay. Rivers of blood may have to flow before the betrayed people of this country recover their lost liberty. I ask, in all earnestness, of them who call themselves patriots, could the Prussianism we are fighting have a greater triumph than this?

Less law and more liberty would have produced far better results than the force provided for in so many parts of the original Act. The confidence of the vast majority of workers can be commanded sooner by proving to them that they are being treated fairly and humanely than by trying to drive them away from such workshop privileges as they have enjoyed. Not that we desired to leave workshop conditions unaltered in face of the demands made upon labour by the war. Nor have many of us accepted the descriptions which some people applied to the Munitions Act as a whole. All classes in the community, with a few notable and fortunate exceptions, have had to forfeit some opportunities, privileges, or conditions of personal freedom formerly enjoyed by them. We have not objected to necessary legislation. We object to the irritating interference which has produced no good result in increasing the output of munitions. Under proper conditions the three principal objects aimed at in the Munitions of War Act could have been attained and could have been agreed to with little complaint if the Government had sought to attain them without needless provisions which have had the effect of wasting a great amount of time and labour, and which have produced in

MINGLING PATRIOTISM AND PROFIT.

The need for the last of these three provisions has been admitted in the very striking asides and odd instances found in Ministers' recent speeches. The Minister of Munitions even has dwelt upon the mingling of patriotism and profit which stands to the account of several employers. Dr. Addison, M.P., when he introduced the Amending Bill, said that the Government had been paying for certain munitions much more than they ought to pay, and a threat to one firm to examine the prices contracts had the effect of reducing the cost from £30 to £20 per ton, resulting in the saving of half a million in a short time.

If workmen had been guilty of any corresponding wrong against the country they would have been fined or imprisoned. The memorandum of the Amending Bill shows that no fundamental change will be effected by the Amendments. The memorandum tells us that the Act will apply to more shops and extend the definition of munitions work.

Section 7 of the principal Act is amended so as, amongst other things, to make the issue of certificates of discharge compulsory upon the employer when he dismisses a workman or suspends him for more than three days his skill or other personal qualifications could be employed with greater advantage to the national interest.

Organised labour is not to blame for these slender amendments, and only those who are trying to shape useful and necessary industrial legislation in war-time can understand the obstacles or appreciate the difficulties of securing Parliamentary attention for reasonable proposals.

WORKERS' INDIGNATION.

In at least half a dozen respects the Bill should have been drastically amended on the lines suggested in our conferences with Ministers or in accordance with the amendments put forward in the House of Commons. No provision has given more just offence, or excited greater indignation amongst workmen, than the restrictions imposed against men leaving work when they have desired to do so even for other munition employment. The employer had the power to dismiss when he chose, and the power to retain a workman, no matter how strong the workman's claim was for leaving. It is no answer to say that men could appeal to the Munitions Tribunal for a leaving certificate. Not one man in a thousand would get before such a tribunal.

lawyer sitting with two men reduced to ciphers. Collective responsibility and power of judgment should apply to the whole of the persons constituting the court, and as the courts have to deal more with workshop questions than points of law, Law Court procedure should be reduced and the methods of conference should take their place. Workshop and all other rules relating to the Act should be made uniform throughout the country, and should have the joint approval of representatives of workmen and of employers before the heads of firms should have any right to impose those rules on their employees. The Act should prevent workmen being reduced in status or pay and being moved to some class of work at a less rate than they previously received.

And, above all, effective provision should be made whereby complaints and grievances arising day by day can be more speedily settled and adjusted. Nothing has aroused more disgust in connection with war legislation than the hundreds of cases where groups of men have had to wait not merely weeks but months for the settlement of complaints which their Unions duly reported for them. In industry hope deferred is the greatest maker of the greatest trouble.

NOTES OF THE MOMENT.

"'Only the single men,' you say. Yes, only the thin end of the wedge."—Daily News, December 31, 1915.

* * *

Every Little Helps!

The pro-war Socialists, Syndicalists, and Labourists are very vigorous enemies of Internationalism just now, and, consequently, of any paper (or party) that is still preaching the solidarity of the world's workers which they once talked about. This explains the interesting behaviour of ex-Councillor Will Phillips, of Manchester, who, on Friday, purchased some copies of the LABOUR LEADER at the LEADER Offices in Blackfriars Street and burned them on the pavement outside. This dramatic display he followed with an impassioned outburst against us. A newspaper photographer accompanied him. The audience that gathered, however, did not appear to be suffering from the same outraged feelings; it dispersed in a very peaceable, leisurely, and good-humoured fashion. On Monday we received this letter:

> In this morning's Sunday Herald is a picture of a man, calling himself a Labour leader, publicly burning a copy of our paper, the LABOUR LEADER. Our answer to that, in Lambeth, is an order for 16 copies of the LABOUR LEADER every week, with strong hopes of an even bigger increase of circulation shortly. Good luck to you in your work for the Cause.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody any good!

* * *

Resolute Quaker Letter to M.P.s.

The following letter has been sent to members of the Cabinet and the House of Commons:

> On behalf of the Committee of the Society of Friends specially appointed to have charge of this matter, we write to inform you that if any measure having compulsory military service for its object should become law, the opposition of our Society will in no sense be modified or withdrawn. Such opposition is fundamental, and is based upon a conscientious objection to all warfare. We are further to inform you that if any such measure should become law, support and co-operation of members of the Society will be available for those outside their own body whose conscientious objection is based upon the same grounds.
>
> Signed on behalf of the Committee,
>
> EDWARD GRUBB.
> JOAN MARY FRY
> ROBERT O. MENNELL.

* * *

Determined Resistance.

After a public meeting for worship held at the Friends' Meeting House, Manchester, on January 2, a large impromptu meeting (consisting chiefly of men of military age) was held, when the following resolution was passed unanimously:

> We affirm our determination to resist compulsory military service, and declare now our intention to absolutely refuse to render any form of compulsory military or munitions service, whatever the consequences.

* * *

Letter to the Prime Minister.

A reader of the LABOUR LEADER, and a determined anti-Compulsionist in Selly Oak, Birmingham, has written to the Prime Minister and one or two other members of the Cabinet in this strain:

> Sir,—The Cabinet is said to have decided upon Compulsion. I write to tell you that there are some thousands of men of military age who are Pacifists and are convinced that all war is utterly unChristian. These men will, under no circumstances, undertake service which entails the killing of their fellow men, nor will most of them serve in any capacity the purpose of which is to increase efficiency in human slaughter. This is not a threat. We shall do no violence. We refuse to serve as soldiers because we repudiate all violence.—I am, yours respectfully,
>
> WILLIAM E. WILSON.

We have received similar communications from other correspondents. If the postbags of the Prime Minister and his colleagues were filled morning after morning with such letters the moral effect would be distinctly good.

* * *

Post Office Victimisation.

All the "temporary" men of enlistment age who have not attested at Mount Pleasant Office, the Inland Section of the General Post Office, have been given a week's notice. Many of these men have been employed for eighteen months.

* * *

What Hodge and Roberts Told Paris.

The attitude of mind of certain Labour "leaders" on Conscription is illustrated by a letter appearing above the signature "G. C. Coulton" in the Times of Thursday. Mr. Coulton attended a meeting in Paris on September 29, addressed by Mr. John Hodge and Mr. G. H. Roberts, "who had come to allay French misapprehensions as to the real greatness of the British effort in this war." Mr. Coulton says both Mr. Hodge and Mr. Roberts said the nation was ready to accept compulsion if Mr. Asquith and Lord Kitchener demanded it. He took down Mr. Hodge's words, which were: "Some people said that it (the Trade Union Congress) was against Conscription. Nothing of the kind! They only said they didn't believe the voluntary system had failed." And later: "Whenever a responsible Government says that voluntaryism has failed, and that, for the purpose of crushing the War Lords, it is necessary we should have Compulsion—then we shall agree to it."

* * *

By the way, what has happened to Mr. Wells? Has the rapid Liberalisation of Russia suggested to him a wisdom in silence?

* * *

The Betrayal of Democracy.

Referring to the decision of the Government to legalise Compulsion, the Nation says: "This historic reversal of Liberalism and democracy was led and promoted by Mr. Lloyd George, and assented to by Mr. Henderson, the representative of Labour. These two betrayals have determined the issue for the moment, but the battle is not over yet." No, it isn't!

* * *

Twenty Years!

"Mr. McKenna," said the Times on Tuesday, "must be told, if he does not yet realise it, that a Chancellor of the Exchequer engaged in financing a war of this magnitude cannot lay down hard and fast lines on which to conduct it to its close. He must be constantly laying his plans afresh. He must devise alternative schemes for a war which may last one year more, or two, or twenty."

* * *

A Suggestion to Unmarried Resisters.

Mr. Noel Armstrong has written to the Premier stating that "as a single man who has not attested and who disagrees with all warfare of blood," he will, "in the event of Conscription being enacted, decline to serve, whatever the penalty." He suggests that all single men determined to resist should write Mr. Asquith similarly and thus give him some idea of the determined opposition a measure of Compulsion will arouse.

* * *

The German Minority.

According to "Homo," in L'Humanité, the names of the 20 German Socialist Parliamentary Deputies who voted against the recent German War Credits are as follows: Bernsten, Bock, Buechner, Cohn, Dillmann, Geyer, Haase, Herzfeld, Henke, Horn, Kunert, Ledebour, Liebnecht, Bruchne, Schwaz, Stadthager, Stolle, Vogtherr, Wurm, and Zubeil. The remainder of the opposition abstained from voting.

Immediately afterwards a vote of censure was passed by the group in the Reichstag against the 20 by 65 votes. Following upon this vote of censure, Haase resigned from his position as president of the Parliamentary Group. He still remains president of the Party.

Mrs. DESPARD ON COMPULSION

As one who knows better than most the difficulties of the workers and the dangers that beset them, you will permit me, I hope, to entreat them, through your columns not to be led astray, at this critical moment in our nation's history, by any fatal illusions. It is our business—our bounden duty—to protest in the strongest possible manner against the Compulsion Bill, so subtly thrust upon the country.

What does it mean? In the first place the concession of a principle. The people will presently discover that Compulsion of however limited a number means Compulsion of all. In the second place, the surrender of all that has given moral dignity to our army. Practical difficulties will arise, for how will the Conscript and voluntary elements in the new army mix? Man for man, ours are the finest fighting forces in the field. That is generally acknowledged, and the reason is that our men have not been fetched or compelled. They have freely given themselves. I have the honour of our own soldiers at heart when I pray that the age-long principle of individual liberty may be respected.

Why is it attacked? To those who can see at all clearly the answer is not far to find. Voluntaryism is expensive and troublesome. A cheap and a docile army is required. For, let us make no mistake, if Compulsion comes now it comes to stay. Rivers of blood may have to flow before the betrayed people of this country recover their lost liberty. I ask, in all earnestness, of them who call themselves patriots, could the Prussianism we are fighting have a greater triumph than this?

DON'T BE MISLED.

We must fight Conscription tooth and nail, no matter how it is watered down. It is fatal to Trade Unionism and to democratic development. It is not needed for the purposes of this war, but to keep the people in subjection afterwards. We must not be misled by the clever trick of setting married against single men. They will suffer equally in future. The Irish will not have Conscription, why should the English suffer it? A united stand, a determination to down tools, will still prevent the imposition of this evil. Now is the moment to prove what Englishmen are made of. If they submit, they will deserve the curses of generations to come. We must demand Conscription of wealth in the hands of the few—that would soon bring the war to a close.

HENRY BROCKHOUSE.

Labour Leader GIFT OFFER FREE!

NO RISK OF LOSS OR EXPENSE.

GUARANTEE.

I guarantee that the deposit will be promptly refunded by the Publishers to any reader who is not thoroughly satisfied.

E Whiteley

SOME APRECIATIONS (Originals can be seen).

Mr. P. H GALLAGHER, of New Ferry, says:
"I am delighted with them. They are splendid value for the money, and the type being excellent they will make a fine addition to my library, and I would advise every reader to go in for the same offer."

Mr. J. HUTCHINGS, of Mountain Ash, says:
"The books are fine, and the terms upon which they are purchased make it possible to many hundreds like myself to become the immediate possessor of beautiful literary treasures which otherwise would take months to get."

Mr. J. B. BURT, of Douglas, Isle of Man, says:
"The books are splendid. I am very pleased with them. In addition to the literary value of them, which is unquestioned, the get-up is attractive and tasteful. They look well as well as read well."

Miss M. LEWIS, of Hastings, says:
"I am delighted indeed with the exquisite books, they are indeed treasures, and I am positive no other offer has ever been made to place such a priceless choice of literature within the reach of all classes on such terms."

Colonel A. BEALE, of Cheltenham, says:
"I am delighted with the bargain, and when I have another 18s. to invest in literature I shall certainly try to get another dozen."

Miss M. BARKER, of Stockport, says:
"I am extremely pleased with them, and I shall most certainly recommend them to my friends."

Mr. T. HERRON, of Johnstone, N.B., says:
"I must say I am delighted with the books."

THE GIFT OFFER to our readers which we announced in our Christmas Number has met with such a hearty response and we have received so many expressions of appreciation that after consultation with the publishers of "The Essential Library," we have decided to set apart further copies of Mr. Ramsay Macdonald's important book "Socialism and Government" to be presented free to each reader who purchases twelve volumes of the "Essential Library." No one who has a taste for really good literature produced in a suitable and attractive form at a reasonable cost, can start the year better than by obtaining this

GENUINE BOOK BARGAIN.

There are many books which one does not require or wish to read more than once; these can be obtained from the Public Library. There are others, masterpieces of literature, which one cannot read too often—these must be within easy reach. Of such is the "Essential Library." These are really indispensable books, no library is complete without a selection of them. The production of the Volumes included in this Library, which we have selected for our special scheme, is in perfect keeping with the high standard of their contents.

The terms of purchase are also most convenient and easy.

It is because of these facts that we wish as many of our readers as possible to obtain the advantages offered and has caused us to present a copy of "Socialism and Government" to each purchaser.

FREE

The Essential Library in itself is a marvel of cheapness. We have satisfied ourselves on that score by a careful examination of the volumes, and we say without hesitation that we have seen nothing better in the way of book making for the money. This is our candid opinion, but our arrangements with the publishers are such that each reader MAY JUDGE FOR HIMSELF OR HERSELF without any risk of loss or expense—see the Manager's personal guarantee.

This Library has many attractive features. Each Volume measures 6½ x 4½ inches and contains at least 300 pages of beautiful clear type. The volumes are suitable for the bookcase or the pocket. They are tastefully and strongly bound in blue-green cloth. Each page is printed in two colours, headlines in red. Each volume has a portrait of the Author. Also an introduction by an eminent man or woman of letters.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Select 12 Volumes from the list given herewith, enter the numbers of these volumes in the order form, also your name and address, and send the order form, together with 1s. postal order, to us and the Library of 12 Volumes together with the Gift Book will be sent to you carriage paid. You will then remit ten further payments of 1s. 6d. per month, and a final payment of 2s. will complete the purchase. No extra charge is made for this convenient method of payment. We would draw special attention to the Manager's guarantee that the deposit which accompanies the order will be promptly refunded by the publishers to any reader who is not thoroughly satisfied.

ESSENTIAL LIBRARY.

1 Spectator Essays
2 Arnold, Poems
4 The Ingoldsby Legends
5 Johnson's Table Talk
24 Hunt, Imagination and Fancy
25 Ingelow, Poems
26 Keats, Poems
27 Keble, the Christian Year
46 Wordsworth, Poems
47 A Sixteenth Century Anthology
48 A Seventeenth Century Anthology
49 An Eighteenth Century Antho-

Any reader who desires to purchase two Libraries of 12 Volumes each from

CUT OFF HERE.—SEND TO-DAY.

6/1/16.

To the National Labour Press, Limited,
39, Blackfriars Street, Manchester.

Please send me volumes numbered taste for really good literature produced in a suitable and attractive form at a reasonable cost, can start the year better than by obtaining this

GENUINE BOOK BARGAIN.

There are many books which one does not require or wish to read more than once; these can be obtained from the Public Library. There are others, masterpieces of literature, which one cannot read too often—these must be within easy reach. Of such is the "Essential Library." These are really indispensable books, no library is complete without a selection of them. The production of the Volumes included in this Library, which we have selected for our special scheme, is in perfect keeping with the high standard of their contents.

The terms of purchase are also most convenient and easy.

It is because of these facts that we wish as many of our readers as possible to obtain the advantages offered and has caused us to present a copy of "Socialism and Government" to each purchaser.

FREE

The Essential Library

in itself is a marvel of cheapness. We have satisfied ourselves on that score by a careful examination of the volumes, and we say without hesitation that we have seen nothing better in the way of book making for the money. This is our candid opinion, but our arrangements with the publishers are such that each reader MAY JUDGE FOR HIMSELF OR HERSELF without any risk of loss or expense—see the Manager's personal guarantee.

This Library has many attractive features. Each Volume measures 6½ x 4½ inches and contains at least 300 pages of beautiful clear type. The volumes are suitable for the bookcase or the pocket. They are tastefully and strongly bound in blue-green cloth. Each page is printed in two colours, headlines in red. Each volume has a portrait of the Author. Also an introduction by an eminent man or woman of letters.

any reader who is not thoroughly satisfied.

E. Whiteley

SOME APRECIATIONS (Originals can be seen).

Mr. P. H GALLAGHER, of New Ferry, says:
"I am delighted with them. They are splendid value for the money, and the type being excellent they will make a fine addition to my library, and I would advise every reader to go in for the same offer."

Mr. J. HUTCHINGS, of Mountain Ash, says:
"The books are fine, and the terms upon which they are purchased make it possible to many hundreds like myself to become the immediate possessor of beautiful literary treasures which otherwise would take months to get."

Mr. J. B. BURT, of Douglas, Isle of Man, says:
"The books are splendid. I am very pleased with them. In addition to the literary value of them, which is unquestioned, the get-up is attractive and tasteful. They look well as well as read well."

Miss M. LEWIS, of Hastings, says:
"I am delighted indeed with the exquisite books, they are indeed treasures, and I am positive no other offer has ever been made to place such a priceless choice of literature within the reach of all classes on such terms."

Colonel A. BEALE, of Cheltenham, says:
"I am delighted with the bargain, and when I have another 18s. to invest in literature I shall certainly try to get another dozen."

Miss M. BARKER, of Stockport, says:
"I am extremely pleased with them, and I shall most certainly recommend them to my friends."

Mr. T. HERRON, of Johnstone, N.B., says:
"I must say I am delighted with the books."

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Select 12 Volumes from the list given herewith, enter the numbers of these volumes in the order form, also your name and address, and send the order form, together with 1s. postal order, to us and the Library of 12 Volumes together with the Gift Book will be sent to you carriage paid. You will then remit ten further payments of 1s. 6d. per month, and a final payment of 2s. will complete the purchase. No extra charge is made for this convenient method of payment. We would draw special attention to the Manager's guarantee that the deposit which accompanies the order will be promptly refunded by the publishers to any reader who is not thoroughly satisfied.

ESSENTIAL LIBRARY.

1 Spectator Essays
2 Arnold, Poems
4 The Ingoldsby Legends
5 Johnson's Table Talk
6 E. B. Browning, Poems
7 R. Browning, Poems
8 Burns, Poems
9 Byron, Poems
10 Calverley, Verses and Translations
11 Carleton, Stories
12 Carlyle, Essays
13 Coleridge, Poems
14 Cowper, Poems
15 De Quincey, Opium Eater
16 De Quincey, Essays
17 Emerson, Essays
18 Hazlitt, Essays
19 Herbert, Poems
20 Herrick, Poems
21 Holmes, Autocrat of the Breakfast Table
22 Holmes, Professor Breakfast Table
23 Hood, Poems
24 Hunt, Imagination and Fancy
25 Ingelow, Poems
26 Keats, Poems
27 Keble, the Christian Year
28 Keble, The Psalter in English Verse
29 Lamb, Essays of Elia
30 Lamb, Last Essays of Elia
31 Landor, Imaginary Conversations
32 Longfellow, Poems
33 Russell Lowell, Poems
34 Milton, Poems
35 More, Utopia
36 Rossetti, Poems
37 Ruskin, Sesame and Lilies
38 Shelley, Poems
39 Tennyson, Poems
40 Tennyson, In Memoriam
41 Thackeray, Roundabout Papers
42 Thackeray, Four Georges
43 Thoreau, Walden
44 Vaughan, Silex Scintillans
45 Whittier, Poems
46 Wordsworth, Poems
47 A Sixteenth Century Anthology
48 A Seventeenth Century Anthology
49 An Eighteenth Century Anthology
50 A Book of Parodies
51 Goldsmith, Plays and Poems
52 Thackeray, Book of Snobs
53 Marcus Aurelius' Meditations
54 Williams Blake, Poems
55 Dryden, Poems
56 A. E. Kinglake, "Eothen"
57 Sir William Temple, Essays
58 Religio Medici Sir Thomas Browne
59 Montaigne, Essays*
60 Flowers of St. Francis
61 Sheridan, Plays
62 The Imitation of Christ
63 Confessions of St. Augustine
64 Pope, Poems

Any reader who desires to purchase two Libraries of 12 Volumes each from the list will be presented with two Gift Books. In such cases a double deposit will be sent and the monthly payments will be doubled.

CUT OFF HERE.—SEND TO-DAY.

6/1/16.

To the National Labour Press, Limited,
30, Blackfriars Street, Manchester.

Please send me volumes numbered .....

.....

of the "Labour Leader Essential Library" and special Gift Book, "Socialism and Government." I enclose 1s., and agree to send to whom you may depute 1s. 6d. per month for ten months and a final payment of 2s. to complete the purchase.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Foreign Customers to send 5s. with order.

679/12

AT GRIPS WITH OUI

OPPOSITION OF REPRESENTATIVE LEADERS.

W. C. ANDERSON, M.P.

The Trade Union Congress last September passed a strong resolution against Conscription, and the supreme moment of the Congress was when that great and fearless leader of the miners, Mr. Robert Smillie, thrilled the delegates by his out-spoken declaration. Labour was called in to help with the Derby scheme and "save the country from Conscription," but when the Prime Minister was jockeyed by the compulsionists into giving a pledge which reduced the campaign to a farce, Labour was not consulted. Behind all that is going on is not military or national necessity, but the sinister power of a restless and irresponsible peer-pressman, who thinks the war should be run for the special advantage of his papers, and the over-weening ambition of a member of the Cabinet who thinks he sees his chance of cleaving his way to the chief place.

Organised Labour must speak, and promptly. The Conscriptionist case is shallow and superficial. It has only to be explained and understood in order to disappear. But war is always a favourable time for political reaction, for people are caught in the grip of a common fear, and their minds in many ways are imprisoned. It is at any rate the clear duty of those who see the certain dangers of Conscription to speak out plainly and to make an unflinching stand, be the consequences what they may.

TOM RICHARDSON, M.P.

When the war broke out Labour was asked to fight in defence of national liberties, and against Prussian Militarism. If the British Democracy is to retain the remnants left of our one-time British liberties, and prevent the conspirators from imposing upon us Prussian Militarism, the time when they must rise in their strength, courage, and determination to resist the proposal of the present Government is now. The issue is a momentous one for this and future generations. It is sincerely to be hoped that the National Conference will sound a clarion note and make it known in terms clear and strong that the Trade Union, Labour, and Socialist movements will not have any form of compulsory military service.

As a Nonconformist, may I also appeal to the Nonconformist conscience to assert itself and be loyal to its oft-declared pledge to fight any and every form of compulsory military service. If we fail at this critical moment, we will have betrayed the trust handed down to us by our forebears, and fasten a manacle around the necks of democracy for future generations. We must not fail nor falter.

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

The object of the Conscriptionists is not to obtain soldiers in order to defeat Germany. Germany will not be defeated by the addition of a hundred thousand or so additional unmarried recruits. She will be defeated, if defeated at all, by our chemists and munition workers and by the magnitude of our financial and manufacturing resources. The real purpose of the Conscriptionists is twofold: (1) To enable Great Britain to pose as a dominant military as well as naval world-power, and (2) To discipline and coerce the workers of Great Britain into submission to their profit-grinding lords and masters.

The decision of the Cabinet to bring in a measure of compulsory military service, signals, I believe, the beginning of a period of internal struggle in this country which may lead to events excelling in revolutionary significance those of the days of the Great Rebellion. I am not referring simply to the direct opposition and resistance to tyrannical law which the measure, if passed, will immediately evoke, or to the aftermath of violent resentment which will spring up when the war is over and the people realise how on the plea of fighting down Prussian Militarism abroad, engage in human slaughter at the bidding of a handful of diplomats and Cabinet Ministers, as the most monstrous of all tyrannies, there is no course left but to resist oppression of Conscription to the utmost. There is no struggle in which we are ever likely to be engaged that will appeal more intensely to our highest sense of duty, to our courage and devotion. Thousands of our fellowmen are yielding up their lives on sea and land far away, believing that thereby they are repelling foreign military aggression from our shores. It rests with us to make whatever sacrifice is necessary to oppose and defeat this no less affronting power of militarism at home.

ROBERT SMILLIE.

(President of the Miners' Federation.)

Mr. Robert Smillie, interviewed by a correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, said the attitude of the miners of Great Britain had all along been that there was no necessity for Conscription. They were opposed to Conscription in any shape or form.

In reply to the question, "If the Bill limits the principle of compulsion to those single men who have not attested under Lord Derby's scheme, do you think their attitude will undergo any modification," Mr. Smillie replied: "This is my personal opinion I am giving. I do not believe their view will show any modification, even in these circumstances."

GEORGE LANSBURY.

The present crisis is a very grave one indeed, but is by no means hopeless. We must all just buckle on our armour and resolve to use every means in our power to prevent this accursed proposal being carried into effect. No military need has been proven; it is certain the Compulsionists want compulsion solely for industrial purposes. We must demand national organisation of industry for the benefit of the whole people as a direct alternative to the conscripting and bullying of the working people.

Some friends say, if we defeat Mr. Asquith there will be a General Election, and we shall be beaten. I don't accept either proposition. Even if they are both true, what difference does it make to us? Conscription from Mr. Asquith, or Sir E. Carson, or Mr. Lloyd George, is equally an outrage, whoever it is that puts the loathsome yoke on our necks.

We must all strive to maintain freedom of conscience for young and old at all costs. We must forget all our old quarrels and unite with men and women of all parties of all creeds who will work with us in order to prevent the manhood of our land being degraded to the level of industrial serfs.

J. WINSTONE.

(President of the South Wales Miners' Federation.)

My advice to the workers is to use every means in their power to destroy the diabolical plot on the part of the self-seeking politicians and editors of prominent capitalistic-controlled newspapers to bring about this crisis in our national affairs.

I feel sure the Welsh miners can be relied upon, if needs be, again to save the soul of the Trade Union movement of this country by refusing to be parties to the vile conspiracy on the part of the governing classes to deprive the people of Britain of the principles of Freedom and civic rights for which our forebears lived, fought, and died.

Our brave boys at the front are, so we are informed, fighting to destroy Prussian militarism. We shall be unworthy of our heritage if we do not strike, and strike hard and successfully, against a system under which workmen would be liable to military and industrial Conscription, without the right to leave work, whatever the terms or conditions of employment imposed by the Government.

The fighting spirit for liberty and justice within the Welsh miners is not dead, so intri- defend Labour. Liberty for the future depends more upon the rank and file of the movement than upon those who are deemed to be leaders.

Unity now means every possible concession to reaction. The Conscriptionist press exhibits a very keen anxiety just now that the Prime Minister should keep his pledges to the married men. Labour members are giving consent, born of cowardly silence, also apparently to assist Mr. Asquith to keep his pledge. What is to happen to the pledge that both he and Lord Derby gave to the Joint Labour Recruiting Committee? It is notorious that the assistance given by these six chosen representatives of Labour was and is conditional upon the full maintenance of the voluntary system. There was, moreover, a standing agreement between these Labour men and Lord Derby that there should be no differentiation between married and single.

We now see that the infamous Derby scheme was merely a subterfuge to force Conscription upon the country, in spite of its wishes and in spite of the pledges given to the six Labour representatives associated with Lord Derby in the "Appeal to Free Men." It appears, moreover, that Mr. Henderson, whose bona fides as a Labour representative may now warrantably be questioned, has extracted a promise from those who attended last Friday's Conference that they would not discuss the position until the National Conference was held. It is astounding that those who have been put into responsible positions in our Labour movement, to guard all that that movement holds dear, should allow the case for the maintenance of the voluntary system to go by default, the while that the Conscriptionist press looks upon Compulsion as an accomplished fact. Even the Liberal press is scuttling from the principles of its own party. It remains for the common people through their organisations to defeat this infamous attempt to lead us back to slavery.

Let me remind Trade Unionists of the opinion of the members of the Central Council of the International Transport Workers' Federation, all of them Germans, and speaking of German conditions as compared with our own prior to the war. Speaking of the success of the mass strike in this country, and the possibilities upon which the success of the mass strike depend, they say:

> These are absent to-day in Germany (1913). The employers' readiness to cover any breach of their organisations by the employment of machine guns is ever present, in order that the shedding of blood may add to the reality of the position. The German condition of affairs entirely prohibits Trade Union mass action after the nature of the strikes in England.

This, tellingly expressed, is the reason why the Morning Post, the Times, the Daily Mail, and other reactionary organs want Conscription.

It is the bounden duty of Trade Unionists to stiffen the backs of their leaders. Many of these leaders are more concerned with the maintenance of a few seats in Parliament than they are with the maintenance of the liberties of the working class. Let us have a dissolution, let us have a general election, let us have what we may, we must not, we shall not, have Conscription!

May I say for myself that my age is 34, and I am inclined to believe that I would pass the medical test. No power on this earth will compel me to take military service against my will. My own position was determined some fourteen months ago, when Britain may seriously have been in danger. Having determined then not to offer myself, it is not within the wit of any Cabinet or any Government to frame a law to make me serve against my own will power. What I can do, there are hundreds of thousands of others that can do likewise.

We must smash this piece of political chicanery if we have to give lives as freely to [illegible] from militarism at home as and all their works should be resisted to the death. Some of our colleagues have proved themselves weak and servile when the testing-time came, but this was only to be expected of some of them at least, and that is no reason why we should play the part of the flunkey and betray all our principles.

W. A. APPLETON.

(Secretary of the General Federation of Trade Unions.)

It is not because we fear the dangers of active service that we oppose compulsion, but because we are race-proud, and have felt conscious of our ability to do more as free men than we could as conscripts. Because we dare to express our disinclination to accept all the consequences of other people's blunders we are threatened with the severest of penalties. If that is the game, so be it.—Star, January 3, 1916.

J. H. HUDSON, M.A.

(Labour Candidate for Eccles.)

The Government have led us into the ambush of Conscription. But only they are deceived who deserved to be deceived. In the I.L.P. our eyes have been too long accustomed to the tricks and deceit practised against Democracy to be deceived by the latest Derby-Asquith subterfuges. A Government like this, professedly for the sake of keeping the pledge of a moment, a pledge which every previous pledge precluded it from making, betrays every promise and principle by which it received its trust, is worthy of any treachery, even that of giving this country over to the enemy.

Our unwavering resistance to Conscription shall prove in this darkest hour of the nation's need the greatest service we can do our Motherland. England needs now more than ever, since the days of Hampden, the brave hearts and true who will not have their country's idealism and liberty thrown by traitors to be trampled on by the tyranny of militarism.

It shall be my part in the I.L.P. to live and die the part of the true Englishman. They shall never conscript me Neither shall they shackle the souls of the thousands and thousands of young men who, I know, will stand with me.

Thank God that the Liberty of the England we have sworn to build and love can never die.

Thank God for the I.L.P. and the resistance to Conscription which shall know no defeat.

BEN C. SPOOR.

(Labour Candidate for Bishop Auckland.)

The attitude of the I.L.P. to Conscription must be one of uncompromising opposition. The task of preserving and securing human freedom is a bigger one than that of defending hard-won working-class rights. This latter has engaged the I.L.P. and its organ, the LABOUR LEADER, while certain Trade Union leaders, acting maybe from sincere motives, have surrendered one by one vital elements of working-class combination. The war is terrible in its physical results; it may be even more terrible in the spiritual loss its conduct involves. And Conscription strikes a blow at that freedom of thought and conscience that is the final stronghold, as it is the source, of democratic idea and principle. The issue is infinitely more serious than many seem to imagine. Happily there are indications of a strong opposition, and in that opposition the I.L.P. in its very nature is bound to play a large part. In the fulness of time it will reap the reward of its consistency. Governments come and go, but Democracy lives on, and, even during days of darkness, may forge new weapons with which to establish more firmly its kingdom in the world.

ALDERMAN BEN TURNER.

(Mayor of Batley.)

I am emphatically opposed to Conscription. It is a constitutional change that it is abhorrent to all lovers of Freedom.

necessity, but the sinister power of a restless and irresponsible peer-pressman, who thinks the war should be run for the special advantage of his papers, and the over-weening ambition of a member of the Cabinet who thinks he sees his chance of cleaving his way to the chief place.

Organised Labour must speak, and promptly. The Conscriptionist case is shallow and superficial. It has only to be explained and understood in order to disappear. But war is always a favourable time for political reaction, for people are caught in the grip of a common fear, and their minds in many ways are imprisoned. It is at any rate the clear duty of those who see the certain dangers of Conscription to speak out plainly and to make an unflinching stand, be the consequences what they may.

TOM RICHARDSON, M.P.

When the war broke out Labour was asked to fight in defence of national liberties, and against Prussian Militarism. If the British Democracy is to retain the remnants left of our one-time British liberties, and prevent the conspirators from imposing upon us Prussian Militarism, the time when they must rise in their strength, courage, and determination to resist the proposal of the present Government is now. The issue is a momentous one for this and future generations. It is sincerely to be hoped that the National Conference will sound a clarion note and make it known in terms clear and strong that the Trade Union, Labour, and Socialist movements will not have any form of compulsory military service.

As a Nonconformist, may I also appeal to the Nonconformist conscience to assert itself and be loyal to its oft-declared pledge to fight any and every form of compulsory military service. If we fail at this critical moment, we will have betrayed the trust handed down to us by our forebears, and fasten a manacle around the necks of democracy for future generations. We must not fail nor falter.

J. BRUCE GLASIER.

The object of the Conscriptionists is not to obtain soldiers in order to defeat Germany. Germany will not be defeated by the addition of a hundred thousand or so additional unmarried recruits. She will be defeated, if defeated at all, by our chemists and munition workers and by the magnitude of our financial and manufacturing resources. The real purpose of the Conscriptionists is twofold: (1) To enable Great Britain to pose as a dominant military as well as naval world-power, and (2) To discipline and coerce the workers of Great Britain into submission to their profit-grinding lords and masters.

The decision of the Cabinet to bring in a measure of compulsory military service, signals, I believe, the beginning of a period of internal struggle in this country which may lead to events excelling in revolutionary significance those of the days of the Great Rebellion. I am not referring simply to the direct opposition and resistance to tyrannical law which the measure, if passed, will immediately evoke, or to the aftermath of violent resentment which will spring up when the war is over and the people realise how on the plea of fighting down Prussian Militarism abroad, they have been humbugged into accepting the yoke of Prussian Militarism at home. These will, I doubt not, prove formidable enough manifestations. But I am thinking also of the consequences that must inevitably follow the introduction of compulsory soldiering on the industrial conditions, and the moral and political feelings of the nation. Conscription alike in its principle and in practical operation is absolutely foreign to British liberty, British character, and British ways of life. Not even the revival of religious prosecution would furnish so direct a challenge as will the enactment of Conscription to all that lies deep in the heart of British democracy. Religious persecution has in times past been known and endured in this country, but Conscription never.

For the I.L.P., and all who believe in liberty, abhor the compulsion to bear arms and confronting power of militarism at home.

ROBERT SMILLIE.

(President of the Miners' Federation.)

Mr. Robert Smillie, interviewed by a correspondent of the Manchester Guardian, said the attitude of the miners of Great Britain had all along been that there was no necessity for Conscription. They were opposed to Conscription in any shape or form.

In reply to the question, "If the Bill limits the principle of compulsion to those single men who have not attested under Lord Derby's scheme, do you think their attitude will undergo any modification," Mr. Smillie replied: "This is my personal opinion I am giving. I do not believe their view will show any modification, even in these circumstances."

GEORGE LANSBURY.

The present crisis is a very grave one indeed, but is by no means hopeless. We must all just buckle on our armour and resolve to use every means in our power to prevent this accursed proposal being carried into effect. No military need has been proven; it is certain the Compulsionists want compulsion solely for industrial purposes. We must demand national organisation of industry for the benefit of the whole people as a direct alternative to the conscripting and bullying of the working people.

Some friends say, if we defeat Mr. Asquith there will be a General Election, and we shall be beaten. I don't accept either proposition. Even if they are both true, what difference does it make to us? Conscription from Mr. Asquith, or Sir E. Carson, or Mr. Lloyd George, is equally an outrage, whoever it is that puts the loathsome yoke on our necks.

We must all strive to maintain freedom of conscience for young and old at all costs. We must forget all our old quarrels and unite with men and women of all parties of all creeds who will work with us in order to prevent the manhood of our land being degraded to the level of industrial serfs.

J. WINSTONE.

(President of the South Wales Miners' Federation.)

My advice to the workers is to use every means in their power to destroy the diabolical plot on the part of the self-seeking politicians and editors of prominent capitalistic-controlled newspapers to bring about this crisis in our national affairs.

I feel sure the Welsh miners can be relied upon, if needs be, again to save the soul of the Trade Union movement of this country by refusing to be parties to the vile conspiracy on the part of the governing classes to deprive the people of Britain of the principles of Freedom and civic rights for which our forebears lived, fought, and died.

Our brave boys at the front are, so we are informed, fighting to destroy Prussian militarism. We shall be unworthy of our heritage if we do not strike, and strike hard and successfully, against a system under which workmen would be liable to military and industrial Conscription, without the right to leave work, whatever the terms or conditions of employment imposed by the Government.

The fighting spirit for liberty and justice within the Welsh miners is not dead, so intriguing Cabinets beware! Long live the Welsh miners with their insatiable desire for Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality.

Shall our Freedom die? Then two hundred thousand Welsh miners will know the reason why.

ROBERT WILLIAMS.

(Secretary of the Transport Workers' Federation.)

All the sinister forces of military and industrial Conscription are rapidly at work. What is Labour to do in order to resist these forces? Many of the so-called leaders of Labour have already been stupefied by the influences of the press. The press, now more than ever, is unworthy and unreliable. The position we stand in at the present moment is that Liberals are unable to defend Liberalism because Labour men lack the backbone to oppose this, the assistance given by the six chosen representatives of Labour was and is conditional upon the full maintenance of the voluntary system. There was, moreover, a standing agreement between these Labour men and Lord Derby that there should be no differentiation between married and single.

We now see that the infamous Derby scheme was merely a subterfuge to force Conscription upon the country, in spite of its wishes and in spite of the pledges given to the six Labour representatives associated with Lord Derby in the "Appeal to Free Men." It appears, moreover, that Mr. Henderson, whose bona fides as a Labour representative may now warrantably be questioned, has extracted a promise from those who attended last Friday's Conference that they would not discuss the position until the National Conference was held. It is astounding that those who have been put into responsible positions in our Labour movement, to guard all that that movement holds dear, should allow the case for the maintenance of the voluntary system to go by default, the while that the Conscriptionist press looks upon Compulsion as an accomplished fact. Even the Liberal press is scuttling from the principles of its own party. It remains for the common people through their organisations to defeat this infamous attempt to lead us back to slavery.

Let me remind Trade Unionists of the opinion of the members of the Central Council of the International Transport Workers' Federation, all of them Germans, and speaking of German conditions as compared with our own prior to the war. Speaking of the success of the mass strike in this country, and the possibilities upon which the success of the mass strike depend, they say:

> These are absent to-day in Germany (1913). The employers' readiness to cover any breach of their organisations by the employment of machine guns is ever present, in order that the shedding of blood may add to the reality of the position. The German condition of affairs entirely prohibits Trade Union mass action after the nature of the strikes in England.

This, tellingly expressed, is the reason why the Morning Post, the Times, the Daily Mail, and other reactionary organs want Conscription.

It is the bounden duty of Trade Unionists to stiffen the backs of their leaders. Many of these leaders are more concerned with the maintenance of a few seats in Parliament than they are with the maintenance of the liberties of the working class. Let us have a dissolution, let us have a general election, let us have what we may, we must not, we shall not, have Conscription!

May I say for myself that my age is 34, and I am inclined to believe that I would pass the medical test. No power on this earth will compel me to take military service against my will. My own position was determined some fourteen months ago, when Britain may seriously have been in danger. Having determined then not to offer myself, it is not within the wit of any Cabinet or any Government to frame a law to make me serve against my own will power. What I can do, there are hundreds of thousands of others that can do likewise.

We must smash this piece of political chicanery if we have to give lives as freely to protect ourselves from militarism at home as our fellow countrymen are giving their lives to combat militarism abroad.

ALEX. GOSSIP.

(General Secretary of the Furnishing Trades Association.)

It is my firm and convinced opinion that those who are trying to fasten the fetters of Conscription on the peoples of Great Britain are more concerned with the enslavement of the people than anything else, and the present European War is only being used as an excuse. There is absolutely nothing to choose between them and the vilest Prussian who ever played the part of an autocrat and despot.

Those in favour of Conscription have always been the bitter enemies of our class, and they scious of our ability to do more as free men than we could as conscripts. Because we dare to express our disinclination to accept all the consequences of other people's blunders we are threatened with the severest of penalties. If that is the game, so be it.—Star, January 3, 1916.

J. H. HUDSON, M.A.

(Labour Candidate for Eccles.)

The Government have led us into the ambush of Conscription. But only they are deceived who deserved to be deceived. In the I.L.P. our eyes have been too long accustomed to the tricks and deceit practised against Democracy to be deceived by the latest Derby-Asquith subterfuges. A Government like this, professedly for the sake of keeping the pledge of a moment, a pledge which every previous pledge precluded it from making, betrays every promise and principle by which it received its trust, is worthy of any treachery, even that of giving this country over to the enemy.

Our unwavering resistance to Conscription shall prove in this darkest hour of the nation's need the greatest service we can do our Motherland. England needs now more than ever, since the days of Hampden, the brave hearts and true who will not have their country's idealism and liberty thrown by traitors to be trampled on by the tyranny of militarism.

It shall be my part in the I.L.P. to live and die the part of the true Englishman. They shall never conscript me Neither shall they shackle the souls of the thousands and thousands of young men who, I know, will stand with me.

Thank God that the Liberty of the England we have sworn to build and love can never die.

Thank God for the I.L.P. and the resistance to Conscription which shall know no defeat.

BEN C. SPOOR.

(Labour Candidate for Bishop Auckland.)

The attitude of the I.L.P. to Conscription must be one of uncompromising opposition. The task of preserving and securing human freedom is a bigger one than that of defending hard-won working-class rights. This latter has engaged the I.L.P. and its organ, the LABOUR LEADER, while certain Trade Union leaders, acting maybe from sincere motives, have surrendered one by one vital elements of working-class combination. The war is terrible in its physical results; it may be even more terrible in the spiritual loss its conduct involves. And Conscription strikes a blow at that freedom of thought and conscience that is the final stronghold, as it is the source, of democratic idea and principle. The issue is infinitely more serious than many seem to imagine. Happily there are indications of a strong opposition, and in that opposition the I.L.P. in its very nature is bound to play a large part. In the fulness of time it will reap the reward of its consistency. Governments come and go, but Democracy lives on, and, even during days of darkness, may forge new weapons with which to establish more firmly its kingdom in the world.

ALDERMAN BEN TURNER.

(Mayor of Batley.)

I am emphatically opposed to Conscription. It is a constitutional change that it is abhorrent to all lovers of Freedom.

It is not needed even for military purposes. It is called for by the Milners, the Northcliffes, and other men who have shown themselves opposed to working-class movements. The claims of the military have been met on each call that has been made. Voluntarism has succeeded in getting the total number required for the Army.

The cryptic explanation of the Prime Minister's alleged pledge is no excuse for a nation to lose its soul, and a people its Freedom.

I hope the Special Trade Union Congress will declare against compulsion, even though it is claimed that the House of Lords will throw out the Parliament Act, and force a General Election unless their friends get compulsion.

But the House of Lords may try to defend

R OWN "PRUSSIANS"!

WHERE IS THE "GENERAL CONSENT"?

the freedom of the people, as they have done on one or two occasions during the war when the House of Commons has been busy doing otherwise. Even at that risk the Labour Party should defend British liberty and oppose this vile thing called Conscription.

MARY R. MACARTHUR.

Any form of Conscription, no matter how mild it may be to begin with, will be the forging of the first link in a chain that will bind Labour for a generation.

It will be a greater victory for Prussianism than any that can be won on the battlefields of Europe. There is hardly even a pretence that the present proposal is justified by military necessity. It is purely a question of political expediency; and those innocent people who imagine that force will be applied only to single young men, should read last week's issue of the Saturday Review, which blurts out the truth in a frank and cynical article from which the following is a quotation:

> The truth is, this "only fair" talk, this thoughtless stuff about the iniquity of young unmarried "slackers" staying at home whilst poor, dear married men are torn off to the wars, has been largely claptrap. But, if any decision was to be reached at all this side of Christmas, 1916, it has been necessary, because only by devising a good "cry," and spreading it among the crowd like wildfire were our statesmen able at length to reach a conclusion It was necessary to sweep in the Anti-Conscriptionists by some catchy, crowd-charming device of the kind. All the same, now the dodge has been done, one may say that it was and is repugnant to good sense and principle, screamed about as it has been. The only solid and sound argument for sending bachelor first is that bachelor costs less: yet that good argument hardly anyone has had the courage to use.

MARGARET BONDFIELD.

(National Council of the I.L.P.)

I am opposed to Conscription in any form. I am convinced that a sinister motive is behind the present campaign, i.e., to secure military control of labour, because organised labour has begun effectively to demand a share of control in industry.

I hope the Labour movement will wake up in time to save our country from the disgrace of industrial slavery and its workers from the dishonour of having been fooled by political partisans disguised as patriots.

ISABELLA O. FORD.

I am glad to have this opportunity of joining in the magnificent protest the LABOUR LEADER is making against Conscription. My horror at the idea of introducing this form of tyranny into England is almost too deep for words. I feel that it would mean the destruction for long years of all our past work, and all the work of past generations, for progress and freedom. Under Conscription no man, and therefore no woman either, is really free, for it destroys liberty of speech and of the press, and all liberty of conscience. It will, of course, destroy Trade Unionism—what is already happening here? It will degrade the position of women, and most especially of the working women. Those of us who have seen its work in conscripted countries know how deadly and far-reaching are its effects.

And if we lose our freedom, how can we ever hope to help other nations to gain their freedom? If we force our men to kill other men, how can we ever again even pretend to be a Christian country? If we thus lose our soul, the soul of our country, what will anything ever profit us again? Let us be prepared to do [illegible] than let this come to pass!

CLIFFORD ALLEN.

(Chairman of the No-Conscription Fellowship.)

There must be no talk of accepting the imposition of Conscription. Its enactment must and can be prevented. The Bill must not become law.

There must be no talk of accepting a Conscription Act. Our resistance must be maintained, whatever the cost.

Men's lives are demanded compulsorily for a purpose of which they are ignorant. We will not blindly kill our fellows whilst peace is shunned and its terms hidden from us.

For months thousands of us have protested our determination to refuse war service. Now that we are called upon to make our decision, we pledge ourselves to resist to the uttermost and do not flinch for fear of the penalties we may draw down upon us. We count it better to suffer for convictions that we cherish than for a purpose which we renounce. Labour can smash Conscription; Christianity dare not countenance it. Let those of us who must witness to our faith purge our minds of cant. We are not playing a political game. We are to make a speedy peace inevitable.

CHARLES TREVELYAN, M.P.

There may be many considerations—economic, military, and social—which we ought to weigh. But the great disaster of compulsion for military service in any form is that it means the end of by far the greatest thing for which Britain has stood for generations—the liberty of the individual. Millions have been told to believe that this war was begun by us to fight against a system where individual liberty is sacrified to the caprices of rulers. What a moment to select to impose the same system upon ourselves! But Prussianism is the same here as in Prussia. It knows no consistency, decency, or liberal principle. Everywhere its course is marked by the destruction of the slowly-gathered harvests of right.

R. D. DENMAN, M.P.

I am glad to tell you what I have long ago told my constituents, that I am unalterably opposed to any form of compulsory military service.

Reasons both practical and theoretic combine in support of this attitude. From a practical point of view I am sure the harm outweighs the benefits. The deep and bitter resentment aroused among a section of the nation will impair the Government's power to conduct the war effectively.

But to me the question of principle is decisive. That a majority in this country should impose on a minority, against their will and convictions, the obligation to kill their fellow creatures is an act of treachery towards those ideas of personal liberty which constitute the greatest gift of our race to the civilisation of the world.

If Trade Unionists and the Irish can save us from this degradation, they will achieve a triumph which future generations of the British people will always remember with gratitude.

SIR W. P. BYLES, M.P.

Every voice against Conscription should be lifted now. It is high time, for the threat is ominously near. To vary a much-quoted saying of Mr. Lloyd George, "We are fighting three enemies, namely Germany, Austria, and Conscription, and the greatest of these is Conscription." It may yet prove a worse disaster than a German victory. Let all who love liberty, let working men especially, beware. A conscript army is a facile weapon [illegible]

BERTRAND RUSSELL, F.R.S.

Unless Labour offers an uncompromising opposition, Conscription is to become law within the next few weeks, before the House of Lords consents to prolong the life of the present Parliament.

The number of unattested single men has been announced as 65,000, but this is an outside estimate. It is agreed that only at most a third of these will remain after deduction of the starred men and the medically unfit. That leaves an addition of 200,000 unwilling men to the Army, as the result of our adopting the worst feature of militarism. Two hundred thousand unwilling men will not help appreciably towards military success; but the fact of their being obtained by compulsion will be a resounding victory for the Prussian spirit.

It is common knowledge among those who understand finance, from Mr. McKenna downwards, that, from the point of view of winning the war, we run more risk by having too many soldiers than by having too few. Victory in the long run will depend upon staying power; staying power depends upon finance; finance depends upon keeping our industries at work, which we cannot do if the great majority of able-bodied men are under arms. Those who are not dependent upon newspapers for their information know that our greatest danger is financial exhaustion through depletion of the ranks of labour.

Most of those who advocate Conscription believe sincerely that it is necessary in order to win the war. But those who have engineered the movement must be aware that from that point of view it is more likely to do harm than good. Patriotism is what they preach, but it is not their own motive. In pursuit of their own ends they have not shrunk from retarding victory by declaring to friends, neutrals, and enemies that we were not taking our due share in the war.

The motive of those who lead the Conscriptionist campaign is clear: it is to obtain a new weapon against organised labour. For the sake of the country, Trade Unionists are exhorted to give new and terrible powers to their future antagonists. The appeal to love of country is a cynical hypocrisy. From the moment when the war broke out certain enemies of Freedom have seen that it gave a rare opportunity for robbing wage-earners of what little liberty they had achieved, and preventing them for many years to come from making any advance on the road to democratic justice. With the enactment of Conscription the cruel plot will have succeeded.

There is no more horrible crime against liberty than to compel men to kill each other when their conscience tells them to live in peace. Many of the best men in the country will not submit to compulsion, and will be persecuted because they have courage to resist tyranny. But whatever they suffer they will be more fortunate than their persecutors, since they will be doing something to keep alive the ideals that made England great in happier times.

EDWARD CARPENTER.

(Author of "Towards Democracy.")

I have been sorry to witness the insincere methods of recruiting which have been sanctioned by the Government under the Lord Derby scheme—the evasions and concealments which have been used to catch thousands and hundreds of thousands unawares. A considerable wave of indignation on this subject is arising—as well as of ridicule over this truly British "compulsory voluntarism." And yet if the appeal had been made sincerely, and with clear statements of the [illegible]

PRINCIPAL JOHN W. GRAHAM.

Probably the most critical time of our live as citizens is this time. The difference between a drilled Conscript country like Germany and a country of political freemen like our own has been expounded to us many a time by advocates of the war, and we know that it is true. Teach every workman military obedience in his youth, and he will be easier to manage afterwards, indeed he can be mobilised to break his own spirit. "The poor want more discipline, they are slackers"—has ever been the cry of the rich.

Do not suppose that we can get rid of the machinery of Compulsion easily at the end of the war. Every kind of national fear and suspicion will be played upon to achieve its continuance. The thing penetrates into every detail of life. In conscript countries you have to register at the police office when you want to leave home, or remove your house—lest you escape the military net. You are always under the eye of some official.

No sane person (unless we are being kept in ignorance of important facts), would say that there was any military need for Conscription now. Mr. McKenna clearly thinks that loans have already reached their safe maximum. Mr. Runciman thinks that trade cannot be further depleted without lowering our exchange, and Mr. Lloyd George is hustling for munition workers. If we don't keep up our exports and continue loans to Russia and France, we shall lose more than gain by adding to our soldiers. Every new soldier takes away £100 of wealth that he would have earned in a year, and costs £300 to train, equip, transport, feed, and supply with munitions. That takes up the labour of three men at home. So each soldier means a loss of four industrials.

Our reserves are ample, as everyone knows, for months to come. But nobody knows how many "shirkers," if any, there are. Among the unattested are the physically weak, the needed workers, the men who were either negligent or would take no risks, but cannot go, and the conscientious objectors. It will not be greatly to the advantage of our arms to send these last to prison. There they will be a cost to the nation, and a standing disgrace to the Government. The young men of the Society of Friends may have to go to prison. We once did so before, in the evil days of Charles II., and with Friends will go thousands of others. Has the Seventeenth Century taught our rulers nothing?

The most disquieting fact is that a Liberal Prime Minister, who believes in the voluntary system, at the head of a Cabinet in which a majority are on his side, is obeying a highly-placed military clique whose power derives from a certain irresponsible newspaper proprietor, of no importance in himself. The owner of the Daily Mail and controller of the Times is, in my own opinion, one of the small group of men in Europe who are responsible for this war. The chief blame rests, we all believe, with some men in Germany, but the English papers which for years wrote against Germany, and sowed suspicion and ill-feeling on every occasion, helped to strengthen the same foolishness over there, and, by playing up to the worst influences round the Kaiser, have aided in causing this destruction. To foretell the war is to help to cause the war. This man has been made a peer; is he to be a super Prime Minister as well? If so, then indeed the British Empire will be built on a foundation of froth, on the outpourings of a journalism whose business is to get circulation and advertisement, and for that end to please, to flatter, and, above all, to astonish, frighten, or inflame people who [illegible] bind Labour for a generation.

It will be a greater victory for Prussianism than any that can be won on the battlefields of Europe. There is hardly even a pretence that the present proposal is justified by military necessity. It is purely a question of political expediency; and those innocent people who imagine that force will be applied only to single young men, should read last week's issue of the Saturday Review, which blurts out the truth in a frank and cynical article from which the following is a quotation:

> The truth is, this "only fair" talk, this thoughtless stuff about the iniquity of young unmarried "slackers" staying at home whilst poor, dear married men are torn off to the wars, has been largely claptrap. But, if any decision was to be reached at all this side of Christmas, 1916, it has been necessary, because only by devising a good "cry," and spreading it among the crowd like wildfire were our statesmen able at length to reach a conclusion It was necessary to sweep in the Anti-Conscriptionists by some catchy, crowd-charming device of the kind. All the same, now the dodge has been done, one may say that it was and is repugnant to good sense and principle, screamed about as it has been. The only solid and sound argument for sending bachelor first is that bachelor costs less: yet that good argument hardly anyone has had the courage to use.

MARGARET BONDFIELD.

(National Council of the I.L.P.)

I am opposed to Conscription in any form. I am convinced that a sinister motive is behind the present campaign, i.e., to secure military control of labour, because organised labour has begun effectively to demand a share of control in industry.

I hope the Labour movement will wake up in time to save our country from the disgrace of industrial slavery and its workers from the dishonour of having been fooled by political partisans disguised as patriots.

ISABELLA O. FORD.

I am glad to have this opportunity of joining in the magnificent protest the LABOUR LEADER is making against Conscription. My horror at the idea of introducing this form of tyranny into England is almost too deep for words. I feel that it would mean the destruction for long years of all our past work, and all the work of past generations, for progress and freedom. Under Conscription no man, and therefore no woman either, is really free, for it destroys liberty of speech and of the press, and all liberty of conscience. It will, of course, destroy Trade Unionism—what is already happening here? It will degrade the position of women, and most especially of the working women. Those of us who have seen its work in conscripted countries know how deadly and far-reaching are its effects.

And if we lose our freedom, how can we ever hope to help other nations to gain their freedom? If we force our men to kill other men, how can we ever again even pretend to be a Christian country? If we thus lose our soul, the soul of our country, what will anything ever profit us again? Let us be prepared to die rather than let this come to pass; for no war, no outside tyranny, destroys a nation so utterly as internal tyranny and decay do.

MARGARET LLEWELYN DAVIES.

(Secretary, Women's Co-operative Guild.)

This is a moment when Labour holds the destinies of the country in its hand. The demand for Conscription has not, on the Conscriptionists' own figures, even the excuse of a military necessity. Compulsion once admitted for a section, will be rapidly extended to all, with the inevitable result of enslaving the workers through military law.

The calamitous betrayal of Labour by some of its leaders does not lessen the power of the rank and file. They can maintain the freedom of the workers and the right of conscience by the most effective weapon of Trade Union action. All men and women who believe in liberty must support them by demonstrations throughout the country and determine that Conscription shall never be placed on our Statute Book.

will not blindly kill our fellows whilst peace is shunned and its terms hidden from us.

For months thousands of us have protested our determination to refuse war service. Now that we are called upon to make our decision, we pledge ourselves to resist to the uttermost and do not flinch for fear of the penalties we may draw down upon us. We count it better to suffer for convictions that we cherish than for a purpose which we renounce. Labour can smash Conscription; Christianity dare not countenance it. Let those of us who must witness to our faith purge our minds of cant. We are not playing a political game. We are to make a speedy peace inevitable.

CHARLES TREVELYAN, M.P.

There may be many considerations—economic, military, and social—which we ought to weigh. But the great disaster of compulsion for military service in any form is that it means the end of by far the greatest thing for which Britain has stood for generations—the liberty of the individual. Millions have been told to believe that this war was begun by us to fight against a system where individual liberty is sacrified to the caprices of rulers. What a moment to select to impose the same system upon ourselves! But Prussianism is the same here as in Prussia. It knows no consistency, decency, or liberal principle. Everywhere its course is marked by the destruction of the slowly-gathered harvests of right.

R. D. DENMAN, M.P.

I am glad to tell you what I have long ago told my constituents, that I am unalterably opposed to any form of compulsory military service.

Reasons both practical and theoretic combine in support of this attitude. From a practical point of view I am sure the harm outweighs the benefits. The deep and bitter resentment aroused among a section of the nation will impair the Government's power to conduct the war effectively.

But to me the question of principle is decisive. That a majority in this country should impose on a minority, against their will and convictions, the obligation to kill their fellow creatures is an act of treachery towards those ideas of personal liberty which constitute the greatest gift of our race to the civilisation of the world.

If Trade Unionists and the Irish can save us from this degradation, they will achieve a triumph which future generations of the British people will always remember with gratitude.

SIR W. P. BYLES, M.P.

Every voice against Conscription should be lifted now. It is high time, for the threat is ominously near. To vary a much-quoted saying of Mr. Lloyd George, "We are fighting three enemies, namely Germany, Austria, and Conscription, and the greatest of these is Conscription." It may yet prove a worse disaster than a German victory. Let all who love liberty, let working men especially, beware. A conscript army is a facile weapon of tyranny, and we'll never get rid of it. The Prussianism which is daily growing in England will take care of that.

F. W. PETHICK LAWRENCE.

Fundamentally, I am opposed to Conscription as an outrage against the spirit of man. At its best it is an attempt to override the individual conscience in the supposed interests of the nation. But the Conscription agitation of to-day is something far more contemptible than this. It is designed not in the interests of the nation but in the interests of a class. It will not help to win the war; on the contrary it will bring financial ruin. Its nefarious object is to deprive the working class of the means to resist their own enslavement.

We who love our land and the liberties which our forefathers and foremothers won for us must stand firm in our opposition to this un-English proposal which a degenerate press and a degenerate Parliament are seeking to foist upon us.

unit. That leaves an addition of 200,000 unwilling men to the Army, as the result of our adopting the worst feature of militarism. Two hundred thousand unwilling men will not help appreciably towards military success; but the fact of their being obtained by compulsion will be a resounding victory for the Prussian spirit.

It is common knowledge among those who understand finance, from Mr. McKenna downwards, that, from the point of view of winning the war, we run more risk by having too many soldiers than by having too few. Victory in the long run will depend upon staying power; staying power depends upon finance; finance depends upon keeping our industries at work, which we cannot do if the great majority of able-bodied men are under arms. Those who are not dependent upon newspapers for their information know that our greatest danger is financial exhaustion through depletion of the ranks of labour.

Most of those who advocate Conscription believe sincerely that it is necessary in order to win the war. But those who have engineered the movement must be aware that from that point of view it is more likely to do harm than good. Patriotism is what they preach, but it is not their own motive. In pursuit of their own ends they have not shrunk from retarding victory by declaring to friends, neutrals, and enemies that we were not taking our due share in the war.

The motive of those who lead the Conscriptionist campaign is clear: it is to obtain a new weapon against organised labour. For the sake of the country, Trade Unionists are exhorted to give new and terrible powers to their future antagonists. The appeal to love of country is a cynical hypocrisy. From the moment when the war broke out certain enemies of Freedom have seen that it gave a rare opportunity for robbing wage-earners of what little liberty they had achieved, and preventing them for many years to come from making any advance on the road to democratic justice. With the enactment of Conscription the cruel plot will have succeeded.

There is no more horrible crime against liberty than to compel men to kill each other when their conscience tells them to live in peace. Many of the best men in the country will not submit to compulsion, and will be persecuted because they have courage to resist tyranny. But whatever they suffer they will be more fortunate than their persecutors, since they will be doing something to keep alive the ideals that made England great in happier times.

EDWARD CARPENTER.

(Author of "Towards Democracy.")

I have been sorry to witness the insincere methods of recruiting which have been sanctioned by the Government under the Lord Derby scheme—the evasions and concealments which have been used to catch thousands and hundreds of thousands unawares. A considerable wave of indignation on this subject is arising—as well as of ridicule over this truly British "compulsory voluntarism." And yet if the appeal had been made sincerely, and with clear statements of the exact conditions and exact needs, there is ample evidence to show that the response would have been full and adequate. The masses to-day are no longer children, and they cannot be gulled and cajoled as of yore. If we are to go on to legislative compulsion and an imitation of the conscriptionist methods of the Continent (without which this war would never have occurred), then good-bye to the real honour and greatness of England!

DR. JOHN CLIFFORD, M.A.

It appears as though the worst is to happen. We had hoped it was impossible. The splendid response of the Labour world to the call of the country has made it unnecessary. In the interests of individual character, national efficiency, victory over our foes, and of the coming generation, the greater part of the nation expects the Labour-world to save us from the perils of compulsion for military service.

"The poor want more discipline, they are slackers"—has ever been the cry of the rich.

Do not suppose that we can get rid of the machinery of Compulsion easily at the end of the war. Every kind of national fear and suspicion will be played upon to achieve its continuance. The thing penetrates into every detail of life. In conscript countries you have to register at the police office when you want to leave home, or remove your house—lest you escape the military net. You are always under the eye of some official.

No sane person (unless we are being kept in ignorance of important facts), would say that there was any military need for Conscription now. Mr. McKenna clearly thinks that loans have already reached their safe maximum. Mr. Runciman thinks that trade cannot be further depleted without lowering our exchange, and Mr. Lloyd George is hustling for munition workers. If we don't keep up our exports and continue loans to Russia and France, we shall lose more than gain by adding to our soldiers. Every new soldier takes away £100 of wealth that he would have earned in a year, and costs £300 to train, equip, transport, feed, and supply with munitions. That takes up the labour of three men at home. So each soldier means a loss of four industrials.

Our reserves are ample, as everyone knows, for months to come. But nobody knows how many "shirkers," if any, there are. Among the unattested are the physically weak, the needed workers, the men who were either negligent or would take no risks, but cannot go, and the conscientious objectors. It will not be greatly to the advantage of our arms to send these last to prison. There they will be a cost to the nation, and a standing disgrace to the Government. The young men of the Society of Friends may have to go to prison. We once did so before, in the evil days of Charles II., and with Friends will go thousands of others. Has the Seventeenth Century taught our rulers nothing?

The most disquieting fact is that a Liberal Prime Minister, who believes in the voluntary system, at the head of a Cabinet in which a majority are on his side, is obeying a highly-placed military clique whose power derives from a certain irresponsible newspaper proprietor, of no importance in himself. The owner of the Daily Mail and controller of the Times is, in my own opinion, one of the small group of men in Europe who are responsible for this war. The chief blame rests, we all believe, with some men in Germany, but the English papers which for years wrote against Germany, and sowed suspicion and ill-feeling on every occasion, helped to strengthen the same foolishness over there, and, by playing up to the worst influences round the Kaiser, have aided in causing this destruction. To foretell the war is to help to cause the war. This man has been made a peer; is he to be a super Prime Minister as well? If so, then indeed the British Empire will be built on a foundation of froth, on the outpourings of a journalism whose business is to get circulation and advertisement, and for that end to please, to flatter, and, above all, to astonish, frighten, or inflame people who hate thinking.

By a trick, that of separating the interests of the married from the unmarried, by a pledge no Prime Minister had a right to give, by working in the thin end of the wedge, by obfuscating and concealing the real Derby results, by hustling and hurrying, with the House impotent under a Coalition Ministry, by the threat of a General Election at an impossible time, the enemies of the people are playing their game.

PROFESSOR HERBERT T. ANDREWS.

(University of London.)

My attitude to compulsion is one of uncompromising hostility. I believe that the Government policy, by dividing the country, will prolong the agony of the war. I hope that the Labour Party will be true to the great ideal of liberty and resist the Bill to the utmost.

A LETTER FROM LONDON.

NEW YEAR'S GIFTS TO CAPITALISTS.

Most decent British citizens when they see the New Year's Honours List in their paper simply pass it by as no concern of theirs. They are wrong. It is a deeply interesting document, and a standing proof that the Government of this country is scarcely more democratic than that of Prussia. I believe anyone will agree that this is true who for a moment puts out of his head all the old catch-words and phrases and traditional lies about society, classes, politics, and merits, which he first began to imbibe with his mother's milk, and who will just look at this week's honours list as if it were a simple sum in arithmetic.

Let us look at the first 58 honours, which range from Knights of the Garter to common or garden Knights. The first fact which is remarkable is that only two out of 58 honours go to representatives of the largest, the most important, and the hardest-working class in the country, the working class, and they go to two Labour M.P.'s, Mr. Crooks and Mr. Barnes. The two Garters are given to two members of the most aristocratic ruling caste, one of whom, Lord Curzon, is notorious as a reactionary oligarch. A reactionary, typically "government" judge of no legal eminence, Lord Mersey, is made a Viscount. Of the six new Peers, three are capitalist employers, two being railway magnates and one a mineowner; one is an American millionaire; one a reactionary aristocratic Admiral; and one a politician.

Among the Privy Councillors is Sir Frederick Banbury, a Capitalist banker and railway director, whose consistent opposition to every measure tending to improve the position of Labour and the poor has made him a by-word even in the House of Commons. Of the 13 Baronets, no less than 7 are large Capitalist employers. The Knighthoods are given to a motley collection of Capitalist employers, mayors, doctors connected with the Court or aristocracy. Surely this is a remarkable list. Does it not show clearly that all the power is concentrated in the hands of a small reactionary class composed of aristocrats and Capitalist employers?

Most of the honours are supposed to be given for patriotic work done during the war. The shipowners who have been making fortunes have received their New Year's gifts of honour from the nation. If there were a glimmer of democratic government in the country, would not one or two of the thousands of men, who have been working seventy and more hours, seven days a week, month after month, on shipyard, dock, and munition factory (sometimes for 3d. an hour!), have been honoured in the same way? "Ridiculous rant" the new Privy Councillor, Sir F. Banbury, would call such a proposal; but it isn't, it's just logic; it's not the proposal which is ridiculous, but our system of government and society which makes the proposal seem ridiculous.

THE NEW YEAR'S GIFT TO LABOUR.

The nation gave a New Year's gift of honour to Lord Curzon, Sir F. Banbury, Mr. D. A. Thomas, and a dozen other Capitalist employers; Mr. Lloyd George has presented the nation's New Year's gift to Labour. It is martial law. I mentioned last week that the Minister of Munitions had suddenly yielded to the repeated demand of the Trade Unions for the abolition of imprisonment under the Munitions Act. Mr. Hodge announced that the Government were going to accept an amendment to that effect. The Government's own Commissioners, Lord Balfour of Burleigh and Mr. Macassey, had recommended that this should be done.

Now we see the meaning and value of Mr. George's "concession." An Order in Council has been made which, under the Defence of the Realm Act, makes it a criminal offence to "impede, delay, or restrict the production, repair, or transport of war material, or any other work necessary for the successful prosecution of the war." The whips and scorpions with which Mr. George endeavoured to coerce workers under the Munitions Act are nothing to the whips and scorpions of his Order in Council. A worker did have some protection under the Act; under the Order he has none. Any person, engaged in any occupation remotely connected with the war, who leaves work or strikes or even does not work hard enough to satisfy his private employer, can be prosecuted, tried by court-martial before military officers in camera, and sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour. Are the workers and their leaders, after their experience of the way justice is administered in a Munitions Tribunal, really going to trust themselves to the secret proceedings of courts-martial?

COURTS-MARTIAL.

Courts-martial in the army are usually simply parodies of justice. This is not the fault of the officers who sit upon them and who, as a rule, probably intend to be fair. But being "public school" men, they are uneducated or badly educated. With no legal training of any kind, they are suddenly called upon to administer an intricate system of law. As a rule, they do not understand, and, therefore ignore, rules of evidence which are the only safeguards for innocent accused persons.

The things which happen in military courts-martial are almost incredible. Here is an example. A friend of mine took a commission in the first week of the war. As he was reading for the Bar and was therefore incorrectly supposed to know something of law, he was early appointed to sit upon a court-martial. The first case was one of desertion, the accused being tried in his absence. The court consisted of my friend who was, of course, a second lieutenant, and a captain, who was president. The captain told my friend that he was not well up in the procedure of courts-martial and so had got the record of a similar case of desertion, which they would keep open on the table in front of them and follow carefully. The first witness was called and examined and his evidence recorded by the captain. But my friend noticed that the captain was following the procedure of the old case so closely that instead of writing down what the witness said he wrote down what the first witness in the old case had said. He drew his attention to this, and pointed out that, although it was quite right to follow the procedure of the old case, they surely must record the actual evidence of the witnesses before them.

"Oh," said the captain, "that's all right; they are both desertion cases." And he insisted upon copying out word for word exactly the evidence given in the old case, no matter what the witness before him was saying; in fact, he even tried to get the witnesses to say exactly what the witnesses in the old case had said. This took a whole day, and at the end of it the accused was found guilty, as the accused in the old case had been found guilty. I may add that it was subsequently discovered that the person tried and found guilty by them in this way had never existed at all, or at any rate had certainly never enlisted in the regiment.

DISCHARGED SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

The question of the re-absorption of discharged soldiers and sailors into civil life during and after the war is one of urgent moment. The War Emergency Workers' National Commitee, the General Federation of Trade Unions, and the Demobilisation Committee of the Social Welfare Association for London have all recently been devoting attention to it as being of immense importance to Labour. In February last the Local Government Board appointed a committee, which drew up a scheme recommending an organisation which should eventually deal with both disabled and able-bodied discharged soldiers and sailors. This recommendation was not followed, and now by the Naval and Military War Pensions Act the care of disabled officers and men is given to a Statutory Committee of the Royal Patriotic Fund Corporation and to Local Committees.

This is a most unsatisfactory Act, which was passed in opposition to the Parliamentary Labour Party, the Workers' National Committee, and other Labour organisations, all of whom desired that the work should be under a Statutory Board or a Government Department directly responsible to Parliament. The Royal Patriotic Fund Corporation is another example of the undemocratic government of this country. It administers public money and deals almost entirely with members of the working classes; yet the working classes are practically unrepresented upon it. It is packed with Lord Lieutenants of Counties, Lord Mayors, Mayors, Generals, Colonels, Peers and sons of Peers. However, now that the Act has been passed, the Workers' National Committee and other organisations are doing their utmost to make the best of it. The Statutory Committee is to be helped by local committees established by the local authorities. The Act provides for the inclusion of women and Labour representatives among the members of these local committees. The Workers' National Committee is urging the importance of Labour and women's organisations taking steps throughout the country to see that representatives of both sections are included.

THE RECORDER.

BIRMINGHAM OPPOSITION.

THE TRADES COUNCIL STANDS FIRM.

The Birmingham Trades and Labour Council vigorously discussed the situation created by the Compulsion proposal for nearly two hours and a half on Saturday evening, and the result was a splendid determination to safeguard the liberties of the people, though, of course, there were members of the Council who were not so determined as the majority, and who voted against the resolution. It was moved by Councillor Kneeshaw in these terms:

"That in view of the renewed activity of the Conscriptionists inside and outside the Cabinet and the reported decision of the Cabinet in favour of Conscription, this Council, representing 70,000 Birmingham workpeople, reaffirms its unalterable opposition to Conscription. It has closely followed the agitation for Conscription from the outbreak of the war, and holds the view that the purpose of that agitation has never been directed to securing any national advantage, but has been confessedly pursued for the purpose of smashing the Trade Union movement and undermining the power of the British democracy. We regard the proposed division of the nation's manhood into two parts—viz., married and unmarried—as a trick to divide and diminish the opposition to Conscription by making Conscription appear to be the friend of the married man and winning for it his support. We repudiate such a trick, and pledge ourselves to resist the introduction of this pernicious Prussian principle of Conscription of human life in any and every form to the utmost extent of our power."

Mr. Kneeshaw's speech was uncompromising, and, indeed, the seriousness of the moment demands such an attitude. Because, he said, the Prime Minister had made a pledge which he had no right to make the whole nation was to be stampeded into slavery, and his denial of the Premier's right to give such a pledge was movement that if a certain number per week were forthcoming there would be no Conscription, was repudiated, and Lord Derby produced his married v. single scheme.

Mr. H. J. Morcombe (A.S.E.) seconded the resolution.

Councillor Beard moved an amendment to defer the resolution until the feeling of the rank and file of all the affiliated trades had been ascertained. Why should that Council prejudice the Government at the forthcoming Conference by saying that in no circumstances would it vote for Conscription? There might be circumstances in which a worse evil than Conscription might fall on the nation. Mr. Barker seconded the amendment, and Councillor Simpson supported. Mr. Spiers hoped that the fact that the Prime Minister had made an unwise pledge would not result in an alteration in the members' attitude towards Conscription.

The amendment was defeated, and Mr. Kneeshaw's resolution was carried, more than two-thirds of the delegates voting in its favour.

The decision moved the Tory organ, the Birmingham Daily Post, to a very long leading article, which is suggestive of the importance with which that determination of the Council is regarded locally.

MANCHESTER AGAINST COMPULSION.

The Executive Committee of the Manchester and Salford Trades Council, at a special meeting, appointed Mr. Kean and Mr. W. H. Johnson as delegates to the London Labour Conference, and adopted this resolution: "That the delegates be instructed to vote against any form of compulsory military service, whether for the period of the war or otherwise."

POPLAR CALLS FOR RESISTANCE.

The Executive Committee of the Poplar Trades Council, with an affiliated membership of nearly 10,000, calls upon the Labour members of the House of Commons, the Trade Union Executives, and the rank and file of the Trade Union

RHONDDA VALLEY MINERS AGAINST.

The miners of the Rhondda Valley, at a district meeting at Porth, considered the Compulsion proposals of the Government, and a resolution was adopted confirming the decision of the Federation Council against Compulsion. Two delegates were appointed to attend the London Conference.

RESISTANCE TO THE END.

At a well-attended Anti-Conscription public meeting in Birmingham a resolution pledging opposition was carried unanimously. Mr. Joseph E. Southall presided, and Mr. J. W. Tonks moved the resolution. Mr. Robert Williams, Secretary of the National Transport Workers' Federation, speaking in support, said that no power on God's earth should make him a conscript. Mr. J. Simpson, of the "Planet," also supporting the motion, remarked that Mr. Asquith's pledge to the married men was made after his pledge to the Labour Party that 30,000 recruits per week would save the voluntary system. He had not honoured that pledge. The truth was that Mr. Asquith honoured those pledges that suited his purpose.

OTHER DECISIONS.

To the very large number of organisations which have passed resolutions of determined opposition to any form of Conscription we have already recorded we add the following with the greatest satisfaction:

Dulwich I.L.P.
Batley I.L.P.
Birmingham Public Meeting.
Derby I.L.P.
Brighouse I.L.P.
Dundee I.L.P.
[illegible]
Batley I.L.P.
Brighouse I.L.P.
Letchworth Trades and Labour Council.

The Joint meeting of the Steel and Tinplate members of the British Steel Smelters' Association, calls upon the General Secretary of the Union (Mr. John Hodge) to oppose every such measure during its passage through the House of Commons.

The Wigan No. 1 Branch of the N.U.R. asks the Executive Council of the Union to adhere to the resolutions of the Branch passed on September 5, instructing the E.C. to oppose compulsion even to the extent of a national strike.

The Dundee I.L.P. calls upon the N.A.C. at once to demand that the National Labour Party shall issue a clear and definite statement of its attitude towards this question.

The Letchworth Trades and Labour Council urges the delegates at the Labour Conference to demand that the full Conscription of wealth and property must precede any measure of Conscription of life.

The Brighouse I.L.P. calls for the immediate withdrawal of Messrs. Henderson, Roberts, and Brace, from the Government on the ground that they have done infinitely more harm than good to the organised workers since their acceptance of office.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Editor regrets that owing to extreme pressure he has been compelled to hold over several letters.

and who will just look at this week's honours list as if it were a simple sum in arithmetic.

Let us look at the first 58 honours, which range from Knights of the Garter to common or garden Knights. The first fact which is remarkable is that only two out of 58 honours go to representatives of the largest, the most important, and the hardest-working class in the country, the working class, and they go to two Labour M.P.'s, Mr. Crooks and Mr. Barnes. The two Garters are given to two members of the most aristocratic ruling caste, one of whom, Lord Curzon, is notorious as a reactionary oligarch. A reactionary, typically "government" judge of no legal eminence, Lord Mersey, is made a Viscount. Of the six new Peers, three are capitalist employers, two being railway magnates and one a mineowner; one is an American millionaire; one a reactionary aristocratic Admiral; and one a politician.

Among the Privy Councillors is Sir Frederick Banbury, a Capitalist banker and railway director, whose consistent opposition to every measure tending to improve the position of Labour and the poor has made him a by-word even in the House of Commons. Of the 13 Baronets, no less than 7 are large Capitalist employers. The Knighthoods are given to a motley collection of Capitalist employers, mayors, doctors connected with the Court or aristocracy. Surely this is a remarkable list. Does it not show clearly that all the power is concentrated in the hands of a small reactionary class composed of aristocrats and Capitalist employers?

Most of the honours are supposed to be given for patriotic work done during the war. The shipowners who have been making fortunes have received their New Year's gifts of honour from the nation. If there were a glimmer of

The nation gave a New Year's gift of honour to Lord Curzon, Sir F. Banbury, Mr. D. A. Thomas, and a dozen other Capitalist employers; Mr. Lloyd George has presented the nation's New Year's gift to Labour. It is martial law. I mentioned last week that the Minister of Munitions had suddenly yielded to the repeated demand of the Trade Unions for the abolition of imprisonment under the Munitions Act. Mr. Hodge announced that the Government were going to accept an amendment to that effect. The Government's own Commissioners, Lord Balfour of Burleigh and Mr. Macassey, had recommended that this should be done.

Now we see the meaning and value of Mr. George's "concession." An Order in Council has been made which, under the Defence of the Realm Act, makes it a criminal offence to "impede, delay, or restrict the production, repair, or transport of war material, or any other work necessary for the successful prosecution of the war." The whips and scorpions with which Mr. George endeavoured to coerce workers under the Munitions Act are nothing to the whips and scorpions of his Order in Council. A worker did have some protection under the Act; under the Order he has none. Any person, engaged in any occupation remotely connected with the war, who leaves work or strikes or even does not work hard enough to satisfy his private employer, can be prosecuted, tried by court-martial before military officers in camera, and sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour. Are the workers and their leaders, after their experience of the way justice is administered in a Munitions Tribunal, really going to trust themselves to the secret proceedings of courts-martial?

martial are almost incredible. Here is an example. A friend of mine took a commission in the first week of the war. As he was reading for the Bar and was therefore incorrectly supposed to know something of law, he was early appointed to sit upon a court-martial. The first case was one of desertion, the accused being tried in his absence. The court consisted of my friend, who was, of course, a second lieutenant, and a captain, who was president. The captain told my friend that he was not well up in the procedure of courts-martial and so had got the record of a similar case of desertion, which they would keep open on the table in front of them and follow carefully. The first witness was called and examined and his evidence recorded by the captain. But my friend noticed that the captain was following the procedure of the old case so closely that instead of writing down what the witness said he wrote down what the first witness in the old case had said. He drew his attention to this, and pointed out that, although it was quite right to follow the procedure of the old case, they surely must record the actual evidence of the witnesses before them.

"Oh," said the captain, "that's all right; they are both desertion cases." And he insisted upon copying out word for word exactly the evidence given in the old case, no matter what the witness before him was saying; in fact, he even tried to get the witnesses to say exactly what the witnesses in the old case had said. This took a whole day, and at the end of it the accused was found guilty, as the accused in the old case had been found guilty. I may add that it was subsequently discovered that the person tried and found guilty by them in this way had never existed at all, or at any rate had certainly never enlisted in the regiment.

tion which should eventually deal with both disabled and able-bodied discharged soldiers and sailors. This recommendation was not followed, and now by the Naval and Military War Pensions Act the care of disabled officers and men is given to a Statutory Committee of the Royal Patriotic Fund Corporation and to Local Committees.

This is a most unsatisfactory Act, which was passed in opposition to the Parliamentary Labour Party, the Workers' National Committee, and other Labour organisations, all of whom desired that the work should be under a Statutory Board or a Government Department directly responsible to Parliament. The Royal Patriotic Fund Corporation is another example of the undemocratic government of this country. It administers public money and deals almost entirely with members of the working classes; yet the working classes are practically unrepresented upon it. It is packed with Lord Lieutenants of Counties, Lord Mayors, Mayors, Generals, Colonels, Peers and sons of Peers. However, now that the Act has been passed, the Workers' National Committee and other organisations are doing their utmost to make the best of it. The Statutory Committee is to be helped by local committees established by the local authorities. The Act provides for the inclusion of women and Labour representatives among the members of these local committees. The Workers' National Committee is urging the importance of Labour and women's organisations taking steps throughout the country to see that representatives of both sections are included.

THE RECORDER.

BIRMINGHAM OPPOSITION.

THE TRADES COUNCIL STANDS FIRM.

The Birmingham Trades and Labour Council vigorously discussed the situation created by the Compulsion proposal for nearly two hours and a half on Saturday evening, and the result was a splendid determination to safeguard the liberties of the people, though, of course, there were members of the Council who were not so determined as the majority, and who voted against the resolution. It was moved by Councillor Kneeshaw in these terms:

"That in view of the renewed activity of the Conscriptionists inside and outside the Cabinet and the reported decision of the Cabinet in favour of Conscription, this Council, representing 70,000 Birmingham workpeople, reaffirms its unalterable opposition to Conscription. It has closely followed the agitation for Conscription from the outbreak of the war, and holds the view that the purpose of that agitation has never been directed to securing any national advantage, but has been confessedly pursued for the purpose of smashing the Trade Union movement and undermining the power of the British democracy. We regard the proposed division of the nation's manhood into two parts—viz., married and unmarried—as a trick to divide and diminish the opposition to Conscription by making Conscription appear to be the friend of the married man and winning for it his support. We repudiate such a trick, and pledge ourselves to resist the introduction of this pernicious Prussian principle of Conscription of human life in any and every form to the utmost extent of our power."

Mr. Kneeshaw's speech was uncompromising, and, indeed, the seriousness of the moment demands such an attitude. Because, he said, the Prime Minister had made a pledge which he had no right to make the whole nation was to be stampeded into slavery, and his denial of the Premier's right to give such a pledge was greeted with loud applause. He pointed out that another pledge, that given to the Labour movement that if a certain number per week were forthcoming there would be no Conscription, was repudiated, and Lord Derby produced his married v. single scheme.

Mr. H. J. Morcombe (A.S.E.) seconded the resolution.

Councillor Beard moved an amendment to defer the resolution until the feeling of the rank and file of all the affiliated trades had been ascertained. Why should that Council prejudice the Government at the forthcoming Conference by saying that in no circumstances would it vote for Conscription? There might be circumstances in which a worse evil than Conscription might fall on the nation. Mr. Barker seconded the amendment, and Councillor Simpson supported. Mr. Spiers hoped that the fact that the Prime Minister had made an unwise pledge would not result in an alteration in the members' attitude towards Conscription.

The amendment was defeated, and Mr. Kneeshaw's resolution was carried, more than two-thirds of the delegates voting in its favour.

The decision moved the Tory organ, the Birmingham Daily Post, to a very long leading article, which is suggestive of the importance with which that determination of the Council is regarded locally.

MANCHESTER AGAINST COMPULSION.

The Executive Committee of the Manchester and Salford Trades Council, at a special meeting, appointed Mr. Kean and Mr. W. H. Johnson as delegates to the London Labour Conference, and adopted this resolution: "That the delegates be instructed to vote against any form of compulsory military service, whether for the period of the war or otherwise."

POPLAR CALLS FOR RESISTANCE.

The Executive Committee of the Poplar Trades Council, with an affiliated membership of nearly 10,000, calls upon the Labour members of the House of Commons, the Trade Union Executives, and the rank and file of the Trade Union and Labour movement to resist, by every means in their power, the passing of such a measure.

RHONDDA VALLEY MINERS AGAINST.

The miners of the Rhondda Valley, at a district meeting at Porth, considered the Compulsion proposals of the Government, and a resolution was adopted confirming the decision of the Federation Council against Compulsion. Two delegates were appointed to attend the London Conference.

RESISTANCE TO THE END.

At a well-attended Anti-Conscription public meeting in Birmingham a resolution pledging opposition was carried unanimously. Mr. Joseph E. Southall presided, and Mr. J. W. Tonks moved the resolution. Mr. Robert Williams, Secretary of the National Transport Workers' Federation, speaking in support, said that no power on God's earth should make him a conscript. Mr. J. Simpson, of the "Planet," also supporting the motion, remarked that Mr. Asquith's pledge to the married men was made after his pledge to the Labour Party that 30,000 recruits per week would save the voluntary system. He had not honoured that pledge. The truth was that Mr. Asquith honoured those pledges that suited his purpose.

OTHER DECISIONS.

To the very large number of organisations which have passed resolutions of determined opposition to any form of Conscription we have already recorded we add the following with the greatest satisfaction:

Dulwich I.L.P.
Batley I.L.P.
Birmingham Public Meeting.
Derby I.L.P.
Brighouse I.L.P.
Dundee I.L.P.
Stirchley Labour Church (4 dissentients).
Joint meeting of Steel and Tinplate Members of the British Steel Smelters' Association, at Gorseinon.
Colne Valley Branch of the National Society of Dyers and Finishers.
London District Board of the Union of Operative Bakers, Confectioners, and Allied Workers.
Hackney Branch of the Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks.
Wolverhampton No. 3 Branch of the Society of Gas, Municipal, and General Workers.
Wigan No. 1 Branch of the N.U.R.
Buxton Trades and Labour Council.
Oldham Public Meeting, under I.L.P. auspices (one dissentient).
Letchworth Trades and Labour Council.

The following organisations urge the special Labour conference to give voice to an uncompromising hostility to the proposal:

Batley I.L.P.
Brighouse I.L.P.
Letchworth Trades and Labour Council.

The Joint meeting of the Steel and Tinplate members of the British Steel Smelters' Association, calls upon the General Secretary of the Union (Mr. John Hodge) to oppose every such measure during its passage through the House of Commons.

The Wigan No. 1 Branch of the N.U.R. asks the Executive Council of the Union to adhere to the resolutions of the Branch passed on September 5, instructing the E.C. to oppose compulsion even to the extent of a national strike.

The Dundee I.L.P. calls upon the N.A.C. at once to demand that the National Labour Party shall issue a clear and definite statement of its attitude towards this question.

The Letchworth Trades and Labour Council urges the delegates at the Labour Conference to demand that the full Conscription of wealth and property must precede any measure of Conscription of life.

The Brighouse I.L.P. calls for the immediate withdrawal of Messrs. Henderson, Roberts, and Brace, from the Government on the ground that they have done infinitely more harm than good to the organised workers since their acceptance of office.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The Editor regrets that owing to extreme pressure he has been compelled to hold over several letters.

THE RUSSIAN POLITICAL PRISONERS AND EXILES' RELIEF COMMITTEE IN LONDON.

Headquarters: BEBEL HOUSE, 86, Lexham Gardens, Kensington, London, W.

Chairman: Mr. PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.
Hon. Treas.: Mr. ROBT. WILLIAMS (Nat. Transport Workers' Fed'n) 220, Blackfriars Rd., London, S.E.
Hon. Secretary: Mr. GEORGE TCHITCHERINE, 12, Oakley Square, London, N.W.
Hon. Assistant Secretary: Mrs. BRIDGES ADAMS, 96, Lexham Gardens, Kensington, London, W.

Those willing to help in alleviating the terrible sufferings of the Political Prisoners in the Russian hard-labour gaols, and of the Political Exiles in Siberia, are invited to send donations direct to the Hon. Treasurer.

6674

They are quite easy to roll with a fine cut tobacco, and as you smoke them the moment they are made the condition is "just right." But the paper must be the purest —see that it's

"AG" Cigarette Paper

No other is so fine or "just as good."

Try it now, and you will be surprised at the excellence of your cigarette and the saving to your pocket.

Sold everywhere in ½d. Books.

TRADE UNION NOTES: The Engineers Score.

DON'T CROW TOO SOON!

The two most significant incidents in the history of Labour since the outbreak of the European War in July, 1914, are, first, the privilege wrung out of the Government by the Miners' Federation of Great Britain that they should not be included in the Munitions Act, and, second, the promise wrung from the Government by the Amalgamated Society of Engineers that their demands should be satisfied before the Munitions Amending Bill passed into law.

* * *

In each case a single organisation had to fight for its own hand, and it is a melancholy comment on the solidarity of the Labour movement and on its vaunted motto of "United we stand, divided we fall," that in each case a single organisation won a victory it could not win when linked up with the others. The miners refused to be swept into the Munitions Act. They kept out, and, in spite of tales of horrible penalties, they were left out. The Amalgamated Society of Engineers formulated certain demands and submitted them to a National Conference representing 55 Unions in the Engineering and Shipbuilding trades. The Conference of November 30 passed these and other demands unanimously and urged their incorporation in the Amending Bill. But the Trade Union Conference resolutions were entrusted to a committee of twelve which consisted of the six members of the National Advisory Committee on War Output and six elected on the spot. That committee failed to move the Government, and when the Amending Bill was introduced it was found to be a delusion and a snare so far as real amendment was concerned. It became better, slightly better, after Committee Stage, but it still omitted the chief demands of the Trade Unionists. Then on Thursday, December 30, the Amalgamated Society of Engineers called a conference of its own members and there empowered certain representatives to go on a deputation to the Prime Minister and to Mr. Lloyd George and lay before them the original demands of the Trade Union Conference, emphasis being laid, as was but natural, on the resolutions which were dearest to the hearts of the Engineers. These demands, originally rejected by the Government when they came from a National Trade Union Conference, have now been granted to the Amalgamated Society of Engineers.

* * *

The moral of all this is plain to see. It is that Labour will get concessions from the Government, even when the granting of those concessions is imperative in the national interests, only by independence of action. To hope to secure it by Coalition Governments is a sorry mistake. We do not intend to minimise the really good part played by Arthur Henderson in the South Wales coal strike and at other times. But in sober earnest it must be said that for Labour to have merely a foot in the Cabinet is like having a foot in the grave. So long as Labour spaniels the Cabinet at heel, so long will it get nothing but kicks. The Government yields more to the uncompromising demand of one Union than to all the amiability of all the Hodges.

* * *

Further than that, it must be noted that direct industrial action when used for purposes which, however affected by legislation, are in their essence industrial purposes, has been signally vindicated. The first Conference, representative though it was, fizzled out. The Labour Party was good enough to turn down a number of the principal proposals tabled by the Trade Union Conference, and so failed on a move to present the views of its constituents. Members of Parliament originally elected to represent the views of Labour remained silent and inactive. A few of them who were directly interested in the Munitions Act busied themselves in biting the ear of Lloyd George; the rest, too, were inactive.

* * *

is the arena in which to fight out the industrial issues, but since the war came, and more still since the Coalition Government came and His Majesty's Opposition disappeared, the House of Commons has not been an arena fit to defend a dog from drowning, far less a body of wage-earners from industrial servitude.

* * *

What precisely did the Engineers obtain at their interview with the Prime Minister and Lloyd George on Friday night last? Our readers are well aware of what they endeavoured to get. They asked for nothing more than the seven points tabled and passed a month before. The newspaper report of the interview, given forth by the Ministry of Munitions, so emphasised the solitary point of the L.3. wages concession as to leave a general impression in the public mind that this was all that the A.S.E. gained. Whether the press report was so worded by accident, or by design, on the part of the permanent officials, may have important consequences. In any case, it must be understood that the A.S.E. were actually promised concessions on all the most important points and on several minor points in addition.

The demand for L.3. was a demand that a pledge given by the Ministry of Munitions, purporting to secure the skilled workers against depreciation of standard rates through a wholesale introduction of semi-skilled and unskilled labour, should now be made legally binding. A similar pledge (L.2.) had been made in the case of women workers, and it had been found necessary to give this legal sanction by incorporating it in the new Amending Bill. The Engineers justly asked that the provisions of L.3. (dealing with semi-skilled and unskilled men) should be added to L.2. (dealing with women workers).

* * *

It is understood that the Prime Minister consented to speedy arbitration in place of the vexatious delays which had been one of the most iniquitous results of the Act. The Act at present provides that all disputes must be referred to the Board of Trade for arbitration within 21 days. But no proviso is made for setting a term to the time in which settlement must take place. Thus a barrister appointed to arbitrate may get leisurely to work; the employers may delay a decision month after month, and, if it is a dispute about a wages advance, rob the employees of the wages that should be theirs during all the days of waiting. The perfectly reasonable demand of the Trade Union Conference for a full settlement within 21 days was obstinately resisted by the Munitions Ministry. It has now been granted at the instance of the A.S.E.

* * *

The second point is the Appeal Court from Munitions Tribunals. A strong demand for some body which could remedy the many miscarriages of justice which disfigured the decisions of the Munitions Tribunals' chairmen was sent up from the Trade Union Conference. As a reply to this there was granted the completely illusory concession of an appeal on points of law only. That is to say, if a Munitions chairman (usually a revising barrister type of person) by some chance gave a judgment which was not wrong, not unjust, not inequitable, but actually a contravention of the Statute he was administering, and if by a miraculous chance the worker under trial was so skilled in the law as to spot this illegality, then there would be a chance of appeal on the point of law. Now, through the instrumentality of the A.S.E., the workers are to have appeals allowed on points of "mixed fact and law." This curious phrase means that greater uniformity will be secured in the decisions: a decision at Glasgow will serve as a binding precedent for Sheffield, and if it does not there can be an appeal. This concession is not so good as it might be, but it is a great deal better than the farcical appeal on "points of law only."

* * *

The Munitions Tribunals are the youngest courts of law in this country, but so much permanent officials have been thrown over and the principle of local democratic control has been conceded. The committees will be given permissive powers to settle differences before they get to a serious stage. They will thus fulfil the function of the mediator suggested in Lord Balfour of Burleigh's report on the Clyde troubles. Lastly, the workers' side of these committees will be directly elected, and will contain a proper proportion of men skilled in the industry.

* * *

Throughout the whole of the negotiations between the Government and the workers since last spring there has been a feeling on the part of the workers that they had been done out of their right to have proposed changes in rules and regulations submitted for their approval. Time and again disputes have arisen over this. Employers have not scrupled, under cover of the Munitions Act, to post up obnoxious rules which would have brought the men out on strike in ten minutes had it been peace-time. Now we understand that no rules other than the model rules of the Munitions Ministry are to be posted without preliminary discussion with the workers concerned. We hope that discussion entails agreement. Further, all important changes in rules and regulations are to be published in the Board of Trade Labour Gazette.

* * *

There is one furtner concession—the abolition of imprisonment under the Act. But while we hail this with pleasure, a caveat must be entered. What Mr. Lloyd George is giving with one hand it would appear he is taking away with the other. There has recently been published an Order in Council under the Defence of the Realm Act which provides penalties for anyone who hinders the making of munitions, ranging up to imprisonment for life, and where the guilty person is proved to have acted with intent to assist the enemy to the death penalty. It may be that this is only intended for serious cases outside the usual scope of the penal clauses of the Munitions Act. But we have seen too many misapplications of the law during the past year not to fear that this Order in Council may be applied to law-abiding citizens who have fallen under the displeasure of the nation's executive. "Hindering the work of producing munitions" is a phrase that might well apply to a workman who left his machine for some hours or who did not turn up one morning. Thus the A.S.E. and the Trade Unions generally must not be too sure that they have abolished this odious business of imprisonment.

* * *

The dispute that has been caused by the Central Railway Company's attempt to prevent women clerks becoming members of the Railway Clerks' Association on the ground that the women in question were confidential clerks raises a question of old standing. That question is the contention of the railway companies that inspectors, stationmasters, confidential clerks, and others on the administrative grades must not be allowed to become members of a Trade Union. They say that, in the interests of good management, it is impossible to have in the same Trade Union the rank and file workers and those who direct the work. So far as this means that a Trade Unionist foreman would find it difficult to play the petty tyrant among his fellows it is certainly true. So far as it means that it is hard for the company when all grades stand by one another at the time of a strike, it is also true. But so far as it means that Trade Unionists will not work under another member of their Union, it is certainly false.

* * *

This general attitude was first taken up by the railway companies some twenty years ago, when the old Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants attempted to enrol railway clerks as members. The railway managers, headed by Sir George Gibb (now one of the three members of the Committee on Production), refused to allow the clerks to be in a Union, hitherto confined to the operative

"THE DILUTION OF LABOUR."

The Clyde Men's Position.

With his usual adroitness Mr. Lloyd George has conveyed to the public the impression that the Trade Unionists in the Clyde area are absolutely opposed to the "dilution of labour" proposals which, in his opinion, are imperative.

Eighty thousand skilled mechanics, we are informed, are required for the new national munition factories which have been erected, and these are to be taken from their present occupations in privately-owned factories. To enable this to be done without decreasing the output of munitions, the Trade Unions are urged to allow unskilled labour to perform the least skilled jobs. Consequently, skilled mechanics who have served an apprenticeship, and have thereby acquired special aptness for certain work, would be expected to work alongside unskilled workers, the latter being employed at the easiest tasks. The craft barriers which have been erected by these workers for their own protection would be broken down, and restricted trades would be thrown open to all.

Craft barriers would only be broken down where they have been erected by the workers. The craft barriers of the ruling classes remain intact, and yet an engineer is just as much entitled to protection against potential blacklegs as are lawyers, doctors, and accountants, to name only a few of the professionals whose crafts are protected against interlopers by the State. (The engineer is not protected by the State, but, in combination with his fellows, he has formed a Union which affords him some protection.) Along comes Lloyd George with a demand that the engineer shall forego the protection of his Union by allowing everyone and anyone to work at his craft.

The Clyde workers are only inclined to do this on conditions which will guarantee that the flooding of their crafts with unskilled labour will not be used to lower wages or the standard of living in general. If these guarantees are given, the Clyde men will accept the "dilution of labour," and spare no effort to make it successful. The conditions which the Clyde men ask are:

(1) The nationalisation of all munition industries.

(2) The Trade Union-State control of the management and supply of labour.

(3) The abrogation of all coercive and punitive industrial legislation, such as the slavery clauses in the Munitions Act.

These three conditions were submitted to Mr. George by the Clyde workers during his visit to Glasgow, but, as would be seen from the official report of his speech, he omitted all reference to them. He did not even promise to give them consideration or to submit them to the Cabinet.

Who is Lloyd George that he should autocratically dismiss the conditions submitted by 250,000 munition workers as being necessary before they can accept the "dilution of labour"? This matter is too important to be settled off-hand by an egotistical solicitor, and the nation ought to be made aware of the Clyde men's position, so that they may not be condemned without knowledge.

The nationalisation of the industries should precede the "dilution of labour," so that the State may derive the fullest benefit. Otherwise, the arrangement will be used by profiteers to augment profits, lower wages, and destroy Trade Unionism. If the Ministry of Munitions will proceed to make every factory a national factory one huge obstacle will be removed.

The enactment of condition one would pave the way for enactment of condition two, which is intended to secure for the Trade Unions a share of the management of industry. If this is "an engineers' war" surely it is not unreasonable to ask that the engineers should have some share in the management of their movement and on its vaunted motto of "United we stand, divided we fall," that in each case a single organisation won a victory it could not win when linked up with the others. The miners refused to be swept into the Munitions Act. They kept out, and, in spite of tales of horrible penalties, they were left out. The Amalgamated Society of Engineers formulated certain demands and submitted them to a National Conference representing 55 Unions in the Engineering and Shipbuilding trades. The Conference of November 30 passed these and other demands unanimously and urged their incorporation in the Amending Bill. But the Trade Union Conference resolutions were entrusted to a committee of twelve which consisted of the six members of the National Advisory Committee on War Output and six elected on the spot. That committee failed to move the Government, and when the Amending Bill was introduced it was found to be a delusion and a snare so far as real amendment was concerned. It became better, slightly better, after Committee Stage, but it still omitted the chief demands of the Trade Unionists. Then on Thursday, December 30, the Amalgamated Society of Engineers called a conference of its own members and there empowered certain representatives to go on a deputation to the Prime Minister and to Mr. Lloyd George and lay before them the original demands of the Trade Union Conference, emphasis being laid, as was but natural, on the resolutions which were dearest to the hearts of the Engineers. These demands, originally rejected by the Government when they came from a National Trade Union Conference, have now been granted to the Amalgamated Society of Engineers.

* * *

The moral of all this is plain to see. It is that Labour will get concessions from the Government, even when the granting of those concessions is imperative in the national interests, only by independence of action. To hope to secure it by Coalition Governments is a sorry mistake. We do not intend to minimise the really good part played by Arthur Henderson in the South Wales coal strike and at other times. But in sober earnest it must be said that for Labour to have merely a foot in the Cabinet is like having a foot in the grave. So long as Labour spaniels the Cabinet at heel, so long will it get nothing but kicks. The Government yields more to the uncompromising demand of one Union than to all the amiability of all the Hodges.

* * *

Further than that, it must be noted that direct industrial action when used for purposes which, however affected by legislation, are in their essence industrial purposes, has been signally vindicated. The first Conference, representative though it was, fizzled out. The Labour Party was good enough to turn down a number of the principal proposals tabled by the Trade Union Conference, and so failed on a move to present the views of its constituents. Members of Parliament originally elected to represent the views of Labour remained silent and inactive. A few of them who were directly interested in the Munitions Act busied themselves in biting the ear of Lloyd George: they, too, were ineffective.

* * *

At last a single Union met in Conference and passed a resolution which was in substance an ultimatum. The Government promptly climbed down. It accepted demands which were made in the interests of the nation no less than in those of the Engineers, demands which (if we may phrase it in a "bull") ought to have been granted even before they were formulated. The resolution passed by the Engineers was as follows:

> This conference, representative of 265,000 engineers, are of the opinion that the suggested amendments of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, endorsed by 55 Trade Unions at the conference of November 30, are essential to their element of justice in the administration of the Munitions of War Act, 1915, and should be incorporated in the Amendment Act if we are to maintain an influence with our members in securing the high standard of production required.

It was this implied threat of industrial action, or at any rate deliberate inaction, which brought the Government to its knees. I have never pretended that the House of Commons

L.3. wages concession as to leave a general impression in the public mind that this was all that the A.S.E. gained. Whether the press report was so worded by accident, or by design, on the part of the permanent officials, may have important consequences. In any case, it must be understood that the A.S.E. were actually promised concessions on all the most important points and on several minor points in addition.

The demand for L.3. was a demand that a pledge given by the Ministry of Munitions, purporting to secure the skilled workers against depreciation of standard rates through a wholesale introduction of semi-skilled and unskilled labour, should now be made legally binding. A similar pledge (L.2.) had been made in the case of women workers, and it had been found necessary to give this legal sanction by incorporating it in the new Amending Bill. The Engineers justly asked that the provisions of L.3. (dealing with semi-skilled and unskilled men) should be added to L.2. (dealing with women workers).

* * *

It is understood that the Prime Minister consented to speedy arbitration in place of the vexatious delays which had been one of the most iniquitous results of the Act. The Act at present provides that all disputes must be referred to the Board of Trade for arbitration within 21 days. But no proviso is made for setting a term to the time in which settlement must take place. Thus a barrister appointed to arbitrate may get leisurely to work; the employers may delay a decision month after month, and, if it is a dispute about a wages advance, rob the employees of the wages that should be theirs during all the days of waiting. The perfectly reasonable demand of the Trade Union Conference for a full settlement within 21 days was obstinately resisted by the Munitions Ministry. It has now been granted at the instance of the A.S.E.

* * *

The second point is the Appeal Court from Munitions Tribunals. A strong demand for some body which could remedy the many miscarriages of justice which disfigured the decisions of the Munitions Tribunals' chairmen was sent up from the Trade Union Conference. As a reply to this there was granted the completely illusory concession of an appeal on points of law only. That is to say, if a Munitions chairman (usually a revising barrister type of person) by some chance gave a judgment which was not wrong, not unjust, not inequitable, but actually a contravention of the Statute he was administering, and if by a miraculous chance the worker under trial was so skilled in the law as to spot this illegality, then there would be a chance of appeal on the point of law. Now, through the instrumentality of the A.S.E., the workers are to have appeals allowed on points of "mixed fact and law." This curious phrase means that greater uniformity will be secured in the decisions: a decision at Glasgow will serve as a binding precedent for Sheffield, and if it does not there can be an appeal. This concession is not so good as it might be, but it is a great deal better than the farcical appeal on "points of law only."

* * *

The Munitions Tribunals are the youngest courts of law in this country, but so much injustice has taken place within their walls that there seems no incongruity in saying that these hoary iniquities are to be considerably remodelled. The panel of workers' assessors, which is at present the old Insurance Act panels, is to be reformed with a personnel which shall know perhaps less about phthisis and approved society finance but more about workshop conditions in the munitions industry. It is to be hoped, however, that the whole of the powers and procedure of these tribunals will be swept into limbo before the Act passes through Parliament.

* * *

This may be managed if the new promise to set up local joint committees of women workers and employers is carried out with any adequacy. Mr. Lloyd George has several times declared himself in favour of local joint committees, and yet owing, we believe, to the malign influence of the permanent officials of the Munitions Ministry, this predilection of the Minister has never been allowed to show itself in action. Now we understand that the changes in rules and regulations submitted for their approval. Time and again disputes have arisen over this. Employers have not scrupled, under cover of the Munitions Act, to post up obnoxious rules which would have brought the men out on strike in ten minutes had it been peace-time. Now we understand that no rules other than the model rules of the Munitions Ministry are to be posted without preliminary discussion with the workers concerned. We hope that discussion entails agreement. Further, all important changes in rules and regulations are to be published in the Board of Trade Labour Gazette.

* * *

There is one furtner concession—the abolition of imprisonment under the Act. But while we hail this with pleasure, a caveat must be entered. What Mr. Lloyd George is giving with one hand it would appear he is taking away with the other. There has recently been published an Order in Council under the Defence of the Realm Act which provides penalties for anyone who hinders the making of munitions, ranging up to imprisonment for life, and where the guilty person is proved to have acted with intent to assist the enemy to the death penalty. It may be that this is only intended for serious cases outside the usual scope of the penal clauses of the Munitions Act. But we have seen too many misapplications of the law during the past year not to fear that this Order in Council may be applied to law-abiding citizens who have fallen under the displeasure of the nation's executive. "Hindering the work of producing munitions" is a phrase that might well apply to a workman who left his machine for some hours or who did not turn up one morning. Thus the A.S.E. and the Trade Unions generally must not be too sure that they have abolished this odious business of imprisonment.

* * *

The dispute that has been caused by the Central Railway Company's attempt to prevent women clerks becoming members of the Railway Clerks' Association on the ground that the women in question were confidential clerks raises a question of old standing. That question is the contention of the railway companies that inspectors, stationmasters, confidential clerks, and others on the administrative grades must not be allowed to become members of a Trade Union. They say that, in the interests of good management, it is impossible to have in the same Trade Union the rank and file workers and those who direct the work. So far as this means that a Trade Unionist foreman would find it difficult to play the petty tyrant among his fellows it is certainly true. So far as it means that it is hard for the company when all grades stand by one another at the time of a strike, it is also true. But so far as it means that Trade Unionists will not work under another member of their Union. It is certainly false.

* * *

This general attitude was first taken up by the railway companies some twenty years ago, when the old Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants attempted to enrol railway clerks as members. The railway managers, headed by Sir George Gibb (now one of the three members of the Committee on Production), refused to allow the clerks to be in a Union hitherto confined to the operative grades. The result was the formation of a separate Union for railway clerks. Now that a similar state of affairs has arisen with regard to Trade Unionism among the administrative grades, we trust Mr. Walkden, the secretary of the Railway Clerks' Association, will prove tougher than was Mr. Richard Bell, then secretary of the Railway Servants' Society. It is of the utmost importance to the future of Trade Unionism that there should be included in its ranks all workers whether manual, clerical, or administrative.

JACK CADE.

TO TRADE UNION OFFICIALS!

It is acknowledged by every alert Trade Union official that "Jack Cade's" contributions on Trade Union topics are the best informed articles on the subject that are published to-day. No keen Trade Unionist can possibly afford to miss them. If you do not see the LABOUR LEADER regularly, make it your first business to ask your Newsagent to supply you with it. Nowhere else can you get such an authoritative knowledge of what is going on in the Trade Union world.

occupations in privately-owned factories. To enable this to be done without decreasing the output of munitions, the Trade Unions are urged to allow unskilled labour to perform the least skilled jobs. Consequently, skilled mechanics who have served an apprenticeship, and have thereby acquired special aptness for certain work, would be expected to work alongside unskilled workers, the latter being employed at the easiest tasks. The craft barriers which have been erected by these workers for their own protection would be broken down, and restricted trades would be thrown open to all.

Craft barriers would only be broken down where they have been erected by the workers. The craft barriers of the ruling classes remain intact, and yet an engineer is just as much entitled to protection against potential blacklegs as are lawyers, doctors, and accountants, to name only a few of the professionals whose crafts are protected against interlopers by the State. (The engineer is not protected by the State, but, in combination with his fellows, he has formed a Union which affords him some protection.) Along comes Lloyd George with a demand that the engineer shall forego the protection of his Union by allowing everyone and anyone to work at his craft.

The Clyde workers are only inclined to do this on conditions which will guarantee that the flooding of their crafts with unskilled labour will not be used to lower wages or the standard of living in general. If these guarantees are given, the Clyde men will accept the "dilution of labour," and spare no effort to make it successful. The conditions which the Clyde men ask are:

(1) The nationalisation of all munition industries.

(2) The Trade Union-State control of the management and supply of labour.

(3) The abrogation of all coercive and punitive industrial legislation, such as the slavery clauses in the Munitions Act.

These three conditions were submitted to Mr. George by the Clyde workers during his visit to Glasgow, but, as would be seen from the official report of his speech, he omitted all reference to them. He did not even promise to give them consideration or to submit them to the Cabinet.

Who is Lloyd George that he should autocratically dismiss the conditions submitted by 250,000 munition workers as being necessary before they can accept the "dilution of labour"? This matter is too important to be settled off-hand by an egotistical solicitor, and the nation ought to be made aware of the Clyde men's position, so that they may not be condemned without knowledge.

The nationalisation of the industries should precede the "dilution of labour," so that the State may derive the fullest benefit. Otherwise, the arrangement will be used by profiteers to augment profits, lower wages, and destroy Trade Unionism. If the Ministry of Munitions will proceed to make every factory a national factory one huge obstacle will be removed.

The enactment of condition one would pave the way for enactment of condition two, which is intended to secure for the Trade Unions a share of the management of industry. If this is "an engineers' war" surely it is not unreasonable to ask that the engineers should have some share in the management of their own industry. Responsibility makes men, and one would think the Trade Unions are better able to organise labour than the lawyers, doctors, and advertising agents who now control the Ministry of Munitions.

Condition three is a very simple proposal based on the imperishable truth that slaves do not make good workers. Coercion is a bad master and organiser, and men who have had experience of freedom do not enjoy slavery. Resentment breeds discontent: discontent breeds strikes: strikes breed——?

The Clyde men, then, are favourable to the "dilution of labour" on those conditions. They are reasonable conditions, and Mr. Lloyd George can only refuse them because he is firmly wedded to the capitalistic system of production.

Mr. Lloyd George has assured the Clyde men that he will be fighting on their side after the war. The Clyde men want him on their side now, not caring to trust a man who is against them now to be with them later!

MYNER COLLIER.

Imaginary Interview with a Privy Councillor.

By "CASEY."

"Come right in," said the genial P.C., bearing his blushing honours thick upon him. —(Daily press.)

"I have called," said our representative, "to interview you on behalf of a vast circle of admirers."

"Come right in, we're not stuck up. As you say, the King, God bless him, has honoured me." Here the Right Honrabill gentleman seemed quite overcome. "This P.C. business means a lot more work for me. I have had to be photographed I don't know how many times already. Photographed in my shirt sleeves. Just fency! But my motto is: 'Never put off till to-morrow what you can pose in to-day.' Progress is the law of Nature."

"The public," said our Rep., "would like to hear more about you."

"I know, I know. Well, tell the public first of all that I was born very young." Here our Rep. laughed heartily. "And," continued the Right Honrabill, leaning forward and whispering impressively, "between you and I and the gate post, we were so poor I was born without a shirt."

"Goblessme," said our Rep.

"Yes, and I hadn't a silver spoon in my mouth, neither, though there may have been a mug at the christening."

"Really. This will interest our readers."

"No, I never did have no luck as a youngster. I didn't even have a chance to pick my parents. They were chosen for me in a most arbitrary fashion. Aristocrats are not punished like this, you know. Only pore workers. Now Kings, Kaisers, and Tsars have divine rights. Derby, Sutherland, Portland, and Manchester exercised this right, and consequently exhibited an intelligence enabling them to rule us for their benefit."

"Bravo! That's like the old man."

"Still, at a time like the present," said the new P.C., "it is the duty of every paytriot to remember that His Majesty, Gaud bless 'im——" Here the worthy Councillor almost broke down with emotion, but recovered himself in time to sing, "Gordsive-owergryshus."

"What were you saying?" asked our astonished representative.

"I was only singing," said the saddened P.C.

"God bless me, I thought you were lodging a complaint. Had I only known!"

"Had you only known what?"

"Well, had I only known you were going to sing, I would have brought my camera and snapped your voice.

Oh, poor Robinson Caruso,
Why did you doozo.

Unfortunately, our 19,000 new readers will have to be content with an undeveloped negative.

I've toiled in the slum and the street,
I've voyaged o'er the angry sea,
But the voice I annexed is a treat,
For with it I won my P.C.

hummed the newly-elected.

"You simply got it for an old song, then?"

"Talking about the working class," said the workers' representative, "has it ever struck you how we've progressed?"

"Not recently."

"Oh, but we have. We have progressed very much since I was a nipper," said the P.C., absent-mindedly.

"Do you mean Conscription?"

"When I was a lad," said the Woolwich infant, ignoring the interruption, "there were no fish and chip suppers. Oft and often we had to live on a bit of bread the thickness of tissue paper with the cheese photographed on it to make it go round. There were no picture palaces. There wasn't even a——"

"Munition Act," suggested our Rep., "and our forefathers could have a day off without giving the Government a tenner."

"——No submarines, no aeroplanes," continued the P.C., reminiscently, "no electric lights, in fact

All the world was dark and dre-eary,
Everywhere we roamt,

sang the P.C.

"I think," chimed in the Rep., "that your numerous Socialist admirers might like your portrait in Court dress, done in boiling oils. Yet the expense nowadays must be considered. P'raps we might arrange to have it done in margarine."

"It doesn't really matter," said the new P.C. "I am not so fatuous as to care for such tokens. But why this talk of trivialities? Why talk of butter, sugar, or food and other things being dearer, about taxes being higher, and about work being hard, when our brave boys abroad are——"

"The only reason I can think of," said our Rep., "is that some of their parents are hoping to be left alive enough to welcome them back again."

"Spite of what you said," the P.C. optimised, "things have progressed. When I was a youth I had to work for my living."

"So had I, also for the employers."

"But to-day," said the optimist P.C., "it's different. I used to roam about looking for work."

"And to-day," said the Rep., "you simply carry your Criccieth passport or Endurance card and keep on working until your old age pension wheezes round, or the employers keep you on until you die. In your young days there were no munition works, no Lloyd Georgian alteration of the Loaded Line Bill. To-day a vessel chartered in San Francisco can make £80,000 on one voyage, thus paying for her cost. Wheat was carried at 12s. 6d. per ton; to-day the families of our soldiers and sailors are compelled to pay £5 17s. 6d. per ton."

"You tell the working classes from me," said the Primo Councillor, "that some of them may be under the impression that because the King has given me this honour and calls me his right trusty and well beloved, I shall have become a Party man and shall not be of use to the workers any longer. Do tell them that the position gives me all the more power to work for and with them. I live with them and amongst them, and hope to die in their service."

"Will," said the representative solemnly, "we will. Still are we much afraid that every person accepting honours, riches, or position, whether he be a Crooks, a Barnes, a Henderson, or a Roberts, loses so much of his soul by such barter.

"The applause of the unthinking, the publicity of the present-day press gang, the acceptance of as much money in one week as may be earned by the whole of the toilers of a Burston village, cannot help the poor. You cannot help the poor by taxing their slender resources so that you may have more food than you need, more clothes than you can wear, more baubletry than is necessary. The poor are beginning to form a philosophy. Cabinet Ministers who spend as much on a banquet as a hundred needy wanters can earn in twelve months, who come in £1,000 motors to preach economy to us who have been shorn through our short lives of art, science, knowledge, and bare necessities, are being weighed in the new poor man's balance and classed as hypocritical whited sepulchres. The infernal audacity of elected persons preaching self-denial to poor devils who have never had a decent time will, i' the near future, be laughed to scorn.

"We, the workers, want no patronage, no Courtly clad popinjays, nor, by the Lord Harry, do we want bullying. We do the useful work of the world whether with pen or pick. We are producers, not consumers who don't produce.

"We want neither flattery nor compulsion. No one knows this better than thyself, oh, once one of us.

"How can thy Court dress help a child o' the slums? How can Arthur Henderson's £5,000 a year prevent Burston women being evicted? How can a Roberts, whose principal duty is signing cheques, assist the cause of freedom? We sent ye not to Parliament for this flummery.

"Ye were sent as the representatives of the poor, so in God's name be men, and not scarecrows. Remember that those who made can unmake. Think, ere it is too late."

The Rep. then woke up. When will the people? God o' Mercy, when?

"FORWARD" OFFICES RAIDED.

SCOTTISH I.L.P. ORGAN CONFISCATED.

The offices of the Forward, the Scottish Socialist weekly, which is published at Glasgow, were raided on Monday by the Glasgow police, acting on the instructions of the Scottish military command, and the entire premises were placed under military supervision. No reason was assigned for the action of the authorities and no explanations were given.

The two military officers entrusted to carry out the warrant for the raid, assisted by members of the Glasgow police staff, made an exhaustive examination of all the documents and correspondence in the Forward offices, and seized all the copies of the last issue, which contained a report of parts of the speech made by Mr. Lloyd George at the Christmas Day conference. The report was an accurate account of the non-military parts of Lloyd George's speech, interspersed with interruptions made by delegates to the conference, and it is surmised it was this report which caused the authorities to take action.

The officers carried out their instructions with courtesy, and every assistance was given them by Mr. Thomas Johnston, the editor of the Forward, and Mr. John Taylor, the manager of the Civic Press, which is a Trade Union owned printing concern. The military officers, it should be noted, not only took possession of the Forward offices; but also held up the offices of the Civic Press, and stopped all printing work. They even forbade the manager to open the business letters which came in with the morning post! A humorous feature of the seizure is that the programme for the annual concert of the Glasgow Police was in type to be printed by the Civic Press, and, of course, was held up [illegible] haul which they expected. In other parts of the country the newsagents shops were also visited and unsold copies appropriated, and in some places the police went so far as to compel readers in country districts to give up their copies. Evidently the "Prussians" have arrived.

Mr. Johnston is convinced that the seizure of the Forward has been prompted by political motives, and points out that on no occasion has he published anything likely to prejudice the military interests of the Government. At the time of writing it is not known how the seizure will affect the next issue of the Forward, but the editor intends to get his paper out if at all possible.

The raid was referred to at the National Housing Conference at Glasgow on Monday, when Councillor P. J. Dollan, seconded by Mr. John McLean, M.A., moved a resolution protesting against the action of the authorities and demanding the same freedom of expression for the Labour Press as was permitted to the Northcliffe and other capitalist organs. The resolution was carried unanimously and with acclamation; while delegates were requested to spread the news of the raid in the workshops.

M.C.

GLASGOW PRUSSIANS' DEFEAT.

FREE SPEECH UPHELD.

Arising out of the "Free Speech" and "No Conscription" demonstration held in the streets of Glasgow, on December 12, the ten speakers were prosecuted on December 23, on a charge of alleged "obstruction." The defendants were E. Shinwell, James Maxton, John McLean, A. McManus, William Gallacher, Councillor P. J. Dollan, Mrs. Helen Crawford, T. Millinger, [illegible]

LABOUR'S REPLY TO CONSCRIPTION PROPOSALS

A special edition of the LABOUR LEADER will be issued on Saturday containing . . .

A FULL REPORT OF THE GREAT LABOUR CONFERENCE

This issue must be scattered broadcast throughout the country. It will voice in no uncertain way the real opinion of the Labour Movement, and its influence can be made an important factor in emphasising Labour's message to the reactionaries.

The danger of Conscription is real—IT IS IMMINENT.

Labour Can Destroy It.

is: 'Never put off till to-morrow what you can pose in to-day.' Progress is the law of Nature."

"The public," said our Rep., "would like to hear more about you."

"I know, I know. Well, tell the public first of all that I was born very young." Here our Rep. laughed heartily. "And," continued the Right Honrabill, leaning forward and whispering impressively, "between you and I and the gate post, we were so poor I was born without a shirt."

"Goblessme," said our Rep.

"Yes, and I hadn't a silver spoon in my mouth, neither, though there may have been a mug at the christening."

"Really. This will interest our readers."

"No. I never did have no luck as a youngster. I didn't even have a chance to pick my parents. They were chosen for me in a most arbitrary fashion. Aristocrats are not punished like this, you know. Only pore workers. Now Kings, Kaisers, and Tsars have divine rights. Derby, Sutherland, Portland, and Manchester exercised this right, and consequently exhibited an intelligence enabling them to rule us for their benefit."

"Bravo! That's like the old man."

"Still, at a time like the present," said the new P.C., "it is the duty of every paytriot to remember that His Majesty, Gaud bless 'im——" Here the worthy Councillor almost broke down with emotion, but re-have to be content with an undeveloped negative.

I've toiled in the slum and the street,
I've voyaged o'er the angry sea,
But the voice I annexed is a treat,
For with it I won my P.C.

hummed the newly-elected.

"You simply got it for an old song, then?"

"Talking about the working class," said the workers' representative, "has it ever struck you how we've progressed?"

"Not recently."

"Oh, but we have. We have progressed very much since I was a nipper," said the P.C., absent-mindedly.

"Do you mean Conscription?"

"When I was a lad," said the Woolwich infant, ignoring the interruption, "there were no fish and chip suppers. Oft and often we had to live on a bit of bread the thickness of tissue paper with the cheese photographed on it to make it go round. There were no picture palaces. There wasn't even a——"

"Munition Act," suggested our Rep., "and our forefathers could have a day off without giving the Government a tenner."

"——No submarines, no aeroplanes," continued the P.C., reminiscently, "no electric lights, in fact

All the world was dark and dre-eary,
Everywhere we roamt,

sang the P.C.

them back again."

"Spite of what you said," the P.C. optimised, "things have progressed. When I was a youth I had to work for my living."

"So had I, also for the employers."

"But to-day," said the optimist P.C., "it's different. I used to roam about looking for work."

"And to-day," said the Rep., "you simply carry your Criccieth passport or Endurance card and keep on working until your old age pension wheezes round, or the employers keep you on until you die. In your young days there were no munition works, no Lloyd Georgian alteration of the Loaded Line Bill. To-day a vessel chartered in San Francisco can make £80,000 on one voyage, thus paying for her cost. Wheat was carried at 12s. 6d. per ton; to-day the families of our soldiers and sailors are compelled to pay £5 17s. 6d. per ton."

"You tell the working classes from me," said the Primo Councillor, "that some of them may be under the impression that because the King has given me this honour and calls me his right trusty and well beloved, I shall have become a Party man and shall not be of use to the workers any longer. Do tell them that the position gives me all the more power to work for and with them. I live with them and amongst them, and hope to die in their service."

"Will," said the representative solemnly, banquet as a hundred needy wanters can earn in twelve months, who come in £1,000 motors to preach economy to us who have been shorn through our short lives of art, science, knowledge, and bare necessities, are being weighed in the new poor man's balance and classed as hypocritical whited sepulchres. The infernal audacity of elected persons preaching self-denial to poor devils who have never had a decent time will, i' the near future, be laughed to scorn.

"We, the workers, want no patronage, no Courtly clad popinjays, nor, by the Lord Harry, do we want bullying. We do the useful work of the world whether with pen or pick. We are producers, not consumers who don't produce.

"We want neither flattery nor compulsion. No one knows this better than thyself, oh, once one of us.

"How can thy Court dress help a child o' the slums? How can Arthur Henderson's £5,000 a year prevent Burston women being evicted? How can a Roberts, whose principal duty is signing cheques, assist the cause of freedom? We sent ye not to Parliament for this flummery.

"Ye were sent as the representatives of the poor, so in God's name be men, and not scarecrows. Remember that those who made can unmake. Think, ere it is too late."

The Rep. then woke up. When will the people? God o' Mercy, when?

"FORWARD" OFFICES RAIDED.

SCOTTISH I.L.P. ORGAN CONFISCATED.

The offices of the Forward, the Scottish Socialist weekly, which is published at Glasgow, were raided on Monday by the Glasgow police, acting on the instructions of the Scottish military command, and the entire premises were placed under military supervision. No reason was assigned for the action of the authorities and no explanations were given.

The two military officers entrusted to carry out the warrant for the raid, assisted by members of the Glasgow police staff, made an exhaustive examination of all the documents and correspondence in the Forward offices, and seized all the copies of the last issue, which contained a report of parts of the speech made by Mr. Lloyd George at the Christmas Day conference. The report was an accurate account of the non-military parts of Lloyd George's speech, interspersed with interruptions made by delegates to the conference, and it is surmised it was this report which caused the authorities to take action.

The officers carried out their instructions with courtesy, and every assistance was given them by Mr. Thomas Johnston, the editor of the Forward, and Mr. John Taylor, the manager of the Civic Press, which is a Trade Union owned printing concern. The military officers, it should be noted, not only took possession of the Forward offices; but also held up the offices of the Civic Press, and stopped all printing work. They even forbade the manager to open the business letters which came in with the morning post! A humorous feature of the seizure is that the programme for the annual concert of the Glasgow Police was in type to be printed by the Civic Press, and, of course, was held up along with other orders.

The Forward, ever since the war began, has maintained the I.L.P. policy with regard to the war, although it has allowed writers like "Rob Roy" to express the Labour Party policy regularly.

The police visited the Glasgow newsagents on Monday and confiscated the few remaining copies of last week's issue. At the Reformers' Bookstall they got two copies instead of the haul which they expected. In other parts of the country the newsagents shops were also visited and unsold copies appropriated, and in some places the police went so far as to compel readers in country districts to give up their copies. Evidently the "Prussians" have arrived.

Mr. Johnston is convinced that the seizure of the Forward has been prompted by political motives, and points out that on no occasion has he published anything likely to prejudice the military interests of the Government. At the time of writing it is not known how the seizure will affect the next issue of the Forward, but the editor intends to get his paper out if at all possible.

The raid was referred to at the National Housing Conference at Glasgow on Monday, when Councillor P. J. Dollan, seconded by Mr. John McLean, M.A., moved a resolution protesting against the action of the authorities and demanding the same freedom of expression for the Labour Press as was permitted to the Northcliffe and other capitalist organs. The resolution was carried unanimously and with acclamation; while delegates were requested to spread the news of the raid in the workshops.

M.C.

Grandpa eats MACKINTOSH'S TOFFEE DE LUXE.

TEASDALE'S CHLORODYNE.

TEASDALE'S CHLORODYNE.

TEASDALE'S CHLORODYNE.

If people only knew they would never be without Teasdale's Chlorodyne. Used by doctors, and praised by thousands for the good it has done. If you have a Cough or Cold a few doses will cure. Bronchitis it relieves instantly; and for Stomachache, Bowel Pains, Diarrhœa, it acts like a charm. Trial Bottle, 9d. Double Size, 1¾d.

Ask for Teasdale's Chlorodyne at Chemists, Drug Stores. Same price from TEASDALE, CHEMIST, BRAMLEY, LEEDS.

GLASGOW PRUSSIANS' DEFEAT.

FREE SPEECH UPHELD.

Arising out of the "Free Speech" and "No-Conscription" demonstration held in the streets of Glasgow, on December 12, the ten speakers were prosecuted on December 29, on a charge of alleged "obstruction." The defendants were E. Shinwell, James Maxton, John McLean, A. McManus, William Gallasher, Councillor P. J. Dollan, Mrs. Helen Crawford, T. Milligan, Harry Hopkins, and Councillor J. S. Taylor. After a trial lasting nearly six hours the charge was found proved on "technical grounds," but no conviction was recorded against them or punishment imposed.

Plainly the prosecution was attributable to political reasons, as the defendants and their witnesses had no difficulty in proving that they held the meetings in the streets of George Square in order to oblige the police, who were afraid of a riot in the event of the meetings being held in the Square. For the defence the Lord Provost was called as a witness, and he did not seem too pleased with the honour thus conferred upon him by the I.L.P. The magistrates' decision "not to convict" was loudly applauded by the large crowd present in the Court.

Mr. MacDonald's Change of Address.

Sir,—Would you be good enough to inform your readers that on and after January 15 my address will no longer be 3, Lincoln's Inn Fields, but 9, Howitt Road, Hampstead, N.W.?—Yours etc.,

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD.

LABOUR'S REPLY TO CONSCRIPTION PROPOSALS

A special edition of the LABOUR LEADER will be issued on Saturday containing . . .

A FULL REPORT OF THE GREAT LABOUR CONFERENCE

This issue must be scattered broadcast throughout the country. It will voice in no uncertain way the real opinion of the Labour Movement, and its influence can be made an important factor in emphasising Labour's message to the reactionaries.

The danger of Conscription is real—IT IS IMMINENT.

Labour Can Destroy It.

Will YOU Help?

Copies of the special edition can be obtained at the following prices: Single dozens, 6d., post free; orders of six dozen, 2/6, post free; larger quantities pro rata.

Send your orders to-day. All orders received on Friday, the 7th inst., will be despatched same day. Address:

MANAGER, "LABOUR LEADER,"
30, BLACKFRIARS STREET, MANCHESTER.

THE SCOTTISH SPIRIT.

COMPULSION WILL NOT BE SUFFERED.

Conscription for single men, we are told, is inevitable. It may be that the Conscriptionists will carry their point in Parliament, but they will find it difficult to enforce it in Scotland. There are thousands of young Scotsmen who will not have Conscription at any price, and they are fearless as to the consequences of resistance. There is no force in the country which will break the spirit and determination of these young men.

Do the Conscriptionists think that they can coerce these young men? If they do they are in for a rude awakening, as these men have been preparing for resistance for some time, and will not be taken unawares. They have been informed as to the possible penalties, and the majority of them will resist to the end.

Scotsmen in years gone past have given their lives to maintain the common liberties, and there are to-day Scotsmen who are prepared to suffer the same penalty rather than accept Conscription, which would mean the beginning of the end of democracy. Scotsmen have never been afraid of death for a just cause, and the anti-Conscriptionists are not lacking in that spirit.

In every town, village, and hamlet in the provinces there is a band of resisters, and in one branch of the I.L.P. there are 75 young men who have pledged themselves to stand out against compulsory military service. Their organisation is in order, and their supporters are courageous and numerous. So far I have been referring to the provinces only.

But it is in the industrial centres, especially in the Cyde area, that the opposition to Compulsion is greatest, and the organised workers there will oppose it with all the powers at their disposal. These powers are not inconsiderable, as Mr. Lloyd George is aware by now. The influential Trade Unionists on the Clyde—that is the shop stewards and branch officials who are organised in the Clyde Workers' Committee—are opposed to Conscription, and have sent the following resolution round the workshops and shipyards:

> "That this delegate meeting of the Clyde Workers' Committee, recognising that the purport of the Conscriptionists is not a fuller supply of soldiers but the cheapening of soldiers and the military control of industry and thus the abolition of the functions of our Trade Unions, resolves to take such action as is necessary to prevent Conscription."

Steps have been taken to make that resolution effective. The Clyde men have noted that the Cabinet accepted the principle of compulsion two days after Lloyd George's futile conference at Glasgow on Christmas Day, and they are convinced the hostile reception accorded the Minister of Munitions actuated him to demand Compulsion from the Cabinet in order to revenge himself on the Clyde workers. That is how the Clyde Trade Unionists view Compulsion, and their conviction that Lloyd George is behind it will make them fight all the stronger against Conscription.

It is plain that Compulsion is not wholly intended for military purposes: it is meant for the workshop as well. The Clyde men are too patriotic, too honest, too sincere, to be misled by the oratorical claptrap of men like Lloyd George, and therefore in the opinion of the latter there must be Compulsion for the unruly men in industry. If the young men prove too rebellious in the workshops they can be smoothed down by the threat of Conscription! That is the Lloyd George idea, and the Clyde men know it.

Apart from the refusal of the workers to lie down under the tyranny of the Munitions Act, there is the agitation now on foot to secure an advance of 2d. an hour for 250,000 munition workers in the Clyde area. The Government has made it clear that there is to be no such advance, and if the men should insist on the advance, as is likely, then the best way to meet an insurgency of that kind would be to Conscript the munition workers who are single men. That is another Lloyd George idea, and the Clyde men know it. That is why the Clyde men will resist compulsory military service, and the Government had better not minimise that resistance.

At least a dozen important Socialist and Trade Union organisations in the Clyde area are now preparing to prevent Conscription and to resist it if necessary. Among these are the Scottish Executive of the Labour Party, the Clyde Workers' Committee, the Glasgow and Govan Trades Councils, the Glasgow Labour Party, I.L.P., and B.S.P. branches. Then there are numerous minor bodies and the unattached of the No-Conscription Fellowship. None of these organisations is unprepared, and all are combining to defeat Conscription.

Therefore, brothers, courage! We will win.

M. C.

TO FRIENDS IN NEWARK.

[illegible]

BRANCH REPORTS.

NEW BRANCHES.

Tumble.—John Jones, 18, Hugh Street, Tumble, Llannar, S.O., Carmarthenshire.

Hampstead Garden Suburb.—G. B. Griffiths, 87, Oakwood Road, Hendon, N.W.

Chryston.—Alexander Keith, 33, Bridgend, Chryston, Dumbartonshire.

NEW COUNCIL.

Cardiff I.L.P. Council.—J. Hamlyn Stranger, 70, Mackintosh Place, Cardiff.

CHANGE OF SECRETARY.

Perth.—James Yeoman, 318, High Street.

Blackburn.—Charles Fish, I.L.P. Institute, Freckleton Street.

Eccles.—R. Kershaw, 244, Peel Green Road, Patricroft, Eccles, Manchester.

Guildford.—H. E. Bussey, 15, Grange Road, Stoughton, Guildford, Surrey.

Holbeck.—Mr. Hodges, 25, Colenso Place, Holbeck, Leeds.

Sheffield Federation.—A. Bennett, Station Road, Killamarsh, near Sheffield.

Radcliffe.—Councillor W. Brooks, 96b, Ainsworth Road, Radcliffe, Lancs.

Batley.—Our New Year's Day Social was a great success despite the awful weather. A splendid programme had been arranged, and was ably carried out by the children, under the able guidance of Miss N. E. Turner. It was a treat and thoroughly enjoyed by all present. On Sunday evening Mr. Ben Turner was our speaker, and he dealt very largely with Labour's attitude to Conscription.

Belfast (North).—On December 26 Mr. Jas. Maxton, M.A., of Glasgow, delivered an eloquent and inspiring address on "Peace on Earth, Goodwill towards Men," showing the necessity for a constructive policy which shall make permanent peace possible. This, argued the lecturer, can only come by bringing to an end the reign of Capitalism and Competition. From the point of view of numbers the audience was most encouraging. A good discussion followed the lecture. On the Monday our annual social was held, and was one of the most successful social gatherings in the history of the branch.

Bolton.—Our secretary (Miss A. Holland) gave us a very lucid lecture on Thursday at our weekly meeting on Brailsford's "War of Steel and Gold." She proved herself to have a thorough grasp of the subject, and dealt with the question of finance in relation to national and international affairs in such a manner as to warrant the high praise which was given by the audience. Mr. Councillor S. Lomax chaired. We are still making new members.

Bristol.—A very fine meeting was held on Sunday, when Mr. W. H. Jones spoke and Mr. F. Berriman took the chair. On Thursday we had our prize distribution to our Band of Young Socialists, when nearly 50 received prizes. Songs and recitations were rendered.

Clapham.—We had a successful meeting on Sunday to open the second half-session of our winter lectures. One of the youngest of our branch members, W. J. Brown, spoke on "Labour After the War." He dealt very ably with the financial, industrial, and political position Labour would find itself in. It was an excellent speech ably delivered, and gave rise to an interesting discussion. Mr. Brown deserves to rank as one of the best speakers we have had, and we feel rather proud of him. New members are coming in well.

Coventry.—Mr. Frank Bragg has been appointed propaganda and literature secretary, and he is now busily engaged in booking speakers for the coming summer season, and would be pleased to hear of any good speakers who have vacant dates. Communications should be sent to the I.L.P. Club, Broadgate, Coventry.

Derby.—The meeting on Sunday was very interesting and helpful. Readings from the Christmas number of the LABOUR LEADER were followed by discussion. The "Christmas Appeal," "The Church Militant" (Herbert Bloye), "Christmas!" (MacDonald), and "The Example of the Carpenter" (Dr. Salter) were all highly appreciated. It would seem that the churches have handed over their work to the I.L.P.!

Dulwich.—Mr. Scott Duckers, representing the British "Stop-the-War Committee," addressed our Sunday evening meeting and stated his reasons for demanding an immediate cessation of the war. His lecture was followed most attentively by the audience throughout, and an interesting discussion followed.

Dumbarton.—Comrade Harry Hopkins delivered a rousing speech to the branch. Humour sarcasm, and earnest appeal were alternately called in to stir his hearers to a true sense of their position under the several Acts of Parliament which have been passed under a Coalition Government. He called on all unattached to join up with the organised movement.

Dunfermline.—We have begun the year well. Minshull, of Sheffield, was the speaker. His subject, "Oliver Wendell Holmes: Poet and Humorist," proved a welcome diversion from war topics. Mr. F. Acton presided. On Monday evening the annual New Year Social and Dance was held at the Trade Hall, and was a great success.

Oldham.—We had an exceptionally good meeting on Sunday in the Co-op. Hall, when "Casey" gave us a musical lecture on "Tone Poems." The Oldham Clarion Choir added to the pleasure of the gathering by finely rendering several selections. A resolution calling upon Parliament to resist Conscription was passed with only one dissentient. Cheer up!

Pontypool.—About 100 members and friends were present at the annual social on Saturday. Newport and Pontnewydd branches sent strong contingents! Mr. J. Winstone presided. He said the workers had it in their power not only to resist Conscription but also to stop wars, if they used the power intelligently. Speaking for the South Wales coalfield, he said, war or no war, we, as miners, would down tools rather than consent to Conscription, which will be enacted for industrial and not military purposes. A good musical programme was arranged, and the social terminated by the singing of the "Red Flag."

Stanley.—We began the New Year with an address by Mr. Jack Lees (Newcastle) on "Mutual Aid—A Factor in Evolution," based on Kropotkin's famous book. Mr. Lees dealt with his subject in an illuminating manner, and demonstrated most convincingly that "Co-operation is the law of life."

Stoney Stanton.—On Sunday Mr. Billson gave a most interesting address on "Questions Arising Out of the War." He made it quite plain that the only hope for the workers is Socialism, and we must fight hard against Capitalism. After the meeting we made our first new member this year! We have decided to hold our branch meetings fortnightly. To every member of the I.L.P. a Happy and Prosperous New Year.

Sunniside.—Owing to the present indisposition of the Rev. W. E. Moll, we were deprived of his presence and counsel on Thursday. Mr. Jno. E. Gilliland, however, who was booked to take the chair, stepped into the breach, and gave us a most excellent paper on "The History, Aims, and Claims of Socialism."

Swansea.—At the Central Hall, on Sunday, an extremely interesting evening was spent. The speaker was Mr. Walter Samuel (of London), and his address on "Society and Conscience" was much appreciated. After questions a discussion was presided over by Mr. W. R. Morris. Several old members have recently rejoined. All copies of the LABOUR LEADER were sold.

Tonypandy.—On Sunday a discussion on "The Theoretical Basis of Socialism" was enjoyed by the members, who are of opinion that the main reason for the diversity of opinion among Socialists concerning the present war is an insufficient understanding of the theoretical basis of Socialism. We are doing great work here among the miners, and are organising public meetings to combat Conscription. It is hoped that if Conscription is imposed upon us the miners will down tools instantly.

West Bromwich.—We had a very fine address from our friend, R. C. Wallhead, on Sunday, one which will encourage the members of this branch very much. Our only regret is that we could only count the audience in hundreds and not in thousands. The way in which he dealt with the "Jingo Compulsionists" was a treat, and gave our members of military age, who are going to oppose Conscription whatever the consequences, the "time of their lives." May we expect every member to take his share of the "manifesto" for distribution?

HOUSEHOLD AND PERSONAL.

'GRE-SOLVENT'

THE MAGIC CLEANSER.

For Grimy Hands & the Household.

MILES AHEAD OF SOAP.

LARGE TINS 3d. & 6d.

at Ironmongers, etc.

A GREAT STRENGTHENER.

Dr. Alden's Vitaloids are a safe and permanent cure for all forms of Nervous Exhaustion, such as Nervousness, Neuralgia, Backache, Uncertain Memory, Low Spirits, Sleeplessness, Brain Fag, and other "run down" conditions. This wonderful vegetable remedy is praised by thousands of delivered nerve sufferers. It feeds and soothes the tired nerves—restores lost energy—removes weakness—and fills you with the warm vitality of youth. If you are depressed or run down send two penny stamps for FREE SAMPLE so that you may test its powers for yourself. 1/3, 3/-, and 5/- per box at all chemists, or post free from VITALOIDS, Ltd., The Laboratories, Stockton-on-Tees.

York.—A very successful meeting was held on Sunday evening. Mr. W. H. Farrar presided, and Guardian A. V. Iredale was the principal speaker. His subject was: "Is the York Board of Guardians a Failure?" There was a splendid gathering, and a brisk discussion followed the speech. See advt.

Ystradgynlais.—Mr. Morgan Jones, of Bargoed, dealt very ably with secret diplomacy and Internationalism in a stirring address entitled "Socialism as an International Creed." Another two new members have been enrolled.

"LABOUR LEADER" FUND.

	£	s.	d.
Previously acknowledged	407	10	6
Mr. Pickup	1	1	0
Mr. and Mrs. K. Lok	0	10	6
C. Rene	0	10	0
J.O	0	10	0
Normanton I.L.P.	0	10	0
London E.C.	0	5	0
Kimi	0	5	0
Bournemouth I.L.P.	0	5	0
G.N.	0	4	0
S. Smith	0	3	6
Camelon I.L.P.	0	3	0
Anonymous	0	2	6
S. George	0	2	0
E. Taylor	0	2	0
Leicester I.L.P.	0	2	0
D. Harries	0	2	0
R. Grom	0	1	0
J.W.F.	0	1	0
Mrs. Grierson	0	1	0
"S"	0	1	0
C.R	0	1	0
C. R. Vitus	0	0	10

"CASEY'S" "LEADER" FUND.

	£	s.	d.
Previously acknowledged	149	9	4
T. W. Dawson (N.S.W.)	0	15	0
Daniels (Belfast)	0	10	0
A. Swede and A. Finn	0	10	0
Normanton I.L.P.	0	10	0
Carlisle I.L.P.	0	5	0
N. Bartle	0	2	6
McKellen	0	2	6
Mrs. Morris	0	2	6
Leicester I.L.P.	0	2	0
Mrs. Grierson	0	1	0
Mac (Cambuslang)	0	1	0
Friend (Dumbarton)	0	1	0
Lit. Sec. (Dumbarton)	0	1	0
T. Mellor	0	1	0

Grannie eats MACKINTOSH'S TOFFEE DE LUXE.

A BOOK OF INSPIRATION FOR 1916.

THE

KEIR HARDIE CALENDAR

A QUOTATION FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

COMPILED BY R. C. WALLHEAD.

120 pp., beautifully printed in two colours, and containing a recent photograph of Hardie.

PRICE 1s. net POST FREE 1s. 4d.

"Those who heard Keir Hardie speak or came into contact with his journalistic contributions will not need to be told of the value and variety of interest to be found in a selection of quotations taken from such sources. To all our readers, however, we would say—that as a true guide to the character of our late comrade, few happier ways could be found than in this collection of his spoken and written word."

lives to maintain the common liberties, and there are to-day Scotsmen who are prepared to suffer the same penalty rather than accept Conscription, which would mean the beginning of the end of democracy. Scotsmen have never been afraid of death for a just cause, and the anti-Conscriptionists are not lacking in that spirit.

In every town, village, and hamlet in the provinces there is a band of resisters, and in one branch of the I.L.P. there are 75 young men who have pledged themselves to stand out against compulsory military service. Their organisation is in order, and their supporters are courageous and numerous. So far I have been referring to the provinces only.

But it is in the industrial centres, especially in the Cyde area, that the opposition to Compulsion is greatest, and the organised workers there will oppose it with all the powers at their disposal. These powers are not inconsiderable, as Mr. Lloyd George is aware by now. The influential Trade Unionists on the Clyde—that is the shop stewards and branch officials who are organised in the Clyde Workers' Committee—are opposed to Conscription, and have sent the following resolution round the workshops and shipyards:

> "That this delegate meeting of the Clyde Workers' Committee, recognising that the purport of the Conscriptionists is not a fuller supply of soldiers but the cheapening of soldiers and the military control of industry and thus the abolition of the functions of our Trade Unions, resolves to take such action as is necessary to prevent Conscription."

Steps have been taken to make that resolution effective. The Clyde men have noted that the Cabinet accepted the principle of compulsion two days after Lloyd George's futile conference at Glasgow on Christmas Day, and they are convinced the hostile reception accorded the Minister of Munitions actuated him to demand Compulsion from the Cabinet in order to revenge himself on the Clyde workers. That is how the Clyde Trade Unionists view Compulsion, and their conviction that Lloyd George is behind it will make them fight all the stronger against Conscription.

It is plain that Compulsion is not wholly intended for military purposes: it is meant for the workshop as well. The Clyde men are too patriotic, too honest, too sincere, to be misled by the oratorical claptrap of men like Lloyd George, and therefore in the opinion of the latter there must be Compulsion for the unruly men in industry. If the young men prove too rebellious in the workshops they can be smoothed down by the threat of Conscription! That is the Lloyd George idea, and the Clyde men know it.

Apart from the refusal of the workers to lie down under the tyranny of the Munitions Act, there is the agitation now on foot to secure an advance of 2d. an hour for 250,000 munition workers in the Clyde area. The Government has made it clear that there is to be no such advance, and if the men should insist on the advance, as is likely, then the best way to meet an insurgency of that kind would be to Conscript the munition workers who are single men. That is another Lloyd George idea, and the Clyde men know it. That is why the Clyde men will resist compulsory military service, and the Government had better not minimise that resistance.

At least a dozen important Socialist and Trade Union organisations in the Clyde area are now preparing to prevent Conscription and to resist it if necessary. Among these are the Scottish Executive of the Labour Party, the Clyde Workers' Committee, the Glasgow and Govan Trades Councils, the Glasgow Labour Party, I.L.P., and B.S.P. branches. Then there are numerous minor bodies and the unattached of the No-Conscription Fellowship. None of these organisations is unprepared, and all are combining to defeat Conscription.

Therefore, brothers, courage! We will win.

M. C.

TO FRIENDS IN NEWARK.

The Secretary of Carlton and Netherfield I.L.P. would be very glad if the two comrades who went from Newark to hear Mr. Philip Snowden when he was at Netherfield would communicate with him. He wishes to correspond with them about the possibility of forming a branch in Newark, and has not their addresses. His name and address are Mr. J. E. Walton, 100, Burton Road, Carlton, Nottingham.

Get a Box To-day

To-morrow may be Too Late.

Robert Leake, 11, Silver Street, Barnsley, writes: "I am pleased to say your pills are of priceless worth, and I will sound their praises wherever I go." Mrs. King, Runwell Road, Wickford, states: "Duty compels to tell all who suffer that your pills cured me after years of pain." Mr. A. Newman, of Feltham, writes: "Your pills have completely cured me after four months on my back."—HOLDROYD'S GRAVEL PILLS, a positive cure for Gravel, Pains in the Back, Dropsy, Bright's Disease of the Kidneys, Gout, Sciatica.

1s. 14d. all chemists. Post free, 12 stamps, HOLDROYD'S MEDICAL HALL, CLECKHEATON.

Stoughton, Guildford, Surrey.

Holbeck.—Mr. Hodges, 25, Colenso Place, Holbeck, Leeds.

Sheffield Federation.—A. Bennett, Station Road, Killamarsh, near Sheffield.

Radcliffe.—Councillor W. Brooks, 96b, Ainsworth Road, Radcliffe, Lancs.

Batley.—Our New Year's Day Social was a great success despite the awful weather. A splendid programme had been arranged, and was ably carried out by the children, under the able guidance of Miss N. E. Turner. It was a treat and thoroughly enjoyed by all present. On Sunday evening Mr. Ben Turner was our speaker, and he dealt very largely with Labour's attitude to Conscription.

Belfast (North).—On December 26 Mr. Jas. Maxton, M.A., of Glasgow, delivered an eloquent and inspiring address on "Peace on Earth, Goodwill towards Men," showing the necessity for a constructive policy which shall make permanent peace possible. This, argued the lecturer, can only come by bringing to an end the reign of Capitalism and Competition. From the point of view of numbers the audience was most encouraging. A good discussion followed the lecture. On the Monday our annual social was held, and was one of the most successful social gatherings in the history of the branch.

Bolton.—Our secretary (Miss A. Holland) gave us a very lucid lecture on Thursday at our weekly meeting on Brailsford's "War of Steel and Gold." She proved herself to have a thorough grasp of the subject, and dealt with the question of finance in relation to national and international affairs in such a manner as to warrant the high praise which was given by the audience. Mr. Councillor S. Lomax chaired. We are still making new members.

Bristol.—A very fine meeting was held on Sunday, when Mr. W. H. Jones spoke and Mr. F. Berriman took the chair. On Thursday we had our prize distribution to our Band of Young Socialists, when nearly 50 received prizes. Songs and recitations were rendered.

Clapham.—We had a successful meeting on Sunday to open the second half-session of our winter lectures. One of the youngest of our branch members, W. J. Brown, spoke on "Labour After the War." He dealt very ably with the financial, industrial, and political position Labour would find itself in. It was an excellent speech ably delivered, and gave rise to an interesting discussion. Mr. Brown deserves to rank as one of the best speakers we have had, and we feel rather proud of him. New members are coming in well.

Coventry.—Mr. Frank Bragg has been appointed propaganda and literature secretary, and he is now busily engaged in booking speakers for the coming summer season, and would be pleased to hear of any good speakers who have vacant dates. Communications should be sent to the I.L.P. Club, Broadgate, Coventry.

Derby.—The meeting on Sunday was very interesting and helpful. Readings from the Christmas number of the LABOUR LEADER were followed by discussion. The "Christmas Appeal," "The Church Militant" (Herbert Bloye), "Christmas!" (MacDonald), and "The Example of the Carpenter" (Dr. Salter) were all highly appreciated. It would seem that the churches have handed over their work to the I.L.P.!

Dulwich.—Mr. Scott Duckers, representing the British "Stop-the-War Committee," addressed our Sunday evening meeting and stated his reasons for demanding an immediate cessation of the war. His lecture was followed most attentively by the audience throughout, and an interesting discussion followed.

Dumbarton.—Comrade Harry Hopkins delivered a rousing speech to the branch. Humour sarcasm, and earnest appeal were alternately called in to stir his hearers to a true sense of their position under the several Acts of Parliament which have been passed under a Coalition Government. He called on all unattached to join up with the organised movement.

Erdington.—We have begun the year well. On Saturday our New Year Social was a great success from every point of view. The party was brought to a close by the singing of "Auld Lang Syne" and the "Red Flag." On Sunday Councillor Kneeshaw, although he had obviously not recovered from his recent illness, gave a very good address on "Diplomacy and War." He also unveiled our beautifully framed photograph of Keir Hardie.

Kettering.—At the meeting of the Labour Church on Sunday, Councillor J. Haynes, vice-chairman of the Kettering U.D.C., delivered a much appreciated address on "The Patriotism of the I.L.P." The speaker demonstrated that the I.L.P., alone of the political organisations, had expressed the true patriotic spirit.

Leicester.—The Trade Hall meetings were resumed on Sunday evening, when Mr. R. H. no war, we, as miners, would down tools rather than consent to Conscription, which will be enacted for industrial and not military purposes. A good musical programme was arranged, and the social terminated by the singing of the "Red Flag."

Stanley.—We began the New Year with an address by Mr. Jack Lees (Newcastle) on "Mutual Aid—A Factor in Evolution," based on Kropotkin's famous book. Mr. Lees dealt with his subject in an illuminating manner, and demonstrated most convincingly that "Co-operation is the law of life."

Stoney Stanton.—On Sunday Mr. Billson gave a most interesting address on "Questions Arising Out of the War." He made it quite plain that the only hope for the workers is Socialism, and we must fight hard against Capitalism. After the meeting we made our first new member this year! We have decided to hold our branch meetings fortnightly. To every member of the I.L.P. a Happy and Prosperous New Year.

Sunniside.—Owing to the present indisposition of the Rev. W. E. Moll, we were deprived of his presence and counsel on Thursday. Mr. Jno. E. Gilliland, however, who was booked to take the chair, stepped into the breach, and gave us a most excellent paper on "The History, Aims, and Claims of Socialism."

Swansea.—At the Central Hall, on Sunday, an extremely interesting evening was spent. The speaker was Mr. Walter Samuel (of London), and his address on "Society and Conscience" was much appreciated. After questions a discussion was presided over by Mr. W. R. Morris. Several old members have recently rejoined. All copies of the LABOUR LEADER were sold.

Tonypandy.—On Sunday a discussion on "The Theoretical Basis of Socialism" was enjoyed by the members, who are of opinion that the main reason for the diversity of opinion among Socialists concerning the present war is an insufficient understanding of the theoretical basis of Socialism. We are doing great work here among the miners, and are organising public meetings to combat Conscription. It is hoped that if Conscription is imposed upon us the miners will down tools instantly.

West Bromwich.—We had a very fine address from our friend, R. C. Wallhead, on Sunday, one which will encourage the members of this branch very much. Our only regret is that we could only count the audience in hundreds and not in thousands. The way in which he dealt with the "Jingo Compulsionists" was a treat, and gave our members of military age, who are going to oppose Conscription whatever the consequences, the "time of their lives." May we expect every member to take his share of the "manifesto" for distribution?

FREE SALVATION FOR ALL
By the Spirit of Revelation in
ZION'S WORKS,
Vols. I.—XVI. (with Catalogue).
In Free Libraries. —8—6

York.—A very successful meeting was held on Sunday evening. Mr. W. H. Farrar presided, and Guardian A. V. Iredale was the principal speaker. His subject was: "Is the York Board of Guardians a Failure?" There was a splendid gathering, and a brisk discussion followed the speech. See advt.

Ystradgynlais.—Mr. Morgan Jones, of Bargoed, dealt very ably with secret diplomacy and Internationalism in a stirring address entitled "Socialism as an International Creed." Another two new members have been enrolled.

"LABOUR LEADER" FUND.

	£	s.	d.
Previously acknowledged	407	10	6
Mr. Pickup	1	1	0
Mr. and Mrs. K. Lok	0	10	6
C. Rene	0	10	0
J.O	0	10	0
Normanton I.L.P.	0	10	0
London E.C.	0	5	0
Kimi	0	5	0
Bournemouth I.L.P.	0	5	0
G.N.	0	4	0
S. Smith	0	3	6
Camelon I.L.P.	0	3	0
Anonymous	0	2	6
S. George	0	2	0
E. Taylor	0	2	0
Leicester I.L.P.	0	2	0
D. Harries	0	2	0
R. Grom	0	1	0
J.W.F.	0	1	0
Mrs. Grierson	0	1	0
"S"	0	1	0
C.R	0	1	0
C. R. Vitus	0	0	10

"CASEY'S" "LEADER" FUND.

	£	s.	d.
Previously acknowledged	149	9	4
T. W. Dawson (N.S.W.)	0	15	0
Daniels (Belfast)	0	10	0
A. Swede and A. Finn	0	10	0
Normanton I.L.P.	0	10	0
Carlisle I.L.P.	0	5	0
N. Bartle	0	2	6
McKellen	0	2	6
Mrs. Morris	0	2	6
Leicester I.L.P.	0	2	0
Mrs. Grierson	0	1	0
Mac (Cambuslang)	0	1	0
Friend (Dumbarton)	0	1	0
Lit. Sec. (Dumbarton)	0	1	0
T. Mellor	0	1	0

Grannie eats MACKINTOSH'S TOFFEE DE LUXE.

A BOOK OF INSPIRATION FOR 1916.

THE

KEIR HARDIE CALENDAR

A QUOTATION FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

COMPILED BY R. C. WALLHEAD.

120 pp., beautifully printed in two colours, and containing a recent photograph of Hardie.

PRICE 1s. :: POST FREE 1s. 4d.

"Those who heard Keir Hardie speak or came into contact with his journalistic contributions will not need to be told of the value and variety of interest to be found in a selection of quotations taken from such sources. To all our readers, however, we would say—that as a true guide to the character of our late comrade, few happier ways could be found than in this collection of his spoken and written word."

THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, Ltd., 30, Blackfriars St., MANCHESTER.

AVOID WAR PROFITS!

BY ALWAYS WEARING

I.L.P. BOOTS AND SHOES

HONEST VALUE — GREATEST SATISFACTION — MANY REPEATS

EVERY PAIR STAMPED

8/9 POST FREE

Stock No. 216, Ladies' Glace Kid

Write to day. Beautifully illustrated Catalogue post free.

H. E. D. LODINGTON,

I.L.P. CO-OPERATIVE BOOTS CO. Y, Ltd. NORTHAMPTON.

NATIONAL UNION OF BOOT & SHOE OPERATIVES — TRADE UNION LABOUR — No 9

Copyright.

11/9 POST FREE

Stock No. 108, Gents' Box Calf.

Mention LABOUR LEADER.

4420 Ye
679/18

THE I.L.P. AT WORK.

ENGLAND.

BIRMINGHAM'S BIG DAY,
SATURDAY, JANUARY 15. BOOK IT.

"CASEY" & DOLLY
AND FENNER BROCKWAY
(Editor "Labour Leader.")
At QUEEN'S COLLEGE, 7-30 p.m.
Single Tickets, 1/- Double Tickets, 1/6
From Councillor J. W. KNEESHAW, 285, Shenstone Road, Birmingham. —13—1

LIVERPOOL & DISTRICT I.L.P.
GENERAL MEETING OF THE PARTY,
Sunday, January 9, at 3 p.m.
Clarion Cafe, Lord Street.
BUSINESS: IMPORTANT.
Liverpool Men and Women who agree with the I.L.P. but who are unattached should join at once. Don't keep putting off the next step. Apply to—Wright Robinson, Organising Secretary, 37, Moorfields. —6—1

MANCHESTER CENTRAL BRANCH I.L.P.
Clarion Cafe, Market Street, Sunday, January 9, at 7-30, resumption of Sunday Evening Lectures, subject:
"ENGLISH CATHEDRALS."
Lecturer: Mr. J. G. Birkby, M.A.
Illustrated by lantern views.
Music, Collection.
Hearty welcome to old and new friends. —6—1

NELSON I.L.P.
MISS SYLVIA PANKHURST
will give a lecture in the
INSTITUTE, VERNON STREET, subject:
"The Fight for Liberty during the War."
Chair to be taken at 7-15 p.m., by B. INGHAM, Esq., Nelson.
Admission by ticket, 2d. each. Ticket holders to be in their seats by 7 p.m. —6—1

SOUTHAMPTON I.L.P.
SUNDAY EVENING NEXT, MORRIS HALL, Commercial Road, 8 p.m.
Com. MAISKY
(Member of the Russian Political Prisoners and Exiles' Relief Committee in London) 8302

BATLEY I.L.P.—Institute, Wellington Street, Sunday next, at 6-30 p.m., Branch Meeting. Business important. —6—1

BOURNEMOUTH I.L.P.—Sunday, Jan. 9, 7 p.m., Vectis Hall, Branch Meeting. 6677

DERBY I.L.P.—Socialist Hall, Full Street. Saturday, 8 p.m., Dance. Sunday, 6-30 p.m., Mr. C. TURNER, "Municipal Abuses." Monday, 7-30 p.m., Whist Drive. Tuesday, 8 p.m., Branch Meeting. 6659

HALIFAX I.L.P.—Sunday next. Socialist Hall, 6-30 p.m., BEN RILEY, of Huddersfield. Children's Fancy Dress Ball, Saturday, January 8. 6664

HYDE FEDERATION.—Delegates' Meeting. Sunday next, Jan. 9, at Hyde, 3-30 p.m. 6662

KEIGHLEY I.L.P.—Meeting, Sunday, at 6-30 p.m. Whist Drive, Saturday, 7-30 p.m.

LONG EATON I.L.P.—Labour Hall, Sunday, Jan. 9, at 6-30 p.m., Mr. S. BRASSINGTON, "My Work as Poor Law Guardian." —6—1

OLDHAM I.L.P.—Whist Drive, Saturday, at 7-30 p.m. Miss PEMBERTON, of Bolton, Sunday, at 7 p.m. Monday, Members' Meeting at 8 p.m., for instructing and electing delegates to Conference. 6660

WEST BROMWICH LABOUR CHURCH.—People's Hall, Lower High St. Sunday next, 6-30 p.m., "CASEY" and his Violin. —6—1

STAPLEFORD & SANDIACRE I.L.P.—Albert Hall, Stapleford, Sunday, Jan. 9, at 6-30 p.m., Mr. A. FENNER BROCKWAY. Subject: "The War and a Way Out of It." Look out for Mr. BRUCE GLASIER on Jan. 30. 6665

YORK I.L.P.—Sunday, Jan. 9, 7 p.m., I.L.P. Rooms, Micklegate. Speaker: Mr. W. H. FARRAR. Subject: "Conscription." Discussion afterwards. 6—1

LONDON.

CLAPHAM I.L.P.
Masons Hall, 11a, North Street, Clapham, S.W.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 9, at 7-30 p.m.,
Speaker: C. H. NORMAN.

WALES.

BRITON FERRY I.L.P.
IMPORTANT BRANCH MEETING will be held on SUNDAY EVENING NEXT, JANUARY 9, at the CLUB ROOM, PUBLIC HALL.
Business—Appoint delegates and discuss agenda for Merthyr conference. Meeting commences 7-45. —6—

CATHAYS I.L.P.—Institute, May St., Sunday next, at 7 p.m., Mrs. HOWELL. Subject: "India and India's Women." Jan. 30, "CASEY." —6—1

CARDIFF BRANCH I.L.P.—Ruskin Institute, Royal Arcade. Sunday, Jan. 9, 6-30 p.m., J. E. EDMUNDS, "A Historic Week." —6—1

NEWPORT (MON.) I.L.P.—Institute, Talbot Lane, Charles St. Sunday, Jan. 9, at 6-45 p.m., Mr. TED JAMES (Risca) will give a paper on "Bernard Shaw." All are welcome. —6—1

OTHER MEETINGS.

LIVERPOOL FABIAN SOCIETY & CLARION CLUB.
At the Clarion Cafe, 30, Lord Street, Liverpool,
Friday, January 7, at 8 o'clock p.m.,
A Lecture by MRS. BRUCE GLASIER, on J. KEIR HARDIE; the man and his message.
Admission: Members, Free; Visitors, 3d. —6—1

Come to the HYDE PARK
SUFFRAGE AND LABOUR
— DEMONSTRATION —
AGAINST CONSCRIPTION
SUNDAY, January 9,
—3 p.m.—
—6—1

STOURBRIDGE LABOUR CHURCH
(Corner of Enville Street).
JANUARY 16, 1916, at 6-30 p.m.,
"CASEY" AND DOLLY,
"The Wandering Minstrels."
SILVER COLLECTION. —6—1

NORTH LONDON DIVISION HERALD LEAGUE
COME AND HEAR
GEORGE LANSBURY
at ARGYLE HALL, 105, Seven Sisters Road, N. (near Hornsey Road).
SUBJECT: "TO-DAY."
Admission Free! Everybody Welcome!! 6671

THE BRITISH 'STOP-THE-WAR' COMMITTEE.
WANTED enthusiasts willing to act as local Secretaries, in all parts of the country.
Communicate with—
The Organising Secretary, W. WILLIAM LEWIS, 13, Ferme Park Mansions, Crouch End, London, N. 6673

BIRMINGHAM SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—Debate on "Imperialism," Sunday, Jan. 9, at 7 p.m., in Bristol Street Council Schools. 6663

BIRMINGHAM SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—A Whist Drive will be held at Rodway's Restaurant, Horse Fair, on Saturday, Jan. 22, at 7-30 p.m. Tickets, One Shilling, may be had at Sunday meetings or from Secretary, 191, Mansel Road. 6666

HYDE SOCIALIST CYHURCH.—Owing to enormous success of Hyde Clarion Players in Shakespeare's "Tempest" further performances will take place this Saturday and next Tuesday, 7-30 p.m. Come early to secure a seat. Scores of people were unable to do so last week owing to late arrival. Ask for invitations now. This Sunday, 6-30 p.m., Special Lecture by Mrs. LEO GRINDON and Manchester Shakespeare Tercentenary Association, on "The Tempest" and Shakespeare. Admission free. Collection. Don't miss this treat. —6—1

APARTMENTS.

COMMUNE.—Stanford-le-Hope, Essex. Week end, 2/9 and a little digging.—Apply Secretary. P—10—2

ISLE OF WIGHT (Free from rabbit).—Furnished apartments or board; ideal winter home with Socialists; twelve large rooms; two acres of gardens and poultry farm, overlooking Sandown Bay.—Gibbon, "Invenia," Reading. P—11—1

WANTED.

CONSCRIPTION AND CONSCIENCE

Presidential Address to Convention
:: of No-Conscription Fellowship ::
BY
CLIFFORD ALLEN.
PRICE 1d. Post free, 1½d.
To be obtained from 8, Merton House, Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, E.C., or from The National Labour Press, Ltd., London and Manchester.

JAMES KEIR HARDIE

"HIS memory will live for ever." Often since our comrade passed away have we heard and read these words, and we know them to be true. As a fitting memento of such a career we have secured two strikingly life-like photographs of Keir Hardie, copies of which can be obtained from us in accordance with the particulars given below. The photographs are reproduced on thick white art board, and they will make a beautiful and treasured addition to the home of every Socialist and admirer of our late leader.

SIZE OF PHOTOGRAPH AND MOUNT, 12in. x 7in.
Style: Bust and three-quarter length (when ordering state which style of photograph is required). PRICE 5/- post free.

THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, LIMITED, 30, BLACKFRIARS STREET, MANCHESTER.

MUNITIONS

By FRANK H. ROSE
(Member of the A.S.E.)

ENGINEERS, WAKE UP!
LLOYD GEORGE MUST GO!
PRICE ONE PENNY; Post free, 1½d.; 5s. per 100 carr. paid
From THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, LIMITED, 30, BLACKFRIARS STREET, MANCHESTER.
And St. Bride's House, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C.

SPEAKERS.

"CASEY" ON TOUR.
Pianist:* MISS PICKARD.
Lectures:
"EVENING WITH THE MUSICIANS."
"MUSIC OF THE PEOPLE."
"THE SOUL OF IRELAND."
South Wales between January 30 and February 18, open dates.
London & Southern Counties between February 20 and March 3, open dates.
Bristol, March 5, open dates.
Brum. & Midlands, March 18, open dates.
Write 9, Chapel Street, Stockport. —6—1

GEO. BENSON, 4 York street, Manchester. Terms: Railway fare.

MISS JESSIE McKAY, Tower House, Cowpasture Rd., Ilkley. P—13—1

MISCELLANEOUS.

A POSTCARD ONLY.
A little knowledge saves much medicine.
You cannot hold your own in life's battle if weak, worn, or easily jaded. Periodical attacks of nervousness, languor, despondency, depression, and groundless fears mean nerve troubles, and lead to brain fag, impaired memory, and much else that checks business, or pleasure.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Continued.

ANARCHISM.—For List of Books and Pamphlets send postcard to FREEDOM PRESS, 127, Ossulston Street, London, N.W. P7—1

EPILEPSY.
(FITS).
A new book on above distressing complaint has just been published entitled, "Epilepsy: Its Causes, Symptoms, and Treatment." By J. Gilbert Dale. Contents: Introduction—The Causes of Epilepsy—The Form and Effect of Epilepsy—The Treatment. Price 1s. post free. The Colston Publishing Co., 43, Lambert House, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

NATIONAL UNION OF GASWORKERS & GENERAL LABOURERS (London District).—Watch Competition. Watch stopped, 12 hours, 21 minutes, 29 seconds. —6—1

CHOPWELL S.S.S.—Prize Draw postponed till Jan. 21, owing to books not returned. Result will appear here Jan. 29. —6—1

FROM PIT TO PARLIAMENT

Wright Robinson, Organising Secretary, 20, Broomfields. —6—1

MANCHESTER CENTRAL BRANCH I.L.P.

Clarion Cafe, Market Street, Sunday, January 9, at 7-30, resumption of Sunday Evening Lectures, subject:

"ENGLISH CATHEDRALS."

Lecturer: Mr. J. G. Birkby, M.A.

Illustrated by lantern views.
Music, Collection.

Hearty welcome to old and new friends. —6—1

NELSON I.L.P.
MISS SYLVIA PANKHURST
will give a lecture in the
INSTITUTE, VERNON STREET, subject:
"The Fight for Liberty during the War."

Chair to be taken at 7-15 p.m., by
B. INGHAM, Esq., Nelson.

Admission by ticket, 2d. each. Ticket holders to be in their seats by 7 p.m. —6—1

SOUTHAMPTON I.L.P.

SUNDAY EVENING NEXT, MORRIS HALL, Commercial Road, 8 p.m.

Com. MAISKY

(Member of the Russian Political Prisoners and Exiles' Relief Committee in London) 8302

BATLEY I.L.P.—Institute, Wellington Street, Sunday next, at 6-30 p.m., Branch Meeting. Business important. —6—1

BOURNEMOUTH I.L.P.—Sunday, Jan. 9, 7 p.m., Vectis Hall, Branch Meeting. 6677

DERBY I.L.P.—Socialist Hall, Full Street. Saturday, 8 p.m., Dance. Sunday, 6-30 p.m., Mr. C. TURNER, "Municipal Abuses." Monday, 7-30 p.m., Whist Drive. Tuesday, 8 p.m., Branch Meeting. 6659

HALIFAX I.L.P.—Sunday next. Socialist Hall, 6-30 p.m., BEN RILEY, of Huddersfield. Children's Fancy Dress Ball, Saturday, January 8. 6664

HYDE FEDERATION.—Delegates' Meeting, Sunday next, Jan. 9, at Hyde, 3-30 p.m. 6662

KEIGHLEY I.L.P.—Meeting, Sunday, at 6-30 p.m. Whist Drive, Saturday, 7-30 p.m.

LONG EATON I.L.P.—Labour Hall, Sunday, Jan. 9, at 6-30 p.m., Mr. S. BRASSINGTON, "My Work as Poor Law Guardian." —6—1

OLDHAM I.L.P.—Whist Drive, Saturday, at 7-30 p.m. Miss PEMBERTON, of Bolton, Sunday, at 7 p.m. Monday, Members' Meeting at 8 p.m., for instructing and electing delegates to Conference. 6660

WEST BROMWICH LABOUR CHURCH.—People's Hall, Lower High St. Sunday next, 6-30 p.m., "CASEY" and his Violin. —6—1

STAPLEFORD & SANDIACRE I.L.P.—Albert Hall, Stapleford, Sunday, Jan. 9, at 6-30 p.m., Mr. A. FENNER BROCKWAY. Subject: "The War and a Way Out of It." Look out for Mr. BRUCE GLASIER on Jan. 30. 6655

YORK I.L.P.—Sunday, Jan. 9, 7 p.m., I.L.P. Rooms, Micklegate. Speaker: Mr. W. H. FARRAR. Subject: "Conscription." Discussion afterwards. —6—1

LONDON.

CLAPHAM I.L.P.

Morris Hall, 11a, North Street, Clapham, S.W.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 9, at 7-30 p.m.,

Speaker: C. H. NORMAN.

Subject: "The Crimes of the Government."

ADMISSION FREE. MUSIC. 6658

BERMONDSEY I.L.P.—Jan. 13, Discussion, "What Should be the Terms of Peace?" To be opened by Dr. SALTER. Jan. 15, Invitation Social to Members. 6675

DULWICH.—Hansler Hall, Hansler Road, Lordship Lane. Friday, 8-30 p.m., W. N. EWER, "Nationality." Sunday, 7 p.m., Dr. ETHEL BENTHAM, "Vitality and the War." Friday, Jan. 14, W. N. EWER (U.D.C.), "Secret Diplomacy." 6661

WOOLWICH I.L.P.—Sunday next, Jan. 9, 7-30 p.m., HERBERT MORRISON will speak "Of Politics Once More" at Lakedale Road Co-op. Room, Plumstead. Members' Meeting at 7 p.m. sharp. —6—1

SCOTLAND.

PAISLEY I.L.P.—Rooms, 111, Causeyside. Open every evening. Branch Meetings Fridays, at 8 p.m. New members welcomed.

IRELAND.

BELFAST I.L.P. (NORTH BRANCH).—Langley St. A meeting will be held every Sunday at 7-30 p.m. All welcome. P—27—1

J. KEIR HARDIE; the man and his message.
Admission: Members, Free; Visitors, 3d. —6—1

Come to the HYDE PARK

SUFFRAGE AND LABOUR
— DEMONSTRATION —

AGAINST CONSCRIPTION

SUNDAY, January 9,
3 p.m.
—6—1

STOURBRIDGE LABOUR CHURCH
(Corner of Enville Street).
JANUARY 16, 1916, at 6-30 p.m.,
"CASEY" AND DOLLY,
"The Wandering Minstrels."
SILVER COLLECTION. —6—1

NORTH LONDON DIVISION HERALD LEAGUE
COME AND HEAR
GEORGE LANSBURY
at ARGYLE HALL, 105, Seven Sisters Road, N. (near Hornsey Road).
SUBJECT: "TO-DAY."
Admission Free! Everybody Welcome!! 6671

THE BRITISH 'STOP-THE-WAR' COMMITTEE.

WANTED enthusiasts willing to act as local Secretaries, in all parts of the country.

Communicate with—
The Organising Secretary, W. WILLIAM LEWIS, 13, Ferme Park Mansions, Crouch End, London, N. 6673

BIRMINGHAM SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—Debate on "Imperialism," Sunday, Jan. 9, at 7 p.m., in Bristol Street Council Schools. 6663

BIRMINGHAM SOCIALIST SOCIETY.—A Whist Drive will be held at Rodway's Restaurant, Horse Fair, on Saturday, Jan. 22, at 7-30 p.m. Tickets, One Shilling, may be had at Sunday meetings or from Secretary, 191, Mansel Road. 6666

HYDE SOCIALIST CHURCH.—Owing to enormous success of Hyde Clarion Players in Shakespeare's "Tempest" further performances will take place this Saturday and next Tuesday, 7-30 p.m. Come early to secure a seat. Scores of people were unable to do so last week owing to late arrival. Ask for invitations now. This Sunday, 6-30 p.m., Special Lecture by Mrs. LEO GRINDON and Manchester Shakespeare Tercentenary Association, on "The Tempest" and Shakespeare. Admission free. Collection. Don't miss this treat. —6—1

APARTMENTS.

COMMUNE.—Stanford-le-Hope, Essex. Week-end, 2/9 and a little digging.—Apply Secretary. P—10—2

ISLE OF WIGHT (Free from raids).—Furnished apartments or board; ideal winter home with Socialists; twelve large rooms; two acres of gardens and poultry farm, overlooking Sandown Bay.—Gliddon, "Devonia," Brading. P—14—1

WANTED.

JOB WANTED.—On land if possible, or anything useful; in building trade, but out of work because eligible; varied experience, colonial and home; age 27.—S. W., 27, Geoffrey Gardens, East Ham, London, E. 6669

WANTED.—Men as labourers in small factory, making food; also works mechanic, Liverpool district.—Box 6667, LABOUR LEADER.

JAMES KEIR HARDIE

"HIS memory will live for ever." Often since our comrade passed away have we heard and read these words, and we know them to be true. As a fitting memento of such a career we have secured two strikingly life-like photographs of Keir Hardie, copies of which can be obtained from us in accordance with the particulars given below. The photographs are reproduced on thick white art board, and they will make a beautiful and treasured addition to the home of every Socialist and admirer of our late leader.

SIZE OF PHOTOGRAPH AND MOUNT, 12in. x 7in.
Style: Bust and three-quarter length (when ordering state which style of photograph is required). PRICE 5/- post free.

THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, LIMITED, 30, BLACKFRIARS STREET, MANCHESTER.

MUNITIONS

By FRANK H. ROSE
(Member of the A.S.E.)

ENGINEERS, WAKE UP!
LLOYD GEORGE MUST GO!

PRICE ONE PENNY; Post free, 1½d.; 5s. per 100 car. paid
From THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, LIMITED, 30, BLACKFRIARS STREET, MANCHESTER.
And St. Bride's House, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C.

SPEAKERS.

"CASEY" ON TOUR.
Pianist:* MISS PICKARD.

Lectures:
"EVENING WITH THE MUSICIANS."
"MUSIC OF THE PEOPLE."
"THE SOUL OF IRELAND."

South Wales between January 30 and February 18, open dates.
London & Southern Counties between February 20 and March 3, open dates.
Bristol, March 5, open dates.
Brum. & Midlands, March 18, open dates.

Write 9, Chapel Street, Stockport. —6—1

GEO BENSON, 8, York-street, Manchester. Terms: Railway fare.

MISS JESSIE McKAY, Tower House, Cowpasture Rd., Ilkley. P—13—1

MISCELLANEOUS.

A POSTCARD ONLY.

A little knowledge saves much medicine.

You cannot hold your own in life's battle if weak, worn, or easily jaded. Periodical attacks of moodiness, languor, despondency, depression, and groundless fears mean nerve troubles, and lead to brain fag, impaired memory, and unfit one for study, business, or pleasure. The chosen ones in every walk of life are the alert, the bright, the intelligent. Nature's natural gift, but marred for lack of a little knowledge. A postcard to the Useful Knowledge Publishers, P.O. Box 94, Bradford, will put you in possession of a 48-page book, neatly bound, of valuable information, and will be sent post paid free of any charge whatsoever if you mention LABOUR LEADER.

[Copyright, P—23—3]

MISCELLANEOUS.—Continued.

ANARCHISM.—For List of Books and Pamphlets send postcard to FREEDOM PRESS, 127, Ossulston Street, London, N.W. P7—1

EPILEPSY.
(FITS).

A new book on above distressing complaint has just been published entitled, "Epilepsy: Its Causes, Symptoms, and Treatment." By J. Gilbert Dale. Contents: Introduction—The Causes of Epilepsy—The Form and Effect of Epilepsy—The Treatment. Price 1s. post free. The Colston Publishing Co., 43, Lambert House, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

NATIONAL UNION OF GASWORKERS & GENERAL LABOURERS (London District).—Watch Competition. Watch stopped, 12 hours, 21 minutes, 29 seconds. —6—1

CHOPWELL S.S.S.—Prize Draw postponed till Jan. 22, owing to books not returned. Result will appear here Jan. 29. —6—1

FROM PIT TO PARLIAMENT

KEIR HARDIE'S
. LIFE STORY .

By FRANK SMITH, L.C.C.

Illustrated, including "Vanity Fair" Caricature of Mr. Hardie.

PRICE 1d. POST FREE, 1½d. from
The National Labour Press, Ltd., 30, Blackfriars St., Manchester.

Bournville
COCOA
"QUALITY UNALTERED, PRICE THE SAME, 7½d. per ¼-lb."

Printed and Published by THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, LTD., at 30, Blackfriars Street, Manchester; London Depôt: St. Bride's House, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C., by Trade Union Labour. Entered at the New York Post Office as second-class matter.

679/19

THE DAILY NEWS AND I

ORGANISED LABOUR DEC

LABOUR AGAINST THE BILL.

Direct Challenge to Coalition Government.

DRAMATIC SCENES AT GREAT TRADE UNION CONFERENCE.

(By FRANK DILNOT.)

A specially-summoned Labour Congress, consisting of a thousand delegates, representing three million workers in all parts of the country, decided at Westminster yesterday by a sweeping majority to oppose the Compulsion Bill of the Government. Dramatic scenes marked a historic day. At half-past four, after nearly five hours' spirited discussion, the conference passed a resolution hostile to the Bill by 1,998,000 to 783,000 Hundreds of delegates shouted in their exultation. Many of them sprang on to their seats waving hats and handkerchiefs. In a great chorus the Socialist song, "Keep the Red Flag Flying," rang through the hall.

Such great issues had never lain in front of a Labour Conference before. No one could know what the upshot would be, although everyone was well aware that some kind of a decision was inevitable, and that the decision, whatever it was, must, for good or evil, be a momentous one. What was the situation? The Government in the stress of war urgency had introduced a Bill enforcing military service on single men up to 41 years of age. The Labour movement, ardently desirous of winning the war, was equally strong in a determination to prevent Conscription getting a foothold in these islands.

Which of these two great considerations would triumph? Were they incompatible? If they could be reconciled, how and by what means? These were the issues facing the thousand men who flocked into the Central Hall. Among the personal questions which the day would solve was the official fate of Mr. Arthur Henderson, a member of the Cabinet, and Mr. William Brace and Mr. G. H. Roberts, junior members of the Government, because the three representing the Labour movement form part of the Coalition. A decision by Labour hostile to the Bill would automatically lead to their resignation from the councils of the State.

EXPECTANCY & DETERMINATION.

That was the position when Mr. Harry Gosling, chairman of the Trade Union Congress, took the chair and called for order this morning The delegates seated side by side filled the body of the great hall, talking among themselves. There was no loud manifestation of excitement, and yet any student of human nature would have known that the whole of that gathering was on edge, quivering with determination and expectancy. Up on the platform, to the right of the silver-haired [illegible] face, but with a grim [illegible]ness about him. Among other leaders seated to the left were Mr. Brace and Mr. Roberts. A few yards from them was Mr. Sidney Webb, in the neighbourhood of Mr. Will Thorne.

A printed agenda, circulated among delegates as they came in, outlined the course of procedure. On it was set out a resolution formulated on the previous evening by the leaders of the three National Labour Committees. It was a resolution which bore evidences of compromise. It reaffirmed the decision of the Bristol Trades Congress against compulsory military service, but it went on to express regret at having to recognise that the net results of Lord Derby's scheme, magnificent as they were had to be governed by the Prime Minister's pledge to married recruits.

The point of the resolution was in its concluding phrase, for, coupled with a protest against the Bill, was the condition that the Labour members of Parliament [illegible] ing, and a little group of Independent Labour Party men seated halfway down the hall were openly elated at the way things were going.

Mr. Anderson was the next speaker, a square-built figure of a man, with a rare gift of words and expression. He scouted the danger of a General Election to Labour. He too would rather see the Labour Party wiped out than that it should lose its soul. In the course of his speech he mentioned Sir John Simon, and the name of the late Home Secretary was received with loud cheers. "Single men first," said Mr. Anderson, "a skilful cry—a tricky cry. Does any man here suppose that compulsion is going to stop with single men? If you agree to military compulsion to-day, what will you have to say against industrial compulsion to-morrow? You will have sold the pass."

The delegates went out to lunch knowing that the tide amongst them was steadily set in one direction. When they came back Mr. Henderson rose to stem the tide. He made a fine speech, one of the finest he has ever delivered. He told the conference his beliefs; he practically defied them in defence of those beliefs. If those against this Bill refused to be bound by any decision of the Congress in favour of it, he too would refuse to be bound by any decision of the Congress against it. He turned towards Mr. Thomas and Mr. Anderson. "Other members have not sold their souls," he said, "nor have I." "You haven't got one," shouted a delegate. Fiercely Mr. Henderson pinned the interrupter down. "I have thirty years of Trade Unionism behind me," he said, "which I should imagine is a good deal more than that possessed by the man who made that remark."

He went on to say that the delegates who had made insulting interruptions comprised those who had lifted no finger to help the progress of the war, and were indeed anti-war men This thrust was greeted with loud cheers and counter-cheers. With vehemence and power Mr. Henderson urged the necessity for more men. He revealed the private demands of Lord Kitchener 30,000 men a week were needed to the spring of this year to complete the ranks, and 30,000 a week were needed from that time onward to the end of this year to bring the total up to one and a half millions, which would enable us to meet the enemy man for man. With fierce concentration Mr. Henderson declared that if Lord Kitchener said that we needed these divisions to be victorious in the war he intended to accept Lord Kitchener's decision.

He defended his retention of Cabinet position to the present by saying that he was not there to represent himself, but to represent Labour, and Labour's voice had to be heard before any action could be taken by him. If the decision of the Congress were hostile to the Bill he and his two colleagues in the Government, Mr. Brace and Mr. Roberts, would submit themselves to the decision of the executive committee of the National Labour Party and the Parliamentary Labour Party.

A DRAMATIC MOMENT.

[illegible] that if he resigned from the Cabinet on this question he might resign his seat in the House of Commons and go down to his constituency, Barnard Castle. There was a great outburst at this, cheering predominating over cries of dissent. "I invite others who have taken part in this debate to go down to their constituencies——"

Mr. Henderson got no further, for Mr. Philip Snowden sprang to his feet in the hall and, in an accompanying uproar, signified his willingness to go to Blackburn and face his constituents. Angry words were coming now from all over the hall, and it was impossible to hear clearly what passed between Mr. Henderson and Mr. Snowden, but it was apparent that Mr. Snowden intended to convey an acceptance of Mr. Henderson's challenge.

When Mr. Henderson sat down Mr. Ramsay MacDonald got up on the other side of the platform and proceeded to rub in points made by previous speakers. "You cannot find any final resting place [illegible]

MR. HENDERSON'S POSITION.

The Men Necessary & Must Be Obtained.

MR. ANDERSON ATTACKS MR. LLOYD GEORGE.

In view of the personal issues involved the chief interest of the meeting centred round Mr. Henderson's speech. Having disclosed the fact that Lord Kitchener's demand was for 30,000 men a week, he said he might differ from Lord Kitchener as to the method of obtaining the men, but he was not going to challenge Lord Kitchener's figures. He was going to accept the decision of Lord Kitchener and do what he could to assist Lord Kitchener in his demands.

Believing that the men were necessary, he thought that the men must be obtained, and if the pledge had not been given he was fully of opinion that to-day they would have been in the position of having a measure of Conscription fuller, wider, and more permanent, submitted to the country and to the House of Commons. The men were not there, and he believed that the position, as far as the country was concerned, would have been easier, because there would have been the thought that we were not having this measure of Conscription for the sake of meeting military needs but to placate those who had been Conscriptionists from the beginning. If he thought that that was the position he would do everything in his power to defeat the object. He would be unfaithful to himself and disloyal to his association with the movement if he took up any other attitude.

The Only Alternative.

The men they were asking for now were needed to satisfy the demands of the military authorities. Believing that they were essential to the winning of the war, we had either got to have a measure of compulsion or to call upon at least 500,000 married men. Was there a man present who would demonstrate the desire to call on those men, or who was prepared to go to his constituency and say he was in favour of releasing those 500,000 men from their attestation? There was no man he knew of who would dare to put forward such a proposition.

Dealing with his own position in the Cabinet, Mr. Henderson said that he did not go there of his own accord, but was sent there. Sir John Simon could leave the Government without breaking the Coalition, but if he (Mr. Henderson) and his two colleagues, Mr. Brace and Mr. Roberts, were to leave the Government, they stood a greater risk of breaking it because it would mean the withdrawal of one of the units of the Coalition.

"If," declared Mr. Henderson, emphatically, "the conference decides that the Coalition must be broken I shall refuse to accept their decision. If they say I must oppose this Bill, I shall refuse to accept their decision—(cheers)—and immediately I refuse to accept your decision, I shall apply for the Chiltern Hundreds, and I shall go to Barnard Castle and ask them if they endorse my attitude or not." (Cheers.)

He did not ask them to support the Bill, but he did say that they had no right, in a great crisis like this, to apply such pressure, such force, such compulsion, as to make him sacrifice his conscience, which was as dear to him as theirs, and go contrary to those he represented in the Barnard Castle Division He hoped that the conference would give them a little title to fair play and consideration, and if they did that he believed that in the end the [illegible]

"Khakifying" the Workers.

Another speech which made a great impression was that delivered by Mr. Anderson. Did they not think, he asked, that industrial compulsion was not in the air? Why were the munition workers attested and given their 2s. 9d.? Lord Derby knew. He had tried it at the Liverpool Docks. It was the khakifying of the workers that they had in mind. Mr. Lloyd George would like to have military control over the men on the Clyde. He would not get it. (Loud cheers.)

"The man who is behind this campaign, linked up with Lord Northcliffe is Mr. Lloyd George—(Hear, hear)—and far more than any question of military necessity there is the question of personal and political ambition mixed up with this thing. There is no doubt about it; it is well known inside the House of Commons and by those who take any interest in political matters. Conscription of wealth

DE
S.

ATTA
TO

ENE

COND

From O

The prev
the attack
since the B with the equal num
German t
the Austro have been sons have and rushe
the condi
garians fo impossible, troops was an offensi
a closer co

THE "Viola

Accord of the "
is in a the Ger Greek G
of the docum energy
It count testi
ploy say a v
Gree
volv
H agge port of C beer pa ag
ov

Se

Th denia journ
Velo
War o coast,

The A proceed commu
Ministe
immedi
It is War w had bee
Peter,
tion.—I

RELA

Sir E

ness about ...
seated to the left were Mr. Brace and Mr. Roberts. A few yards from them was Mr. Sidney Webb, in the neighbourhood of Mr. Will Thorne.

A printed agenda, circulated among delegates as they came in, outlined the course of procedure. On it was set out a resolution formulated on the previous evening by the leaders of the three National Labour Committees. It was a resolution which bore evidences of compromise. It reaffirmed the decision of the Bristol Trades Congress against compulsory military service, but it went on to express regret at having to recognise that the net results of Lord Derby's scheme, magnificent as they were had to be governed by the Prime Minister's pledge to married recruits.

The point of the resolution was in its concluding phrase, for, coupled with a protest against the Bill, was the condition that the Labour members of Parliament should vote upon it as they individually thought fit. This, of course, meant a shelving of responsibility of the whole question on to the shoulders of the Labour members in the Commons. The Congress soon showed that it was in no mood for such a course.

Business began by a speech from Mr. John Hodge, whose patriotic views are well known, and who stated the position with judicial care in accordance with the resolution. "We leave freedom of opinion to Labour members in the House of Commons." "No, no," cried some delegates. "We say 'yes,'" exclaimed Mr. Will Thorne from the platform. "No, no," shouted back delegates from various parts of the hall. "Then you will treat Labour members to-day differently from the way you have treated them in the past," said Mr. Hodge, and he was answered by cheers touched with defiance. Mr. Hodge pointed out the danger of forcing a General Election. "If the General Election comes you will be confronted with Conscription full and complete. This resolution is to save the Labour movement from calamity."

MR. SEXTON'S WARNING.

An even more downright speech came from Mr. Sexton, who seconded the resolution. He leaned over the rail of the gallery and shook his finger warningly at the gathering. "The figures show that there is more than a negligible number of single men left." He explained that if a General Election came they might find the House of Commons committed to Conscription of a drastic character with nobody left in the Chamber to protest against it.

Mr. Havelock Wilson also supported the official view, and during his speech feeling, which had been gradually rising, became very warm. He was subjected to comments during some of his strong passages, and on one occasion he swung round fiercely on his interrupters. On the whole, however, the meeting, though in a tense state, was orderly.

Mr. Ben Turner, a textile leader from Yorkshire, was the first to speak out strongly against the official proposal. When he uttered the cry: "No Conscription!" he was drowned for many seconds by an outburst of fierce cheering. "Is the Prime Minister's pledge binding on the unions?" he asked. "No!" roared the delegates. Dealing with the suggestion that a General Election would be disastrous to Labour members, Mr. Turner said: "Don't let us lose our souls, even if we lose our seats." Again there was loud and continued cheering.

Mr. J. H. Thomas, standing by the side of the chairman's table, appealed to the Congress to have no touch with the suggestion of Conscription. "They don't want Conscription for winning the war," he exclaimed, "but they want it for ulterior purposes." (Loud cheers.) "When they get this Bill the next cry will be 'Married men.'" (Tremendous cheering.) He pointed out that no one in the House of Commons had defended the Bill on military grounds. "It is a huge conspiracy," he cried.

By now it was apparent that Mr. Thomas had the meeting well with him. A flaming figure of a man, he leaned forward with fists upraised above his head, declared the figures had been manipulated, and argued that the Bill introduced compulsion merely for compulsion's sake. Excitement now ranged over all the build-his seat in the ...

down to his constituency, Barnard Castle. There was a great outburst at this, cheering predominating over cries of dissent. "I invite others who have taken part in this debate to go down to their constituencies——"

Mr. Henderson got no further, for Mr. Philip Snowden sprang to his feet in the hall and, in an accompanying uproar, signified his willingness to go to Blackburn and face his constituents. Angry words were coming now from all over the hall, and it was impossible to hear clearly what passed between Mr. Henderson and Mr. Snowden, but it was apparent that Mr. Snowden intended to convey an acceptance of Mr. Henderson's challenge.

When Mr. Henderson sat down Mr. Ramsay MacDonald got up on the other side of the platform and proceeded to rub in points made by previous speakers. "You cannot find any final resting place between single men and married men," he said. What the Congress had to do was to find out whether it was in favour of Conscription—whether it was in favour of the present Bill being proceeded with. He was strongly against both.

It was at this stage that an amendment in favour of the Bill, provided there was adequate representation of Labour on the tribunal, was defeated by 2,121,000 votes to 541,000 votes. A little later we had the direct and comprehensive challenge to the official resolution. It took the form of an amendment welded from proposals put forward by various trade unions and other bodies.

The amendment, while rejoicing in the magnificent response to the appeal for voluntary recruits, emphatically condemned the Compulsion Bill, declaring that all the men necessary for either military or industrial purposes could be obtained by voluntary methods, and recommending the Labour Party in Parliament to oppose the present Bill in all its stages.

"WAIT AND SEE."

It was the level-headed, slow-speaking Mr. Bellamy, President of the National Union of Railwaymen, who moved this amendment. There was a very important note of warning in his speech. No matter what the figures were, he said, they would lend their voice or vote towards compulsory military service. He paused at this to give emphasis to his next words. "We may be asked what we can do."

"Call a strike," shouted someone among the delegates.

"My answer is——"

"Wait and see," prompted another delegate.

"Exactly," said Mr. Bellamy. "My answer is Mr Asquith's."

He finished his speech by declaring, "Conscription is being introduced to put round the necks of the working classes a chain so strong that it will effectually hold them at any time." At this there was furious cheering from all parts of the hall.

Mr. Egerton Wake seconded, and pointed the moral of the facts. "This Bill means that the legions of Russia, the millions of France, the millions of Italy, the grip of our Navy, our own four or five million men, are useless unless we have this extra paltry 300,000." The vote on the amendment was as follows:

For	1,715,000
Against	934,000

Mr. Sexton apparently was not satisfied with these figures, but Mr. Gosling promptly met the situation.

"The suggestion has been made to me that some of the cards have not been properly counted. I propose that we should have a card count on the question of the amendment as a substantive motion." Another vote was therefore taken. It resulted as follows:

For the new resolution ...	1,998,000
Against	783,000

A scene of great enthusiasm ensued. Cheering and singing the Socialist song, members began to leave the hall.

In the midst of the clamour Mr. Henderson, dour and purposeful, rose to his feet. "All delegates who are members of the National Executive of the Parliamentary Party are asked to meet at the House of Commons at 5.30. It will be a very important meeting."

Here was indicated the coming sequel to a dramatic day. Mr. Henderson's words ended a sitting which cannot fail to leave its mark on the fate of the country.

Another speech which made ... pression was that delivered by Mr. Anderson. Did they not think, he asked, that industrial compulsion was not in the air? Why were the munition workers attested and given their 2s. 9d.? Lord Derby knew. He had tried it at the Liverpool Docks. It was the khakifying of the workers that they had in mind. Mr. Lloyd George would like to have military control over the men on the Clyde. He would not get it. (Loud cheers.)

"The man who is behind this campaign, linked up with Lord Northcliffe is Mr. Lloyd George—(Hear, hear)—and far more than any question of military necessity there is the question of personal and political ambition mixed up with this thing. There is no doubt about it; it is well known inside the House of Commons and by those who take any interest in political matters. Conscription of wealth must go with the Conscription of life. (Loud cheers.) If the people are going to fight," declared Mr. Anderson, amidst a storm of cheering, "let them have a country to fight for."

THE GROUP SYSTEM REOPENED.

Attestation to Begin Again Next Monday.

The Press Bureau yesterday afternoon issued the following notice:

With reference to the announcement by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on Jan. 5 that the group system for attestation was to be reopened, it is notified that military recruiting offices will be available for this purpose on and after Monday, the 10th instant.

The poster calling up the second batch of groups will be sent, together with leaflets dealing with the scheme, to any person in the London area post free or carriage paid.

AMERICAN VISITORS.

President Wilson's Envoy in London.

Colonel E. M. House, President Wilson's Envoy to Europe, was granted special facilities to go ashore at Falmouth on Wednesday evening from the liner Rotterdam, and left by the night train for London.

Mr. Brand Whitlock, United States Minister to Belgium, who is returning to his post at Brussels, and Captain Boy-Ed, the late German Military Attaché at Washington, remain on board the liner, and will proceed in her to Rotterdam. No one is allowed to board the vessel.

BANQUET TO SIR H. LE BAS.

To celebrate the honour conferred upon Sir Hedley F. Le Bas the Aldwych Club of London, of which Sir Hedley is a past president, is organising a complimentary dinner, to be held at the Savoy Hotel on Wednesday, Feb. 2. Lord Northcliffe has consented to take the chair. All those interested in advertising are cordially invited to co-operate. Full particulars of time, etc., can be obained from the Secretary, The Aldwych Club, 18, Exeter-street, Strand, W.C.

CHAPLAINS' DEPARTMENT.

It was officially announced by the Press Bureau last night that the Rev. Canon E. H. Pearce, of Westminster Abbey, has been appointed Assistant Chaplain-General (temporary and honorary) for duty at the War Office.

679/20

Zeppelin Bombs
£10,000
Free Compensation Fund.
SEE PAGE EIGHT.

The Daily & Leader

No. 21787. LONDON AND MANCHESTER.

COMPULSION BILL CARRIED

RESIGNATION OF THREE LABOUR MINISTERS.

Compulsion Bill Carried in the Commons.

MAJORITY: 298.

Organised Labour Declares Against Forced Service.

VOTE OF NATIONAL CONGRESS.

Three members of the Coalition Ministry resigned last night—Mr. Arthur Henderson (President of the Board of Education) and his two Labour colleagues, Mr. Brace and Mr. George Roberts. Their decision was reached at the close of the great Labour Congress in London, at which a resolution rejecting the Compulsion Bill was carried by an overwhelming majority. Following the decision of Sir John Simon, there are now four vacancies in the Coalition Ministry. Our Lobby Correspondent says there is ground for the belief that a strong effort will be made to avert the danger of a General Election.

COMMONS' VOTE.

The House of Commons divided at 11 o'clock last night on the Conscription Bill with the following result:

For the Bill - - -	403
Against - - - - -	105
Majority for - -	298

Mr. Balfour stated in the House last night that, by the voluntary system, we had raised over 6,000,000 men. The announcement created a great sensation.

The National Labour Conference which resulted in the above verdict against Compulsion is fully reported on Page Seven. The first resolution proposed to allow Labour M.P.s to vote on the new measure as they thought fit. After a heated debate the first vote was taken on an amendment supporting a measure of compulsion for the purpose of forcing single men of military age to attest. The card vote resulted: For the amendment, 541,000; against, 2,121,000. A second amendment recommended the Labour Party in Parliament to oppose the measure in all its stages, as it would be "economically disastrous to the life of the nation." The voting was: For the amendment, 1,715,000; against, 934,000.

OVERWHELMING MAJORITY.

The third and last vote was decisive. The second amendment was put to the Congress as a substantive motion, with the following result:

For the Motion	1,998,000
Against	783,000

The result is thus a majority of about a million and a quarter against the Compulsion Bill.

The decision of the Labour Party to leave the Coalition Government was reached last night at a joint meeting of the National Executive of the Labour Party and the Parliamentary Labour Party. Following this decision, the three Labour Ministers at once decided to resign. The possible effects of the resignations on the political situation are dealt with in another column by our Lobby Correspondent.

and told members below the gangway the news of the Congress. And in the Lords a quieter but not less important step was taking place. The Parliament Act Amendment Bill received a second reading. Not that this implies the passage of the measure. There are other stages still to be arranged.

With Labour overwhelmingly against the Conscription Bill and with Labour Ministers resigning from the Government, a great sensation was created by Colonel John Ward's speech. A splendid figure he looked in his uniform, and every word was utterly honest. He is aflame with righteous anger against the crimes of Prussia. He denies utterly that the Trade Union Congress—with trade unionists away in the trenches—represents Labour. He aroused thunders of applause by his paraphrase of Mr. Asquith's famous declaration about every penny of money, every ounce of effort, and every drop of blood. But the applause came this time, not as in 1914, from the Liberal benches chiefly. The Conservatives did their share, their full share.

As the evening proceeded one was chiefly impressed by the astounding strength of Great Britain's voluntary army. Six millions ready for enlistment—that was Mr. Samuel's figure. Mr. Hemmerde, a Compulsionist for single men, claimed that under the Derby scheme we should reach 4½ millions actually enlisted, this apart from the Dominions, or 10 per cent. of the population, including Ireland, which is the standard for Conscriptionist countries. With the Dominions we shall put quite five million men into the field—and, besides, there is the Navy. Mr. Samuel gave the reasons—Belgium, Poland, Northern France, and Serbia. They are moving reasons, doubtless, but a miraculous response, nevertheless, by a free people!

AN IRISHMAN'S SLIP.

Deeply regretful was Mr. Campbell's tone when, in conciliatory accents, he referred to the Nationalist opposition to the Bill.

"No man could have done more to show his loyalty than the member for Waterford," said Mr. Campbell, "at personal and political risk." A remarkable tribute from an Orangeman—memorable and generous.

"Recruiting meetings are broken up," he continued, "and even Sergeant O'Leary has been jeered at and hooted." Then he added: "All this we are concealing."

It was a slip, that last sentence, and Mr. Balfour and Mr. Asquith joined in the prolonged laughter.

Then—Mr. Barnes—now a Privy Councillor. Weeks ago he stated that he would not object to pressure on young unmarried men.

"I am going to redeem my pledge to-night by voting for the Bill," he said, amid loud cheers. Resistance to the Bill he described as "a travesty of the position."

Mr. Barnes told of a month in France, whence he returned to-day. He mentioned a unit—1,250 strong—who on every spell of four days and four nights, lose 50 casualties.

"Mr. Speaker," he said quietly, "they shouldn't be four days and four nights in the trenches. And they wouldn't have to be there if the single men at home did their duty."

A GEOGRAPHICAL QUESTION.

Mr. Balfour rose to the height of a great occasion. With splendid and daring insight he dwelt on the notable and fundamental unity of purpose which [illegible]

THE RESIGNATIONS

DECISION OF LABOUR EXECUTIVE.

VOTING 13 TO 10.

EFFORTS TO PREVENT A GENERAL ELECTION.

(By Our Lobby Correspondent.)

The immediate sequel to the National Labour Congress yesterday was that at the House of Commons a joint meeting was held of the National Executive of the Labour Party and the Parliamentary Labour Party. At this it was decided that the Labour Party should leave the Coalition Government. As a result of this decision, which, it is said, was carried by 13 votes to 10, the three Labour Ministers in the Government—

Mr. Arthur Henderson,
Mr. Brace, and
Mr. G. H. Roberts—

at once decided to resign their offices in the Government. They will, it is understood, meet this morning, to draft their letters of resignation.

The rumour went round the Lobby in the course of the evening that Mr. Henderson would apply for the Chiltern Hundreds and fight a by-election at Barnard Castle in favour of the Government's Military Service Bill. For this there is apparently no foundation. The rumour arose from a challenge thrown out by Mr. Henderson to Mr. Snowden at the National Congress. It is their offices in the Government that the Labour Ministers are resigning.

The reason is this. The Labour Ministers joined the Coalition on an invitation from the Government, and after consultation with their party, and a majority vote in favour of such a course. The National Congress have now deprived these Ministers of their right to represent Labour in the Cabinet, and it would be contrary to the constitution of the Labour Party if they were to retain office, for as long as they were members of the Government they would be bound to support the Compulsion Bill.

A GENERAL ELECTION.

A prominent Conservative member of the Cabinet stated yesterday that the adverse vote by Labour at the Congress had brought a General Election nearer, and that in his view the Government ought to appeal on the issue of the Compulsory Bill to the rank and file of Labour in the country. I was able to anticipate the decision of the Labour Congress, and this was one of the factors on which was founded the anticipation of a General Election in "The Daily News" yesterday. But there are many members of all parties, Liberal, Labour, and Conservative, who consider that a General Election now would be a grave disadvantage from the national point of view, and that it ought to be stopped. The attempt to stop it is going to be made.

As to the Parliament Act Amendment Bill, the House of Lords expect to take the Committee stage next Wednesday.

A. P. N.

OVERWHELMING MAJORITY.

The third and last vote was decisive. The second amendment was put to the Congress as a substantive motion, with the following result:

For the Motion	1,998,000
Against	783,000

The result is thus a majority of about a million and a quarter against the Compulsion Bill.

The decision of the Labour Party to leave the Coalition Government was reached last night at a joint meeting of the National Executive of the Labour Party and the Parliamentary Labour Party. Following this decision, the three Labour Ministers at once decided to resign. The possible effects of the resignations on the political situation are dealt with in another column by our Lobby Correspondent.

LAST NIGHT'S VOTE IN THE COMMONS.

Members who Opposed the Bill.

(By Our Lobby Correspondent.)

In the division on the Compulsion Bill, which was carried by 403 to 105, the minority was made up, as far as could be ascertained last night, in this way:

Liberals	36
Labour	9
Irish Nationalists	58
Independent Nationalists	2

Among the Liberals voting against the Bill were two Privy Councillors, Mr. John Burns and Mr. Thomas Lough, two Liberals in khaki, Mr. Denman and Mr. Lees Smith, the others including Sir W. Runciman, Sir J. Barlow, Sir W. Gelder, Mr. Leif Jones, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Ponsonby, Mr. Molteno, Mr. T. Jones, Mr. Llewelyn Williams, and the following Welsh members, who put down a motion to explain their vote: Mr. Ellis Davies, Mr. Raffan, Mr. Haydn Jones, and Mr. Hines. Their motion was:

> That the House declines to discuss the Bill until it is shown that the recruiting appeal under the Derby scheme has left unattested at least 33 per cent. of the unmarried men.

The Labour members voting against the Government were: Mr. Goldstone, Mr. Snowden, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, Mr. J. H. Thomas, Mr. Richardson, Mr. W. Thorne, Mr. Clynes, and Mr. Jowett.

Among the Labour members supporting the Government were: Mr. Hodge, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Bowerman, Mr. O'Grady, Mr. Wilkie, and Mr. Duncan.

The three Labour Ministers who are resigning their offices in the Government abstained from voting, and Mr. Henderson did not attend the House during the evening. Some Liberals also abstained from voting, as well as some of the miners' members.

The Nationalist Party, although they have cast their vote against the initial stage of the Bill, have no intention, it is understood, of obstructing its progress. The division on the second reading will probably be taken on Tuesday night.

NEW UNIONIST COMMITTEE.

A committee of the Unionist Party in the House of Commons has been formed for the purpose of supporting a vigorous prosecution of the war. Sir E. Carson has been elected chairman and Sir F. Banbury vice-chairman.

THE PARLIAMENT ACT.

Bill for Prolongation Sanctioned.

By our Parliamentary Correspondent

WESTMINSTER, Thursday Night.

All day the great struggle has raged. As speech followed speech it became clear that the big battalions were rallying for the Bill. We have heard of a khaki election; this was a khaki debate, and at the outset the fierce note of war was sounded by Mr. Duke.

"You are helping the enemy," he cried. "You are wrecking the Empire."

"Old Bailey," retorted Mr. Pringle. "We are honest men."

Mr. William O'Brien's effort was an interlude, yet it told for the Bill. Since Mr. Redmond was against, Mr. O'Brien must needs be for the measure—so glad that Ireland was left out, so glad that Great Britain was brought in; after Mr. Carodoc Rees, in a maiden speech, excellently delivered, and Socratic in its interrogations, repeated Sir John Simon's plea—that the actual number of shirkers should have been ascertained before legislation be applied.

He had an anecdote. Travelling with a peer, who had advocated compulsion, he heard an old workman in the corner retort:

"I go further with Conscription than the lot of you. If you take the children from their parents, we'll have Conscription for your land and your bank books."

"Got it already," murmured a Tory ruefully.

A MASTERFUL SPEECH.

Then it was Mr. Samuel's turn—Mr. Asquith, Mr. Bonar Law, and Mr. Balfour behind him. A most masterful speech it was.

Mr. Samuel began by attacking National Service. He admitted that, taken in all, 6,000,000 men have volunteered for the war, on land and sea, though not all have been taken. He foreshadowed "hard fighting—blow on blow." He stated that Mr. Runciman agreed to another million being added to the colours. The Labour Committee, in their manifesto, announced that in their view 30,000 men are wanted every week. Direct enlistments in 12 weeks have been 275,000, which is 85,000 behind the average, and to this must be added previous arrears. Single attested men number 340,000, which is a supply for eleven weeks. Unless the 400,000 married men be called upon the million will not be obtained.

Echoes of other debates were reaching the House. Mr. Anderson entered night by voting for the Bill," he said, amid loud cheers. Resistance to the Bill he described as "a travesty of the position."

Mr. Barnes told of a month in France, whence he returned to-day. He mentioned a unit—1,250 strong—who on every spell of four days and four nights, lose 50 casualties.

"Mr. Speaker," he said quietly, "they shouldn't be four days and four nights in the trenches. And they wouldn't have to be there if the single men at home did their duty."

A GEOGRAPHICAL QUESTION.

Mr. Balfour rose to the height of a great occasion. With splendid and daring insight he dwelt on the notable and fundamental unity of purpose which underlies the differences over the Bill. He regretted the division. He insisted with the more emphasis on the equal patriotism of all concerned. Let Allies and enemies note.

By a delightful slip he referred to "loyalists" in Ireland. The House laughed heartily. Mr. Balfour was equal to the emergency.

"I regard it as no insult to call anyone in Ireland a loyalist," said he, amid loud cheers.

"I am against universal service," he continued, "not on grounds of principle, but because I live on an island. If by a geological upheaval we became part of the Continent, where would Sir John Simon's principles be?" (Laughter.) "I know of people who make it a matter of principle to take vinegar with their oysters." (Great laughter.)

As to divisions in the Cabinet, Mr. Balfour stated, with great vehemence:

"There is not one Minister on this bench who is not convinced that this Bill is necessary to the proper conduct of the war." (Cheers.) "Every man with an excuse will be excused. Why should we take care of the man who has no excuse? Think of the men, with wives and families, who have gone, knowing that their places will be taken by shirkers."

6,000,000 MEN RAISED.

"By the voluntary system we have raised over 6,000,000 men," he declared—amid great sensation. "This Bill, dealing only with a residue, is thus the strongest argument for the voluntary principle."

Six millions "raised"—it was a stronger version of Mr. Samuel's disclosure.

"Nothing will ever convince me that we shall be turned into a militarist nation," he said. "It is contrary to our traditions. You talk of a glorious revolution. You talk of a Reform Bill. Mr. Speaker—the truth is—we never change." The House cheered to the echo.

"This is," he said, in conclusion, "not a debating society. Let us face fact and reality." He talked with passionate earnestness of neutral opinion, of the sentiments of Allies, and urged that the war was "only a matter of a few months—certainly a brief period compared with the life of a nation—nay, of a Parliament." Hence—let there be no division.

The appeal did not succeed. A division was challenged. The figures were:

FOR THE BILL	403
AGAINST	105
MAJORITY FOR	298

The tellers for the Noes were Mr. Whitehouse and Mr. Holt.

Mr. Asquith was loudly cheered as he walked up the House with the Bill.

P. W. W.

and that in his view the Government ought to appeal on the issue of the Compulsory Bill to the rank and file of Labour in the country. I was able to anticipate the decision of the Labour Congress, and this was one of the factors on which was founded the anticipation of a General Election in "The Daily News" yesterday. But there are many members of all parties, Liberal, Labour, and Conservative, who consider that a General Election now would be a grave disadvantage from the national point of view, and that it ought to be stopped. The attempt to stop it is going to be made.

As to the Parliament Act Amendment Bill, the House of Lords expect to take the Committee stage next Wednesday.

A. P. N.

MR. A. HENDERSON.

"There is No Reason to Seek Re-election."

Mr. Henderson informed a Press representative last night, with reference to an incident at the Labour Conference, that he stated there he would resign his seat if he were bound by the vote of the delegates to certain action in the House of Commons. He had not been bound by the vote of the conference, and there was no reason for him to resign and seek re-election. "I am," he continued, "a supporter of the Bill, and though I shall not be able to remain to-night for the first reading, I shall vote for it on every possible occasion."

It is understood that the meeting discussed the action to be taken by the party on the first reading of the Bill. It was suggested by some members that the course might be adopted of voting for the first reading as a matter of form, in order that the Bill might be printed and circulated and its provisions thoroughly examined. Eventually it was decided to leave the matter open.

Late last evening the following statement was made on behalf of the Labour Party:

"A joint meeting of the National Executive of the Labour Party and the Parliamentary Labour Party took place in the House of Commons this evening. It was decided, in view of the decision of the special Trades Congress, to oppose the Military Service Bill, and that the party cease connection with the Coalition Government."

THE LABOUR MINISTERS.

The Right Hon. Arthur Henderson has been, since the formation of the Coalition Government, President of the Board of Education and a member of the Cabinet. He has been Chairman of the Labour Party since the resignation of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald at the beginning of the war, and has taken a prominent part in the recruiting campaign.

Mr. William Brace, M.P. for Glamorgan and Under-Secretary for Home Affairs, as a past President of the South Wales Miners' Federation, represents the mining interest.

Mr. G. H. Roberts, who has been a Junior Lord of the Treasury and has acted as one of the Coalition Whips, belongs to the Independent Labour Party. He sits for Norwich, and is a past President of the Trades Council of that city.

At the present moment, owing to the resignations of Sir John Simon and of Mr. Brace, there is no one to represent the Home Office in the House of Commons.

679/21

be his duty to vote against the Bill, and o oppose it to the bitter end.

Mr. J. H. CAMPBELL (U., Dublin University), speaking on behalf of Sir E. Carson, who was prevented from attending by indisposition, said Irish Unionists would give whole-hearted support to the Bill in the division lobby. At the same time he protested against the unexplained and unaccountable exclusion of Ireland from the Bill. (Cheers.) It was understood that the measure when first drafted included Ireland, and he wanted to know at whose instance it was altered. Why did not the Government throw upon the Nationalists the responsibility of moving to exclude Ireland? They might in the alternative have left it to counties or groups of counties in Ireland to vote themselves out of the Bill. That would have enabled the Ulster people to come under the Bill, as they desired.

LABOUR MEMBER'S SUPPORT.

Mr. BARNES (Lab., Blackfriars, Glasgow) said he was going to redeem a pledge he had already made, and was going to vote for the introduction of the Bill. (Loud cheers.) He spoke for himself and not for the majority of his party, and he spoke under the shadow of the vote of the Trade Union Congress. He knew that there was a strong feeling in his constituency against the Bill and against anything in the nature of compulsion, but men in public life had to take risks, and he was going to take the risk of voting for the Bill. (Cheers.) The men that would be secured by it were wanted. (Cheers.) He had come back from France that day. He had been nearly a month travelling from one end of the line to the other. One unit that he visited had spent four days and nights in the trenches, and had had 53 casualties. They should not have been four days and nights in the trenches—(cheers)—and they would not have been if all the young men of the country had done their duty as these men he saw were doing it. (Loud cheers.) He hoped the Bill would go through, though he hoped that the predictions as to the thin edge of the wedge w[illegible] fulfilled. He supported the Bill because we had got to win the war. (Cheers.)

MR. BALFOUR

PAYS A FINE TRIBUTE TO THE VOLUNTARY SYSTEM.

Mr. BALFOUR (First Lord of the Admiralty) said he did not believe that in all the history of the House a debate had ever shown such a fundamental unity of feeling as the one now ending. All the speeches breathed patriotism. The division might do harm both in and out of the country, but to those who had heard the debate it must be apparent that never before had a nation shown such a unity of front on the essential issue.

Regarding Ireland, he thought that was a point which should be reserved for the Committee stage. This Bill was not intended to place the military institutions of the country on a permanent basis. It was a Bill for an occasion. It was a Bill for this wa ronly. They should, therefore, be as careful as possible not to raise questions of internal controversy. It was impossible to regard Ireland as similar to England and Scotland in this matter. (Nationalist cheers.)

Regarding the general debate, he wished to sweep aside all discussion on what was called "principle." He found it difficult to believe that anything that might truly be called principle would be involved. If this country were in danger of invasion, would these people stick to "principle"? He had always been against compulsory service, not because he believed in the principle of voluntaryism, but because he happened to live on an island. (Laughter.)

The voluntary system, Mr. Balfour declared, had produced over 6,000,000 men during the present war.

Every member of the Cabinet, Mr. Balfour added, held the opinion that the Bill was absolutely essential for the successful carrying on of the war.

LORD MILNER.

Is He Still a German Citizen Under German Law?

In the House yesterday Mr. Lundon asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Lord Milner had ever complied with section 3 of the Act of 1773, under which he claimed to be a British citizen, although born in Germany and the son of a German subject.

Mr. Brace said the section was repealed in 1871.

Mr. Outhwaite: Is the hon. member aware that under German law Lord Milner is still a German citizen?

The Speaker: You cannot expect the hon. member to have a knowledge of German law.

WANTED, A CAR.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—The French Government has d[illegible]

PROLONGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Lords Consent to the Bill of the Commons.

GENERAL ELECTION NOT NECESSARY.

The House of Lords yesterday considered the Parliament and Registration Bill brought over from the House of Commons.

The MARQUIS OF CREWE (Leader of the House), in moving the second reading of the Bill, said the measure was founded on the fact that the Quinquennial Parliament which had existed from 1911 would automatically expire on Jan. 31, in which case a General Election would also automatically follow. The measure was founded on the conviction that the majority of the people of the country did not want a General Election at this time for obvious reasons. A vast number of voters were absent from the country, and even beyond that a great number of voters who had removed were untraced in the absence of the ordinary party machinery.

PRECEDENT OF 1716.

On the other hand, there were some Constitutional purists who complained of the fact that Parliament should by its own action be lengthening the term for which by law it was constituted. Their objection was not without substance, but there was a precedent for such action in 1716. During the war party discussion had been hushed, and the object of all parties was to keep it in suspense until after the war.

Some of them cherished sanguine hopes of a complete obliteration of party division and party feeling as a result of the war. He did not quite know about that, but he felt positive that when the conclusion of the war came he and his noble friends who had been previously separated by party division would not awaken like the people in the legend of the fairy princess and desire at once to fly at each other's throats. Of that he was entirely satisfied. They would not desire to plunge at once into the controversies which were active when war broke out. But it was difficult to believe that even a cataclysm of this kind could altogether sweep away the political customs of 300 years under which our party system had grown up, nor should he be prepared to say that if it were possible it would in itself be desirable. What was undoubtedly the desire of all people was that all these controversies should be suspended and the Bill framed so far as possible to secure that result.

TORY TAUNT.

Earl ST. ALDWYN (C.) observed that it was very remarkable that the representatives of the Government which passed the Parliament Act should be obliged to come in the position of humble suppliants to that House, whose powers they had curtailed, and ask them to alter an Act which they had passed deliberately and which if it were permitted to remain unaltered would place the country in an extremely unsatisfactory position.

It was very remarkable that it should rest with their lordships to decide whether or not the present House of Commons should come to an end at the end of this month. That was the reductio ad absurdum of the whole history of the Parliament Act. If it were only a question of whether the present House of Commons was worth preserving there could be only one opinion among their lordships, having regard to the mischief the House of Commons had done to the country during the first four years of its existence. But, of course, the matter could not be looked at solely from that point of view.

LORD LANSDOWNE

REGARDS A GENERAL ELECTION AS UNNECESSARY.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE (a member of the Cabinet) said he was not at all anxious to contend that the proposal of the Bill was not a somewhat strange and novel proceeding, but then the circumstances of the time in which we lived were also novel and strange. He could not conceive, so far as the main purpose of the Bill was concerned, that anyone could possibly desire that a General Election should be forced at the present time upon a reluctant country. He failed altogether to see what useful purpose an election could serve. It was utterly unnecessary in order to establish the fact that the country was of one mind in its desire to carry the war through to a successful and honourable conclusion.

Should the time come when they had reason to suppose that the people desired a different Government from that which now held the reins of office, it would not be for the present Ministry to stand in the [illegible]

Most Wonderful Cartoons of the War.

Will Dyson, the great war cartoonist, whose powerful drawings have a world-wide fame, will commence on Monday, January 10th, a series of daily cartoons in the DAILY SKETCH.

ANOTHER SCRAP OF PAPER. By Will Dyson.

Dyson's grim and expressive exposures of Hun brutality and greed have been among the most potent recruiting forces in the country. His forceful drawings will secure in the DAILY SKETCH a wider circulation than ever before. Each day Dyson's cartoons will perform a national service and help to strengthen the hands of the Government in the hour of crisis. No other artist has so vividly brought home to the nation the Kaiser's cynical disregard of honour and humanity.

Hundreds of letters have been received congratulating the DAILY SKETCH on its enterprise in securing exclusively the services of Dyson. Newsagents who have not already increased their orders should do so without delay. Readers who have not already done so must order their copies now from their local newsagents, as the demand will be enormous.

A new Serial Story commences TO-MORROW entitled "The Unexpected Wife," specially written by Madge Ambrose.

OFFICERS' OUTFITS at

Is He Still a German Citizen Under German Law?

In the House yesterday Mr. Lundon asked the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Lord Milner had ever complied with section 3 of the Act of 1773, under which he claimed to be a British citizen, although born in Germany and the son of a German subject.

Mr. Brace said the section was repealed in 1871.

Mr. Outhwaite: Is the hon. member aware that under German law Lord Milner is still a German citizen?

The Speaker: You cannot expect the hon. member to have a knowledge of German law.

WANTED, A CAR.

(To the Editor.)

Sir,—The French Government has decided to form temporary settlements of Serbian refugees in Corsica, and has asked the Serbian Relief Fund to undertake the administration of these settlements. The principal agent of the Fund, Mr. Bellows, has telegraphed from Ajaccio asking for a touring car to be sent out, as the settlements are at a considerable distance from each other, and means of communication are scanty.

Already the work is very heavy, and the numbers of the refugees, which now amount to several thousands, are likely to increase rapidly.

May I appeal through your columns for the gift of such a touring car suitable for rough and hard work?

LUCY MASTERMAN,
Chairman of the Appeal Committee.
5, Cromwell-road, London, S.W., Jan. 6.

STOLEN ON THE FIELD.

William Jones, a private in the South Wales Borderers, was, at Ebbw Vale yesterday, sent to prison for a month on a charge of having stolen a pair of binoculars and a compass, of the value of £10, belonging to the late Lieut. G. W. Field, of the Gloucesters. The glasses and compass were found on the battlefield at Hulluch, and retained by the prisoner, who endeavoured to pawn them.

BILLIARDS: CLOSE OF PLAY.

Last night's closing scores in the billiard match at Leicester-square were: Falkiner (rec. 2,000), 13,667; Newman, 13,158. Breaks: Falkiner, 362 (full), 94, and 134 (unfinished); Newman, 287.

LAST NIGHT'S BOXING.

At the West London Stadium, last night, Harry Pettifer (Wood Green), knocked out Jim Shires (Roughriders), in the sixth round of a 15-rounds contest.

VESSELS ENTERED INWARDS.

LONDON CUSTOM HOUSE, Jan. 6.—Britannia, Gibraltar, No. 11 Shadwell Basin, London Dock, J Hall, Jun. and Co; Carlton, New York, West India Dock, H Langridge and Co; Fryken, Norrkoping, Mill Hole Tier, C Gee and Co; Elswick, Rouen, Regent's Canal Dock, Fisher, Alimonda and Co; Arigorm, Baltimore, Royal Albert Dock, Atlantic Transport Co; Rose Castle, Portland (Me.), Gravesend, Brown, Jenkinson, and Co; Oranje Nassau, Flushing, Gravesend, A W Hall; Brussel, Christiania, Surrey Commercial Dock, F Dessen and Co; Bulgaric, Alexandria, Gravesend, C Gee and Co; Bedeburn, Buenos Ayres, Higham Bight, J W Dooley; Mesaba, New York, Royal Albert Dock, Atlantic Transport Co; Maria de Larrinaga, Alexandria, Greenwich Buoys and Millwall Dock, Glover Bros.; The Lady Belle, Dieppe, London Dock, London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway; Tinto, Christiania, Millwall Dock, United Shipping Co; Corinthian, St. John (N.B.), Surrey Commercial Dock, Allan Line.

Mr. Herbert N. Casson is speaking after luncheon on Sunday next in the restaurant at the Trocadero. Mr. Casson in May last addressed over 3,000 business men at the Queen's Hall. The Right Hon. Viscount Midleton, who presided, said of his address, "It was the most original and epigrammatic speech I have ever heard in my life."

REGARDS A GENERAL ELECTION AS UNNECESSARY.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE (a member of the Cabinet) said he was not at all anxious to contend that the proposal of the Bill was not a somewhat strange and novel proceeding, but then the circumstances of the time in which we lived were also novel and strange. He could not conceive, so far as the main purpose of the Bill was concerned, that anyone could possibly desire that a General Election should be forced at the present time upon a reluctant country. He failed altogether to see what useful purpose an election could serve. It was utterly unnecessary in order to establish the fact that the country was of one mind in its desire to carry the war through to a successful and honourable conclusion.

Should the time come when they had reason to suppose that the people desired a different Government from that which now held the seals of office, it would not be for the present Ministry to stand in the way, but at present there was no evidence to show that a change of this kind was desired, and the Ministry at any rate did not feel called upon to go out of their way in order to afford opportunities of bringing about such a change.

PLURAL VOTING BILL.

The suspicion with which this Bill was regarded in some quarters, Lord Lansdowne went on, was no doubt due to the fact that it gave a certain extension of life to the Plural Voting Bill. Some complaint had been made of the leaders of the Unionist Party for having, as it was alleged, lent themselves to an arrangement by which an extension of life had been given to that measure. He was certainly not one of those who believed that the existence of a Coalition Government carried with it the obliteration of party principles, though he anticipated that the members of the Coalition would regard one another somewhat differently from the fact that they had served side by side. But he had no doubt that although they might lay aside party for the time, they would come back to it eventually.

The arrangement which had been come to with regard to the Plural Voting Bill simply carried out in an honourable manner the compact that was made when the war commenced. He agreed with Lord Bryce that considering the difficulty experienced in arriving at an agreed Bill it would be most unwise to reopen the question. He did not value the chance of the Plural Voting Bill passing very highly. Whatever chance the Bill had he believed that the war and the foundation of a Coalition Government had effectually disposed of it. Even if the war ended in the summer it would be impossible for any Government to push the Bill through Parliament in the interval before the expiration of the eight months. He was glad to hear that although Lord St. Aldwyn was not entirely satisfied with the conduct of the war he did not desire a change of Government.

It must be remembered, Lord Lansdowne concluded, that we had to consult our Allies at every step. That explained the hesitation and vacillation with which the Government were sometimes charged. If we treated our Allies as Germany treated her allies our task would be a simpler one but, fortunately, those were not the kind of relations which prevailed between us and our Allies. The Government were not so fatuous as to suppose that during the last few months things might not have been done better, but they asked the House and the country to remember that they were conducting a great war on three Continents, and that the responsibility for the direction of these affairs was not an undivided responsibility, but was one which they must share with others.

The Bill was read a second time and the House adjourned at 6.30.

The sudden illness of Miss Hutin Britt has compelled her to relinquish all hope appearing at the Strand Theatre for t present. Mr. Matheson Lang has therefo been faced with the necessity of findi another leading lady for matinees of "T Merchant of Venice." The new Portia to be Miss Lilian Braithwaite, who w also be seen in her original part of "M Gregory" in "Mr. Wu," when that p goes into the evening bill at the Stra on Saturday.

who have not already ...
from their local newsagents, as the demand will be enormous.

A new Serial Story commences TO-MORROW entitled "The Unexpected Wife," specially written by Madge Ambrose.

OFFICERS' OUTFITS at GAMAGES

UNIFORMS & PROTECTIVE CLOTHING FOR WINTER CAMPAIGNING

Field Service Jackets,
Cashmere and Serges,
45/-, 50/-, 65/-
Slacks to match,
14/6, 16/6, 18/6

Field Service Jackets,
Whipcords and Barathcas,
63/-, 70/-, 84/-
Slacks to match,
21/-, 25/-, 30/-

Infantry Breeches,
Bedford Cords,
21/-, 25/, 30/-, 35/-

Cavalry Breeches,
Buckskin strapping, 7/6 extra.

British Warms,
Fleece lined,
50/-, 55/-, 63/-, 84/-
With detachable Fleece lining,
Special value, 65/-

Fur-lined British Warms
Lined Sheepskin £6/10/0
" Marmot ... £6/10/0
" Musquash £8/10/0

Infantry Great Coats,
55/-, 63/-, 70/-

Cavalry Great Coats,
60/-, 70/-, 84/-

Rainproof Carbicord Coats,
Infantry style,
42/-, 0/-
With detachable fleece lining, 83/-, 90/-
Also in Cavalry style, 97/6

THE "SERVICE" TRENCH COAT
This coat is made from a specially prepared Fabric, scientifically treated by an entirely new process. Rainproof to a degree hitherto unattainable, smartly cut and well tailored.
Light in weight, but warm and comfortable. Lined with a detachable Camel Fleece.
63/- and 4½gs

MILITARY UNDERCOAT
In Tan Leather. An ideal garment for Cold Weather. Can be worn under any great coat or waterproof.
45/- 50/- 60/-
Also made to be worn under British Warm.
35/- and 45/-
ALL ABOVE POST FREE

Every Officer should inspect our Military Showrooms before purchasing his kit

Send for Complete Military Equipment Catalogue Post Free

A. W. GAMAGE, LD., HOLBORN, LONDON, E.C.

649

Mrs Weaver
Fe
679
679/22

SPECIAL CONFERENCE EDITION.

LABOUR LEADER

A Weekly Journal of Socialism Trade Unionism & Politics.

SPECIAL EDITION. [Registered at the G.P.O. as a Newspaper.] SATURDAY, JANUARY 8, 1916. PRICE ONE HALF-PENNY.

LABOUR DEFIES THE BRITISH "PRUSSIANS."

OVERWHELMING MAJORITY AGAINST COMPULSION BILL.

"WE WON'T HAVE THIN END OF WEDGE OF MILITARY AND INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION."

The most momentous Conference in the history of the Labour movement was held in London on Thursday, and by an overwhelming vote it decided to oppose the proposals for Military Compulsion introduced by the Government. This decision carried with it the resignation of the three Labour Ministers in the Government and the withdrawal of the Labour Party from the Coalition. This, again, means that the party-truce is over so far as Labour is concerned, and the Parliamentary group was recommended to oppose the Government measure in all its stages. The significance of this event is already seen to be great; it may be much greater even than it seems.

A GENERAL ELECTION?

If the vote of the Labour Conference has not killed the Government's Bill, it has at least struck it a very serious blow. In the best-informed political circles of London it is held that one of two courses will be followed by the Ministry. First, the Government may hold up the Bill until such time as an investigation of the figures of the Derby scheme and the results of the continued recruiting enable it to say that the number of unmarried men who have not enlisted is "a negligible quantity"; second, it may appeal to the country almost immediately upon the Bill. The first course would probably be preferable to Mr. Asquith, but the Compulsionists in the Cabinet will stop at nothing to get their way, and it is believed that they will even use the House of Lords to force a General Election if necessary. In the event of the Bill remaining a dead letter, the Labour Conference will be able to claim that it has been the greatest force in killing it. Should an election come, Organised Labour may be expected after Thursday's [illegible] the country. Speaker after speaker declared that the ulterior motive of the Conscriptionists is to fasten chains around the neck of Labour, and every time this declaration was made the Conference endorsed it by passionate applause. Equally clearly the delegates realised that the Conscriptionists would not be satisfied with military Compulsion. They knew that Mr. Lloyd George and his associates want industrial Conscription, and they appreciated that it would be impossible for them to argue in favour of the one and against the other.

TREMENDOUS MAJORITY.

The opinion of the Conference was most clearly tested by an amendment to the indefinite official resolution which was put forward by the Brassworkers and the Boilermakers. On the subsequent resolutions the issue was somewhat confused, but in this case the Conference had before it a definite request to support the Government Bill, and it rejected it by 2,121,000 votes to 541,000. The significance of this tremendous majority is all the greater by reason of the fact that the Miners' Federation, which is known to be opposed to all forms of Compulsion, did not participate in the Conference. Had it done so, the majority against Conscription would have been increased to the extent of 600,000 votes.

Later in the proceedings a second amendment was moved to the official resolution, making it absolutely definite against the Bill and recommending the Parliamentary Party to oppose the measure resolutely. The voting on this amendment was 1,715,000 in favour and 931,000 against. Mr. James Sexton, one of our strongest opponents, did us the service of demanding a second card vote when the amendment was put as a substantive motion, with the result that the majority leaped up by another 784,000 votes. Our only regret was that it was impossible to challenge a third division!

the platform, and the most important utterances, delivered as they were by practised speakers, were well heard.

Even before the proceedings commenced there was an electricity in the atmosphere such as no Conference of recent years has known. Long before the time for opening, a very large body of delegates gathered outside the hall and discussed in eager groups the prospects of the debates. Within the hall there was an excited buzz of conversation, which was not interrupted by the appearance of the officials on the platform. Mr. H. Gosling, white of hair yet young and genial in spirit, presided in his capacity of chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress. To his left sat Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P., to his right Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P. Mr. Henderson looked burdened and overwrought; and as the discussion proceeded the weight upon his mind evidently became greater.

Mr. W. Brace, Mr. G. H. Roberts, Mr. Will Crooks, Mr. John Hodge, and a number of other Labour members, "honoured" and still to be "honoured," occupied seats on the platform, but the Conference ignored their appearance. It was not until Mr. Ramsay MacDonald entered that a cheer was raised. Then it was loud and long, mingled with cries of "Good old Mac!"

TEMPER OF CONFERENCE.

This was the first sign of the temper of the delegates.

The Conference was opened by Mr. Gosling reading from the chair a very colourless statement prepared by the three National Committees. Openly it was neither opposed to the Government's scheme of military compulsion nor in favour of it, but the implication of it was on the whole on the side of the scheme. It was soon evident that the Conference was impatient with its indefiniteness. "Organised Labour hates war and it hates Conscription" was one of the platitudes of the introduction, but the delegates by their cheer converted it into much more than a platitude. The first clear indication of the attitude of the Conference came when these sentences were read:

> Unfortunately, we cannot dispose of the grave problem created by claiming that [illegible] one could say, and Mr. Hodge's speech was as indefinite as the resolution. Neither the one nor the other meant anything.

THE RESOLUTION.

The resolution read:

> This Conference reaffirms the decision of the Bristol Trade Unions Congress when it unanimously protested, in the name of over 3,000,000 organised workers, against compulsory military service. It regrets that the unity and solidarity of the nation have been gravely imperilled and industrial and political liberty menaced by the action of the compulsionists, against which it makes a most emphatic protest. The Conference rejoices at the magnificent success of the voluntary principle, which in so short a period has supplied the country with an army of 4,000,000 free men, but it is compelled with regret to recognise that, in spite of Lord Derby's scheme having produced nearly 3,000,000 volunteers, the net results are governed by the Prime Minister's pledge to the married recruits, which, in the opinion of the Government, has rendered necessary the Military Service Bill. The Conference regards the result as not yet ascertained with sufficient accuracy and certainty to warrant so momentous a proposal being passed by Parliament, but wishes, nevertheless, to leave the Labour members to vote upon it as they individually think fit.

In his opening remarks Mr. Hodge emphasised the gravity of the crisis, and this the Conference clearly recognised. He explained that the Parliamentary Labour Party had refrained from committing itself before the Conference met, and drew attention to his speech in the House of Commons the previous evening in which he had declared the historical opposition of Labour to compulsory military service. He asserted that the world had never before seen such a magnificent voluntary army as Britain had raised, and urged that before the Premier had decided for compulsion he should have followed his own policy of "wait and see," so that the results of the Derby campaign might have been properly judged. The Derby scheme was said to have been a failure until the Premier's pledge was given, and he agreed that a large number of married men would not have enlisted had it not been given. Nevertheless, he believed it would have been better had the pledge not been made, although under such circumstances we should "have been up against" Conscription pure and simple. To which there was an [illegible]

LABOUR DEFIES THE BRITISH "PRUSSIANS."

OVERWHELMING MAJORITY AGAINST COMPULSION BILL.

"WE WON'T HAVE THIN END OF WEDGE OF MILITARY AND INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION."

The most momentous Conference in the history of the Labour movement was held in London on Thursday, and by an overwhelming vote it decided to oppose the proposals for Military Compulsion introduced by the Government. This decision carried with it the resignation of the three Labour Ministers in the Government and the withdrawal of the Labour Party from the Coalition. This, again, means that the party-truce is over so far as Labour is concerned, and the Parliamentary group was recommended to oppose the Government measure in all its stages. The significance of this event is already seen to be great; it may be much greater even than it seems.

A GENERAL ELECTION?

If the vote of the Labour Conference has not killed the Government's Bill, it has at least struck it a very serious blow. In the best-informed political circles of London it is held that one of two courses will be followed by the Ministry. First, the Government may hold up the Bill until such time as an investigation of the figures of the Derby scheme and the results of the continued recruiting enable it to say that the number of unmarried men who have not enlisted is "a negligible quantity"; second, it may appeal to the country almost immediately upon the Bill. The first course would probably be preferable to Mr. Asquith, but the Compulsionists in the Cabinet will stop at nothing to get their way, and it is believed that they will even use the House of Lords to force a General Election if necessary. In the event of the Bill remaining a dead letter, the Labour Conference will be able to claim that it has been the greatest force in killing it. Should an election come, Organised Labour may be expected after Thursday's decision to contest it vigorously, and we shall not be without allies from Radical quarters. The Conscriptionists imagine at the moment that they will carry everything before them, but we can promise them that we will raise issues which they will not like. In reply to their demand for the Conscription of life, we will demand as an alternative the Conscription of wealth, and the workers will not fail to respond to the claim that the great monopolies and the lavish incomes they provide should be commandeered by the State at this critical time. Do the Conscriptionists wish to face that issue?

The Conference clearly realised that the present measure is only the thin end of the wedge. Once adopt the principle of Compulsion and its operation cannot be limited. Already the Northcliffe Press, which has been the biggest factor in getting the Government to adopt Compulsion of married men, is asking for Compulsion of married men, and if the Government's proposal is enacted, not many months will pass before a complete system of Conscription, with all its dangers to Labour, will be imposed upon the country. Speaker after speaker declared that the ulterior motive of the Conscriptionists is to fasten chains around the neck of Labour, and every time this declaration was made the Conference endorsed it by passionate applause. Equally clearly the delegates realised that the Conscriptionists would not be satisfied with military Compulsion. They knew that Mr. Lloyd George and his associates want industrial Conscription, and they appreciated that it would be impossible for them to argue in favour of the one and against the other.

TREMENDOUS MAJORITY.

The opinion of the Conference was most clearly tested by an amendment to the indefinite official resolution which was put forward by the Brassworkers and the Boilermakers. On the subsequent resolutions the issue was somewhat confused, but in this case the Conference had before it a definite request to support the Government Bill, and it rejected it by 2,121,000 votes to 541,000. The significance of this tremendous majority is all the greater by reason of the fact that the Miners' Federation, which is known to be opposed to all forms of Compulsion, did not participate in the Conference. Had it done so, the majority against Conscription would have been increased to the extent of 600,000 votes.

Later in the proceedings a second amendment was moved to the official resolution, making it absolutely definite against the Bill and recommending the Parliamentary Party to oppose the measure resolutely. The voting on this amendment was 1,715,000 in favour and 934,000 against. Mr. James Sexton, one of our strongest opponents, did us the service of demanding a second card vote when the amendment was put as a substantive motion, with the result that the majority leaped up by another 434,000 votes. Our only regret was that it was impossible to challenge a third division!

By this decision Organised Labour has proved that despite the circumstances of the moment its soul is alive and its mind alert. The attitude of self-reliance which has been compromised since the beginning of the war has been regained, and it is evident that a new spirit animates its ranks. The Government will be well advised to accept the warning the Conference gave. Labour in this country is not prepared to surrender to our own "Prussians" under the cloak of a war the stated object of which is the crushing of Prussianism in Germany.

THE PROCEEDINGS.

The Central Hall, Westminster, in which the Conference met, is a spacious, high-domed building, with deep galleries and a large platform sloping up to an imposing organ. The delegates filled the body of the hall, but only the first row of the galleries was filled: it was not expected that the public would be admitted. The result was that unless a speaker were stationed in a favourable position, his voice was either lost in the vastness of the hall or it echoed and re-echoed disconcertingly. Fortunately the Conference insisted upon most of the delegates addressing it from the platform, and the most important utterances, delivered as they were by practised speakers, were well heard.

Even before the proceedings commenced there was an electricity in the atmosphere such as no Conference of recent years has known. Long before the time for opening, a very large body of delegates gathered outside the hall and discussed in eager groups the prospects of the debates. Within the hall there was an excited buzz of conversation, which was not interrupted by the appearance of the officials on the platform. Mr. H. Gosling, white of hair yet young and genial in spirit, presided in his capacity of chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trade Union Congress. To his left sat Mr. C. W. Bowerman, M.P., to his right Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P. Mr. Henderson looked burdened and overwrought, and as the discussion proceeded the weight upon his mind evidently became greater.

Mr. W. Brace, Mr. G. H. Roberts, Mr. Will Crooks, Mr. John Hodge, and a number of other Labour members, "honoured" and still to be "honoured," occupied seats on the platform, but the Conference ignored their appearance. It was not until Mr. Ramsay MacDonald entered that a cheer was raised. Then it was loud and long, mingled with cries of "Good old Mac!"

TEMPER OF CONFERENCE.

This was the first sign of the temper of the delegates.

The Conference was opened by Mr. Gosling reading from the chair a very colourless statement prepared by the three National Committees. Openly it was neither opposed to the Government's scheme of military compulsion nor in favour of it, but the implication of it was on the whole on the side of the scheme. It was soon evident that the Conference was impatient with its indefiniteness. "Organised Labour hates war and it hates Conscription" was one of the platitudes of the introduction, but the delegates by their cheer converted it into much more than a platitude. The first clear indication of the attitude of the Conference came when these sentences were read:

> Unfortunately, we cannot dispose of the grave problem created by claiming that organised Labour is in no way bound by the Prime Minister's pledge. The pledge has been given; it binds the Government, and under it the married men to certain assured rights.

Cries of "Why?" greeted the statement that the problem could not be disposed of by repudiating responsibility for the pledge so far as Labour is concerned, and when the emphasised sentence, "the pledge has been given," was read there was a storm of protest from all parts of the hall, "Not by Labour," which was renewed by shouts of "Not by us" when Mr. Gosling added, "it binds the Government." The suggestion that the Government measure was necessary on military grounds was greeted with loud cries of "Question," and when the assertion was made that the Bill "terminates with the restoration of peace there was derisive laughter and cries of "I don't think."

Already it was evident that a very strong body of opinion in the hall was uncompromisingly opposed to Compulsion.

When Mr. John Hodge rose to move the official resolution he received a cold welcome. Never has any chairman of the Parliamentary Labour Party been greeted with slighter applause by a Labour Conference. His speech was an admirable exposition of the resolution. What the resolution signified no one could say, and Mr. Hodge's speech was as indefinite as the resolution. Neither the one nor the other meant anything.

THE RESOLUTION.

The resolution read:

> This Conference reaffirms the decision of the Bristol Trade Unions Congress when it unanimously protested, in the name of over 3,000,000 organised workers, against compulsory military service. It regrets that the unity and solidarity of the nation have been gravely imperilled and industrial and political liberty menaced by the action of the compulsionists, against which it makes a most emphatic protest. The Conference rejoices at the magnificent success of the voluntary principle, which in so short a period has supplied the country with an army of 4,000,000 free men, but it is compelled with regret to recognise that, in spite of Lord Derby's scheme having produced nearly 3,000,000 volunteers, the net results are governed by the Prime Minister's pledge to the married recruits, which, in the opinion of the Government, has rendered necessary the Military Service Bill. The Conference regards the result as not yet ascertained with sufficient accuracy and certainty to warrant so momentous a proposal being passed by Parliament, but wishes, nevertheless, to leave the Labour members to vote upon it as they individually think fit.

In his opening remarks Mr. Hodge emphasised the gravity of the crisis, and this the Conference clearly recognised. He explained that the Parliamentary Labour Party had refrained from committing itself before the Conference met, and drew attention to his speech in the House of Commons the previous evening in which he had declared the historical opposition of Labour to compulsory military service. He asserted that the world had never before seen such a magnificent voluntary army as Britain had raised, and urged that before the Premier had decided for compulsion he should have followed his own policy of "wait and see," so that the results of the Derby campaign might have been properly judged. The Derby scheme was said to have been a failure until the Premier's pledge was given, and he agreed that a large number of married men would not have enlisted had it not been given. Nevertheless, he believed it would have been better had the pledge not been made, although under such circumstances we should "have been up against" Conscription pure and simple. To which there was an immediate response from the delegates, "We won't have it!"

Mr. Hodge proceeded to emphasise the dangers which would face the Labour movement if the official resolution were rejected. The desire of the three national committees was to prevent disruption: the resolution united all views by leaving Labour members of Parliament freedom to act as they felt impelled.

"No, no, no," shouted a body of the delegates. "We say yes," bawled Mr. Will Thorne from the platform. "We say no," responded the delegates.

"If you bind the Labour members you will treat them differently from what you have before," pleaded Mr. Hodge. "And about time, too," commented the delegates.

MR. ASQUITH'S "PLEDGE."

Mr. Hodge proceeded to say that the rejection of the Bill would result in a general election, and there was some applause when he said that that would prove the worst calamity in the history of the movement. He pointed out that the Bill was of a temporary character, and he said the Premier had given a pledge that it would not be used to depress Labour. When Mr. Hodge explained that the Premier's pledge was given in the form of a nod there was loud and prolonged laughter, and when he went on protestingly to explain "Well, he gave a shake of the head that Labour would be protected," the laughter was renewed more loudly than ever. "To my mind Trade Unionism is strong enough to protect itself," added Mr. Hodge. "That's a different matter," shouted a delegate, amidst applause.

679/2

SNEERING AT CONSCIENCE.

When Mr. James Sexton rose to second the resolution he was received with laughter and cries of "Where's your friend Lord Derby?" He confessed he would have liked a stronger resolution, and his speech made it clear that the strengthening he desired was on the side of Compulsion. It was significant that when he tried to sound the "patriotic" note there was very little cheering. He claimed that the decision of the Trade Union Congress was now modified by the Derby figures, and on this statement being challenged, he stated that the Labour delegates on the Recruiting Committee had had an opportunity of examining them, which was again challenged. A description of the Premier's pledge as "silly" was greeted with loud cheers, but there was opposition to his comment that the pledge had not been challenged. He described the Government's proposal as being "flabby" in the sense that it did not go far enough in the direction of Compulsion. "Why, it is not even limited Compulsion," he complained, and he sneered at the supposed exemption for conscientious objectors by saying, "They will grow and grow and grow until everybody has a conscience." To Mr. Sexton's discomfort this statement was greeted with loud cries of "Hear, hear," denoting that in the minds of those who cheered this would not be a bad thing at all!

Mr. Sexton concluded by picturing the disaster to the movement which would result from a cleavage of opinion in Parliament and in the country. "If an election comes," he said, "there is a great risk that our members may not be returned." Again ironical cheers greeted his statement.

Mr. Havelock Wilson, who followed, was no more successful in convincing the Conference. He expressed surprise at the cheers which greeted Mr. Sexton's expression of fear that the Labour members might not be returned to Parliament. "Do you mean," he asked, "that the Labour members are of no more use?" "Most of them," shouted back delegates. His championship of the Premier's pledge by a nod, on the ground that it would not have been decorous for him to have interrupted Mr. Hodge's flowing periods created much laughter. When he was asked why he did not oppose compulsory military service since he said he was opposed to it, he replied, "Because I have more sense." He reported that 58 of the 70 branches of his Union had declared their recognition of the validity of the Premier's pledge, and he tried to raise class feeling against the unmarried men who had not attested by saying that they belonged to the middle class. "They have not joined up," he said, "because such a common lot had enlisted."

AT LAST THE WORD!

The Conference had listened impatiently to these speeches, and it was very relieved to hear Mr. Ben Turner. Mr. Turner began by appealing for tolerance. He proceeded to remind the Conference that the Premier's pledge to married men was not the only one given. When Lord Kitchener had appeared before the national executives of the Labour movement he had said that thirty thousand recruits were wanted per week until the spring M.P., has made against Compulsion was recognised by the very warm cheer which welcomed him. Whilst recognising the seriousness of a general election he scouted the idea that Labour should give way for fear of it. The Conscriptionists might raise difficult issues, but Labour would raise difficult issues as well. He did not believe that Labour would be wiped out. We should demand the conscription of wealth, and that would be the last demand the Conscriptionists would desire to face.

Mr. Thomas vigorously denied Mr. Sexton's statement that the Premier's pledge had not been challenged. He reminded the Conference that he had himself challenged it in Parliament as a violation of the Labour agreement on recruiting. Great applause greeted his statement that no figures would satisfy the Conscriptionists. "They do not want Conscription to win the war. They want it for ulterior ends." Again there was loud applause. "That is why we have this simple, humble Bill," he added with infinite sarcasm. He warned the Conference that compulsion of unmarried men would be followed by compulsion of married men. The present distinction could not possibly be defended on military grounds. There was nothing to prevent the present Bill being so amended later on as to satisfy all the desires of the Conscriptionists.

J. H. THOMAS'S APPEAL.

Mr. Thomas appealed to Trade Union leaders not to be carried away by the popular clamour of the moment, and his appeal was thunderously endorsed. "There has never been in the world any precedent to show that Militarism and Conscription have been used for any other purpose than to defeat the workers. It is because I fear that that I am jealously going to guard against it whatever the consequences may be." In a peroration which greatly moved the Conference and raised it to a high pitch of enthusiasm, he said, "If this Congress decides in favour of this measure, and I do not believe it will, whilst I want to be as loyal as I have always been, I can only be loyal by clearing out, and this I would do without hesitation, because I know the Bill is the result of a huge conspiracy. It is because I know and feel that that I am not going to allow the Congress to bind me. The case for Conscription has not been proved. The figures have been manipulated by those who wanted it. Let us express in no uncertain and determined voice our continued opposition to it. The official resolution does not adequately express Trade Union opinion. The press has largely been responsible for creating the present situation, but the speeches of Trade Union leaders who have said that if Mr. Asquith and Lord Kitchener declared in favour of Conscription we would accept it must also bear a share of the responsibility. That is not our attitude. We have always taken the stand that Conscription will fasten the chains of bondage around the necks of the workers. Fear not them who kill the body, fear them most who kill the soul. This Bill, if passed, will kill the soul of the movement. Let Labour be on the alert and sound the battle-cry. Let us be determined to face the issue, whatever it may be, with the knowledge that we are not responsible and that our conscience is clear."

The enthusiasm which Mr. Thomas aroused was maintained at the same high pitch by Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P. In a powerful and eloquent speech he said his deep conviction against Compulsion could not be affected either by a threat of a general election or of the loss of seats. If an election were forced by the tricks and stratagems which had forced the Compulsion Bill, it would be wrong to consider their own interests or to betray the

Mr. Anderson proceeded to ask how organised Labour could argue against Industrial Conscription if it accepted Military Conscription. He read extracts from the utterances of Conscriptionists to show that the oppression of Labour was their ulterior object. "We have been told that Trade Unionism is strong enough to fight Industrial Conscription," he exclaimed. "Ah, but don't begin the fight by opening the gates to the enemy." He pointed out that under the Derby scheme many workers who could under no circumstances be spared for military service had been enlisted. Lord Derby knew the value of militarising industry. He had tried it at the Liverpool docks. It was the "khakifying" of the workers that the Conscriptionists had in mind. They were far more anxious to have Conscription to obtain military control here than for any other purpose. Mr. Lloyd George would like to have military control over the men on the Clyde. "He won't get it," Mr. Anderson exclaimed, and the Conference responded with deep and prolonged cheers.

SEATS OR SOULS?

Mr. Anderson designated Lord Northcliffe and Mr. Lloyd George as linked behind the campaign, and said that it was inspired much more by personal and political ambition than by military necessity. That was a well-known fact inside the House of Commons, and there was no doubt about it. Reverting to the question of a possible election, Mr. Anderson declared, "We do not want to lose our seats, but we must not lose our souls. I would rather see the Labour Party wiped out for the moment than sacrifice its principles, but I don't believe that would happen." The nation wanted money more than men, and if an election came we should raise the issue of conscription of wealth. If lives were to be conscripted, big estates must be conscripted first. "If the people are going to fight, let them have a country to fight for," he cried passionately, and the delegates cheered and cheered again. "So far as I am concerned," he concluded, "be the consequences what they may, I will fight this thing to the death."

At this point the Conference adjourned for lunch. The reception which had been given to the speeches of Mr. Turner, Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Anderson had made it clear that when the time came for taking a decision the delegates would pronounce strongly against compulsion. But at this stage in the proceedings the greatest optimist did not dare to hope for the result which was ultimately obtained.

It was immediately clear after lunch that feeling was no less pronounced than in the morning. When the Chairman stated that a letter had been received addressed to Mr. Tom Johnston, there were cries of "Good old Forward," and cheers. It was good to find that the conference had some opportunity of expressing its appreciation of the fight Mr. Johnston has so courageously waged in that paper against militarism and Conscription, and for the freedom of the press. Another significant incident during the reading of the announcements was the ironical laughter with which the Brassworkers' amendment in favour of the Bill was received, and the cheers and cries of "That's it," which greeted the terms of the railwaymen's amendment of whole-hearted opposition.

Mr. Arthur Henderson opened the afternoon's discussion. The welcome accorded him, whilst warm, contrasted distinctly with that given to Mr. Thomas and Mr. Anderson. He began in restrained and dignified language and won the sympathy of the conference, which can always be relied upon to give the exponent of an unpopular attitude a fair hearing. Although he said he would not speak with passion, Mr. Henderson, under the very ing me and who have been interrupting other speakers who have not raised their little finger to assist in the prosecution of the war, who are against the war, and who, I believe, are not prepared to say that they would like to see us win the war. Yet the conference cannot have its resolution moved without the acting chairman of the Labour Party being interrupted and insulted by one of these anti-war men!" Mr. Henderson spoke with great heat, and evoked loud response from his supporters.

LABOUR AND LORD KITCHENER

The motion, said Mr. Henderson, reaffirmed their position. Could anyone object to that? Referring to Mr. Ben Turner's statement about Lord Kitchener's appearance before the National Executives, he said only half of the truth had been told. Lord Kitchener wanted 30,000 men per week until the spring in order to bring the present divisions up to strength, and he then wanted 30,000 men per week to the end of the year in order that we might have man for man reserves. Could Labour, he asked, set up its opinion against the great official who had been called by the nation to take in hand the conduct of military operations? He disagreed with the method by which Lord Kitchener desired the armies should be obtained, but he would not venture to question his opinion of the size the army should be.

The resolution accurately expressed, Mr. Henderson said, his own position. If he believed for a moment that the Bill were being introduced not to meet a military need but to placate the opinion of the Conscriptionists he would oppose it. If the pledge to married men had not been given he was of the opinion that to-day we would have been in the position of having a measure of Conscription fuller, wider, and more permanent. In his judgment the men who were asked for were necessary to satisfy the demands of the military authorities. We had either got to have a measure of compulsion or to call upon at least 500,000 married men. Was there anyone who desired to call on these men or who was prepared to go to his constituency and say he was in favour of releasing them from their attestation? He know no one who would dare to put forward such a position.

Personally, he had been in favour of investigation of the figures before legislation. Why did he not take the same step as Sir John Simon? When Sir John came out, when Sir John went in, he was concerned with himself alone. "I did not go there on my own accord," continued Mr. Henderson. "I was sent there. Sir John Simon could leave the Government without breaking the Coalition, but if I and my two colleagues, Mr. Brace and Mr. Roberts, were to leave the Government they stood a greater risk of breaking it, because it would mean the withdrawal of one of the units of the Coalition." Mr. Henderson made it clear that if the conference said he must oppose the Bill he would refuse to accept their decision and would go to his constituents and ask them to endorse his attitude by re-electing him. "I do not mind extending an invitation," he added, "to those who have talked so glibly of elections and of the purifying of the Labour Party to accompany me."

MR. SNOWDEN'S CHALLENGE.

Immediately Mr. Philip Snowden rose to his feet and impressing his point by extending his arm and pointing to Mr. Henderson he said, "I accept the challenge. I invite Mr. Henderson to come to my constituency."

For a moment the delegates held their breath. They were taken aback by the suddenness of the incident. Then in the vicinity of Compulsion. It was significant that when he tried to sound the "patriotic" note there was very little cheering. He claimed that the decision of the Trade Union Congress was now modified by the Derby figures, and on this statement being challenged, he stated that the Labour delegates on the Recruiting Committee had had an opportunity of examining them, which was again challenged. A description of the Premier's pledge as "silly" was greeted with loud cheers, but there was opposition to his comment that the pledge had not been challenged. He described the Government's proposal as being "flabby" in the sense that it did not go far enough in the direction of Compulsion. "Why, it is not even limited Compulsion," he complained, and he sneered at the supposed exemption for conscientious objectors by saying, "They will grow and grow and grow until everybody has a conscience." To Mr. Sexton's discomfort this statement was greeted with loud cries of "Hear, hear," denoting that in the minds of those who cheered this would not be a bad thing at all!

Mr. Sexton concluded by picturing the disaster to the movement which would result from a cleavage of opinion in Parliament and in the country. "If an election comes," he said, "there is a great risk that our members may not be returned." Again ironical cheers greeted his statement.

Mr. Havelock Wilson, who followed, was no more successful in convincing the Conference. He expressed surprise at the cheers which greeted Mr. Sexton's expression of fear that the Labour members might not be returned to Parliament. "Do you mean," he asked, "that the Labour members are of no more use?" "Most of them," shouted back delegates. His championship of the Premier's pledge by a nod, on the ground that it would not have been decorous for him to have interrupted Mr. Hodge's flowing periods created much laughter. When he was asked why he did not oppose compulsory military service since he said he was opposed to it, he replied, "Because I have more sense." He reported that 58 of the 70 branches of his Union had declared their recognition of the validity of the Premier's pledge, and he tried to raise class feeling against the unmarried men who had not attested by saying that they belonged to the middle class. "They have not joined up," he said, "because such a common lot had enlisted."

AT LAST THE WORD!

The Conference had listened impatiently to these speeches, and it was very relieved to hear Mr. Ben Turner. Mr. Turner began by appealing for tolerance. He proceeded to remind the Conference that the Premier's pledge to married men was not the only one given. When Lord Kitchener had appeared before the national executives of the Labour movement he had said that thirty thousand recruits were wanted per week until the spring only. (Afterwards this statement was challenged by Mr. Henderson.) "They've got all they asked for, and still they want more," he commented. He pointed out that the Premier's pledge was not a Trades Congress pledge. The Congress had, indeed, declared against Conscription. If the Government wanted more men it could get them by treating those who enlisted fairly. He ridiculed the idea that the Bill would necessarily end with the war. "Who can say who will be in power at the end of the war?" he asked. "Shall the Prime Minister's pledge bind the soul of the nation?" he exclaimed passionately. "Shall we lose our birthright at the bidding of those who have not told us that the military needs require it? Are we to bow down to the House of Lords for fear it will force an election? If all our members lost their seats—and they would not—it would be better to go down fighting for righteousness. . . . . ."

The moment for which the Conference had waited had come. Mr. Turner could not conclude his sentence. From all parts of the hall cheers rose in a great volume, and were repeated again and again. Many delegates stood and waved their handkerchiefs. It was a long time before Mr. Turner could resume. He had uttered the word so eagerly desired.

In a noble concluding passage Mr. Turner declared that whilst he wanted the Allies to win as strongly as anyone, he did not want them to win by a system which would bring more wars and establish the evils of Prussian militarism in our own land.

The splendid fight which Mr. J. H. Thomas, his statement that no figures would satisfy the Conscriptionists. "They do not want Conscription to win the war. They want it for ulterior ends." Again there was loud applause. "That is why we have this simple, humble Bill," he added with infinite sarcasm. He warned the Conference that compulsion of unmarried men would be followed by compulsion of married men. The present distinction could not possibly be defended on military grounds. There was nothing to prevent the present Bill being so amended later on as to satisfy all the desires of the Conscriptionists.

J. H. THOMAS'S APPEAL.

Mr. Thomas appealed to Trade Union leaders not to be carried away by the popular clamour of the moment, and his appeal was thunderously endorsed. "There has never been in the world any precedent to show that Militarism and Conscription have been used for any other purpose than to defeat the workers. It is because I fear that that I am jealously going to guard against it whatever the consequences may be." In a peroration which greatly moved the Conference and raised it to a high pitch of enthusiasm, he said, "If this Congress decides in favour of this measure, and I do not believe it will, whilst I want to be as loyal as I have always been, I can only be loyal by clearing out, and this I would do without hesitation, because I know the Bill is the result of a huge conspiracy. It is because I know and feel that that I am not going to allow the Congress to bind me. The case for Conscription has not been proved. The figures have been manipulated by those who wanted it. Let us express in no uncertain and determined voice our continued opposition to it. The official resolution does not adequately express Trade Union opinion. The press has largely been responsible for creating the present situation, but the speeches of Trade Union leaders who have said that if Mr. Asquith and Lord Kitchener declared in favour of Conscription we would accept it must also bear a share of the responsibility. That is not our attitude. We have always taken the stand that Conscription will fasten the chains of bondage around the necks of the workers. Fear not them who kill the body, fear them most who kill the soul. This Bill, if passed, will kill the soul of the movement. Let Labour be on the alert and sound the battle-cry. Let us be determined to face the issue, whatever it may be, with the knowledge that we are not responsible and that our conscience is clear."

The enthusiasm which Mr. Thomas aroused was maintained at the same high pitch by Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P. In a powerful and eloquent speech he said his deep conviction against Compulsion could not be affected either by a threat of a general election or of the loss of seats. If an election were forced by the tricks and stratagems which had forced the Compulsion Bill, it would be wrong to consider their own interests or to betray the interests of their followers. They had a clear issue before them—Conscription or No Conscription. The present measure was only the thin end of the wedge, and the Conference must so declare its opinion that any Labour member of Parliament who supported it would have to do so on his own responsibility and not in the name of the movement. The Bill could not be defended on the ground of military needs. There were at least 100 members of Parliament who would vote against it, who believed there could be no successful termination of the war if we adopted Prussian methods. The figures which had been given were worthless. Sir John Simon had shattered them.

The reference to Sir John Simon evoked loud applause, and Mr. Anderson went on to say that nothing had become his membership of the Cabinet so much as the manner of his leaving it. He expressed the view that so far from Sir John Simon having sacrificed his career by what he had done, he had made it.

Like other speakers, Mr. Anderson poured ridicule upon the idea that the present measure would be the last step towards Compulsion. The cry of "single men first" was skilful and tricky, but they would be foolish if they were duped by it. He was very sarcastic over pledges "by nods of the head." "They gave a pledge that the National Registration Act would not be used for Compulsory Military Service. Have they kept it?" Loud cries of "No, No," showed that his point had struck home. "Accept this Bill," he exclaimed, "and the Northcliffe press will demand more. It cannot stop here."

have Conscription to obtain military control here than for any other purpose. Mr. Lloyd George would like to have military control over the men on the Clyde. "He won't get it," Mr. Anderson exclaimed, and the Conference responded with deep and prolonged cheers.

SEATS OR SOULS?

Mr. Anderson designated Lord Northcliffe and Mr. Lloyd George as linked behind the campaign, and said that it was inspired much more by personal and political ambition than by military necessity. That was a well-known fact inside the House of Commons, and there was no doubt about it. Reverting to the question of a possible election, Mr. Anderson declared, "We do not want to lose our seats, but we must not lose our souls. I would rather see the Labour Party wiped out for the moment than sacrifice its principles, but I don't believe that would happen." The nation wanted money more than men, and if an election came we should raise the issue of conscription of wealth. If lives were to be conscripted, big estates must be conscripted first. "If the people are going to fight, let them have a country to fight for," he cried passionately, and the delegates cheered and cheered again. "So far as I am concerned," he concluded, "be the consequences what they may, I will fight this thing to the death."

At this point the Conference adjourned for lunch. The reception which had been given to the speeches of Mr. Turner, Mr. Thomas, and Mr. Anderson had made it clear that when the time came for taking a decision the delegates would pronounce strongly against compulsion. But at this stage in the proceedings the greatest optimist did not dare to hope for the result which was ultimately obtained.

It was immediately clear after lunch that feeling was no less pronounced than in the morning. When the Chairman stated that a letter had been received addressed to Mr. Tom Johnston, there were cries of "Good old Forward," and cheers. It was good to find that the conference had some opportunity of expressing its appreciation of the fight Mr. Johnston has so courageously waged in that paper against militarism and Conscription, and for the freedom of the press. Another significant incident during the reading of the announcements was the ironical laughter with which the Brassworkers' amendment in favour of the Bill was received, and the cheers and cries of "That's it," which greeted the terms of the railwaymen's amendment of whole-hearted opposition.

Mr. Arthur Henderson opened the afternoon's discussion. The welcome accorded him, whilst warm, contrasted distinctly with that given to Mr. Thomas and Mr. Anderson. He began in restrained and dignified language and won the sympathy of the conference, which can always be relied upon to give the exponent of an unpopular attitude a fair hearing. Although he said he would not speak with passion, Mr. Henderson, under the very trying circumstances, was unable to maintain his own resolution and, if he was interrupted later on, it must be said that he called it upon himself.

MR. HENDERSON'S SPEECH.

Mr. Henderson pointed out that he was unable to be as frank with the conference as he would have desired on account of the fact that it was open to the press and the public. He realised the necessity of the conference speaking to its own rank and file and to the general public, and had not therefore opposed an open conference, but it inevitably placed a restriction upon him. He proceeded to say that the resolution of the National Executive had been drawn up with greater care than any in his experience. "What does this resolution do?" he asked. "Nothing," responded a delegate. "I want to point out that this resolution does something of vast importance. It informs the public, it informs the Government, of the attitude of Labour." Mr. Henderson interpreted, quite unjustly we are sure, a reference which had been made to others who had not "sold their souls" as an implication that he had done so. One delegate exclaimed, "You have not got one," but the feeling of the conference was entirely against this kind of intervention, and there were many demands that the Chairman should insist upon a withdrawal. Mr. Henderson took advantage of it to hit out, apparently, at the I.L.P., though it was not an I.L.P. delegate who interrupted him. "There are those in this audience," he exclaimed, "who are interrupt-fore the National Executives, he said only half of the truth had been told. Lord Kitchener wanted 30,000 men per week until the spring in order to bring the present divisions up to strength, and he then wanted 30,000 men per week to the end of the year in order that we might have man for man reserves. Could Labour, he asked, set up its opinion against the great official who had been called by the nation to take in hand the conduct of military operations? He disagreed with the method by which Lord Kitchener desired the armies should be obtained, but he would not venture to question his opinion of the size the army should be.

The resolution accurately expressed, Mr. Henderson said, his own position. If he believed for a moment that the Bill were being introduced not to meet a military need but to placate the opinion of the Conscriptionists he would oppose it. If the pledge to married men had not been given he was of the opinion that to-day we would have been in the position of having a measure of Conscription fuller, wider, and more permanent. In his judgment the men who were asked for were necessary to satisfy the demands of the military authorities. We had either got to have a measure of compulsion or to call upon at least 500,000 married men. Was there anyone who desired to call on those men or who was prepared to go to his constituency and say he was in favour of releasing them from their attestation? He know no one who would dare to put forward such a position.

Personally, he had been in favour of investigation of the figures before legislation. Why did he not take the same step as Sir John Simon? When Sir John came out, when Sir John went in, he was concerned with himself alone. "I did not go there on my own accord," continued Mr. Henderson. "I was sent there. Sir John Simon could leave the Government without breaking the Coalition, but if I and my two colleagues, Mr. Brace and Mr. Roberts, were to leave the Government they stood a greater risk of breaking it, because it would mean the withdrawal of one of the units of the Coalition." Mr. Henderson made it clear that if the conference said he must oppose the Bill he would refuse to accept their decision and would go to his constituents and ask them to endorse his attitude by re-electing him. "I do not mind extending an invitation," he added, "to those who have talked so glibly of elections and of the purifying of the Labour Party to accompany me."

MR. SNOWDEN'S CHALLENGE.

Immediately Mr. Philip Snowden rose to his feet and impressing his point by extending his arm and pointing to Mr. Henderson he said, "I accept the challenge. I invite Mr. Henderson to come to my constituency."

For a moment the delegates held their breath. They were taken aback by the suddenness of the incident. Then in the vicinity of Mr. Snowden a tremendous cheer was raised, and as what had happened became clear to the conference the volume of applause increased and increased until it swept like a hurricane from one end of the building to the other. The platform alone was silent.

When at length Mr. Henderson could resume, he said, "I suppose the cheers indicate that that was a fair and straightforward challenge. I am going to repeat my challenge. I have nothing to do with Blackburn. It is time for me to go to Blackburn when I am invited by the Blackburn constituency." Mr. Snowden tried again to intervene, but the excitement was so intense that he could not get in a word. "My challenge was addressed to those who had spoken this morning," shouted Mr. Henderson, "Mr. Snowden had not spoken. If Mr. Snowden is prepared to go to Blackburn, let him go. I am prepared to go to Barnard Castle." Mr. Henderson concluded his speech by saying that he believed that if the conference rejected the resolution it would do more to wreck the political side of the movement than anything else they could do.

Immediately Mr. Henderson sat down, both Mr. Ramsay MacDonald and Mr. Philip Snowden rose. Each, on seeing the other gave way, but Mr. Snowden indicated that he desired Mr. MacDonald to speak. Mr. MacDonald received the ovation of the day. The cheers rose to a crescendo, they fell, then they rose again, they fell, and then they rose a third time. So challenging was the welcome that some of his opponents thought it necessary to boo in reply, but it was a pathetic effort. Mr. MacDonald opened by regretting that the question of constituencies had been introduced. Political democracy had wisely chosen the method of testing public opinion periodically by general elections, and it would be an absurd travesty of representative democracy if members of Parliament were to respond to every momentary passion of their electorates. He expressed his desire that the conference should state in black and white what it wanted, although he had little to find fault with in the resolution. It rejoiced in the success of the voluntary principle, but during the last seventeen months voluntaryism had been diluted by certain forms of compulsion. Despite that, however, we must stick together in our opposition to political compulsion. Voluntaryism diluted to the utmost was preferable to Conscription. He believed the voluntary system could only be worked when the people were told the truth, and he expressed the conviction that the time would come when those who had declined to go on the recruiting platform would be able to disabuse the fallacious suggestion that they had not been serving their country.

DRIFTING TO THE DEVIL.

Replying to the suggestion that the Derby scheme would have failed but for the Premier's pledge, Mr. MacDonald said he was not sure it would not have been better for the country to have been faced with the clear issue of Conscription rather than it should take it piece-meal, so that at no moment would we be able to say we had got Conscription at that moment, but had not had it five days before. "There is nothing more terrible," exclaimed Mr. MacDonald with tremendous force, "nothing more terrible in its consequences than to drift, drift, DRIFT into a bad system so that at no moment you are facing the devil fair and square and fighting him clear and above board." Mr. MacDonald said the only conclusion one could draw from the resolution was that those who supported it could not support the Bill.

Mr. MacDonald emphasised the point made by previous speakers that the principle of Compulsion cannot be restricted to this measure. "When you start with a Compulsory Bill," he said, "you cannot possibly go back to voluntaryism. The distinction between married and unmarried men is purely artificial. The moment you put a Bill on the Statute Book to say to an individual, 'Single or married, it is part of your ordinary civic duties to join the army,' that moment you have declared for a method which will have to be carried out to its full extent, because there is no half-way house possible for the nation after it has taken that step."

Mr. MacDonald argued that the real difference in the Labour movement at the present time centres on the question of military necessity. "The difference between us," he said, "is whether the democracy, our movement, has not a separate attitude as to military necessity. The professional soldier looks at the State from his own point of view, the point of view of military necessity. The function of our movement, the function of a Cabinet, is to co-ordinate the demand of the military expert with other national demands. You know how dangerous the expert always is. National life is not maintained by soldiers only, even in time of war. We cannot possibly afford a purely military view to throw all our other considerations into the background," nor to supply as many men as the War Office may at any time demand, irrespective of other demands."

One of Mr. MacDonald's best sentences was, "You can win the war, and in winning it pay such a price that the nation will have lost." Speaking for those who have taken his point of view, Mr. MacDonald said, "We in our way are fulfilling a national need and performing national service. I criticise military requirements from the point of view of the sum total of the requirements of the war." Concluding, Mr. MacDonald said he was opposed to Conscription and the Government bill.

THE COMPULSION AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. J. Davies, of the Boilermakers, moved the following amendment:

behalf of the Boilermakers, Mr. John Hill said Compulsion was necessary in the interest of Trade Unionism to prevent young men taking the jobs of old men. This statement was received with a number of expressions of indignation. At the conclusion of Mr. Hill's speech there were loud demands that the vote should be taken. The figures were:

For the Amendment—
541,000.

Against the Amendment—
2,121,000.

MAJORITY AGAINST THE GOVERNMENT BILL—
1,580,000.

The announcement of the figures was received with a great wave of cheering.

BELLAMY'S GREAT SPEECH.

Mr. A. Bellamy moved the Railwaymen's amendment:

This Conference reaffirms the decision of the Bristol Trade Unions Congress when it unanimously protested in the name of over three million organised workers against compulsory military service. It regrets that the unity and solidarity of the nation have been gravely imperilled, and industrial and political liberty menaced, by the proposal to introduce such a system, against which it makes a most emphatic protest, and decides to use every means in its power to oppose.

The Conference rejoices at the magnificent success of the appeal to the voluntary principle, which in so short a period has supplied this country with an army of four million free men, and is emphatically of opinion that no case has been made out for any measure of limited or temporary compulsion, which we regard as the first step to a general application of a vicious principle. We declare that all the men required for military and industrial purposes can be obtained by a continuance of the voluntary method.

This Conference further considers that the proposals of the Government would be economically disastrous to the life of the nation, and declares its opposition to the Bill, and recommends the Labour Party in Parliament to oppose the measure in all its stages.

He was received very warmly, and he delivered a masterly speech which probably had a greater effect upon the Conference than any other uttered during the day. Mr. Bellamy spoke quietly, he reasoned his case well, and he revealed the qualities of statesmanship in the highest sense of the word. He said the purpose of the resolution was to enable the Conference to come to a decision about which there might be no misunderstanding. "It is imperative that we should state our position emphatically," he said amidst cheers. He told how he had heard Mr. Bonar Law say that Lord Derby had admitted his figures to be guesswork. "Are we to give up so vital a principle for figures which are admitted to be guesswork?" he asked, and, needless to say, the delegates responded "No!"

A RAILWAY STRIKE?

Mr. Bellamy said the Railwaymen's Executive would not lend their voice or vote to favour compulsory military service; they would take every possible means to oppose the Bill. "Do you mean to say you are going to call a strike," Mr. Bellamy was asked on behalf of the inevitable critic. "You may ask us such questions just now," replied Mr. Bellamy with a smile, "but my answer is 'wait and see.'" He made clear that the railwaymen's representatives had done all they could to make the voluntary system a success, and that they desire to see a victory for the Allies. They agreed that we must see that the Tommies in the trenches were backed up here, "but," said Mr. Bellamy, "a measure of Compulsion would help the Tommies to lose the war, not to win it." The Bill could not possibly get in a sufficiently large number of men to make a difference in the result of the war. "They can fool some of the people some of the time, but not all the people all the time," he commented, to the delight of the Conference. Conscription was not being introduced for the sake of 300,000 men. "It is being introduced, I believe firmly and sincerely, to put around the necks of the working class a chain so strong that it will be able to hold him effectively when [illegible]

Mr. Egerton P. Wake seconded the resolution on behalf of the Barrow Labour Party, and in doing so he was able to say that in all parts of the country local Labour Parties and Trades Councils were vitally hostile to the measure. He mercilessly exposed the cry that the Bill is necessary to win the war. "With all the millions of Russia, France, and Italy, with our free army of four millions, and our powerful navy, we cannot be successful," says the Government, "unless we have these three hundred thousand additional men." The manner in which the delegates laughed showed how they had appreciated Mr. Wake's point. He heaped ridicule upon the reliance which some speakers had placed upon the Government's pledges. "Does not experience teach us," he asked, "that such pledges are more often honoured in the breach than in the observance?" Neither Mr. Asquith nor Mr. Henderson might be in office when the war is over, and a subsequent Government would not be bound by the pledges of this Government. The greatest service that could be rendered by this country to the Allies was to preserve its industrial life. The war was becoming one of attrition between the man power of Germany and the money power of Britain. If we maintain our navy and army, the French army, supply munitions for the Russian army, assist Italy, succoured Belgium and Serbia, maintained our exports and essential industrial services, we should have quite sufficient to do.

THE FINAL VOTES.

On the conclusion of Mr. Wake's speech there were loud cries of "Vote, vote, vote," and so clearly had the delegates come to a decision that they declined to listen to Mr. T. E. Naylor. The amendment was then put to the Conference, with the following result:

For the Amendment	1,715,000
Against the Amendment	934,000
MAJORITY FOR THE AMENDMENT	781,000

The announcement of the figures was received with prolonged and enthusiastic cheers. It was the intention of the Chairman to submit the amendment as a substantive motion formally by a show of hands, but Mr. James Sexton excitedly demanded a second card vote, asserting that the previous vote had not been accurately taken. The second division showed:

For Mr. Bellamy's Resolution	1,998,000
Against Mr. Bellamy's Resolution	783,000
MAJORITY FOR	1,215,000

Whes it was found that the majority had been still further increased the enthusiasm knew no bounds. Delegates leapt to their feet, waved hats and handkerchiefs, and shouted until they were hoarse. In the excitement a resolution was carried without opposition, demanding the complete withdrawal of the Bill, expressing the opinion that the group system should be continued on voluntary methods, and pledging the Labour movement to support the system until the successful conclusion of the war. Some opposition was expressed to this resolution, but it was carried without a card vote. With the previous resolution in their minds, the delegates began to sing "The Red Flag," and left the hall still cheering over their triumph against our British "Prussians."

A VOICE FROM THE ARMY.

Burning to oppose Conscription.

Sir,—Mr. MacDonald is quite correct in his statement that there are to-day men in the Army who are prouder than ever of their association with the I.L.P.

I am one.

My heart and brain are burning to be in this fight against Conscription. Whatever individual views of Socialism may be regarding the righteousness of the nation's participation in the war, surely they, as lovers of liberty, cannot allow the present measure to become a reality.

Do they not yet know the pass to which Conscription can lead? Have they not learned one lesson from the French railway strike?

THE BRAVE ONE HUNDRED.

THE M.P.'S AGAINST THE BILL.

The following members of Parliament voted against the first reading of the Compulsory Military Service Bill in the House of Commons on Thursday, January 6, 1916:

Percy Alden (Rad.)
W. C. Anderson (Lab.)
Sydney Arnold (Rad.)
Jos. A. Baker (Rad.)
Sir J. E. Barlow (Rad.)
John P. Boland (Nat.)
P. J. Brady (Nat.)
Rt. Hn. J. Burns (Rad.)
Sir W. P. Byles (Rad.)
Alfred Byrne (Nat.)
H. G. Chancellor (Rad.)
Jno. Jos. Clancy (Nat.)
William Clough (Nat.)
John R. Clynes (Lab.)
T. J. Condon (Nat.)
James Cosgrave. (Nat.)
Patrick Crumley (Nat.)
William Delany (Nat.)
Hon. R. D. Denman (Rad.)
Joseph Devlin (Nat.)
John Dillon (Nat.)
Cpt. A. Donelan (Nat.)
William Doris (Nat.)
Wm. J. Duffy (Nat.)
Dr. J. Esmonde (Nat).
Sir T. Esmonde (Nat.)
J. P. Farrell (Nat.)
W. Field (Nat.)
J. Fitzgibbon (Nat.)
M. J. Flavin (Nat.)
Sir W. A. Gelder (Rad.)
L. Ginnell (Nat.)
H. J. Glanville (Rad.)
F. Goldstone (Lab.)
E. J. Graham (Nat.)
J. Hackett (Nat.)
A. G. C. Harvey (Rad.)
T. E. Harvey (Rad.)
J. P. Hayden (Nat.)
R. Hazleton (Nat.)
J. M. Hogge (Rad.)
Walter Hudson (Lab.)
E. T. John (Rad.)
Leif Jones (Rad.)
F. W. Jowett (Lab.)
M. Keating (Nat.)
E. Kelly (Nat.)
V. P. Kennedy (Nat.)
D. Kilbride (Nat.)
J. King (Rad.)
R. Lambert (Rad.)
Rt. Hon. T. Lough (Rad.)
T. Lundon (Nat.)
A. A. Lynch (Nat.)
J. R. MacDonald (Lab.)
J. MacVeagh (Nat.)
R. McGheo (Nat.)
D. M. Mason (Rad.)
M. Meagher (Nat.)
F. E. Meehan (Nat.)
P. J. Meehan (Nat.)
M. Molloy (Nat.)
P. A. Molteno (Rad.)
J. J. Mooney (Nat.)
P. Morrell (Rad.)
J. Muldoon (Nat.)
M. J. Murphy (Nat.)
J. Nolan (Nat.)
J. D. Nugent (Nat.)
P. O'Brien (Nat.)
J. O'Connor (Nat.)
P. O'Doherty (Nat.)
T. O'Donnell (Nat.)
J. O'Dowd (Nat.)
J. O'Kelly (Nat.)
W. O'Malley (Nat.)
Dr. C. O'Neill (Nat.)
P. J. O'Shaughnessy (Nat.)
J. J. O'Shee (Nat.)
T. O'Sullivan (Nat.)
R. L. Outhwaite (Rad.)
J. Parker (Lab.)
J. Phillips (Nat.)
A. Ponsonby (Rad.)
W. M. R. Pringle (Rad.)
M. Reddy (Nat.)
J. E. Redmond (Nat.)
G. C. Rees (Rad.)
T. Richards (Lab.)
T. Richardson (Lab.)
A. Rowntree (Rad.)
Sir W. Runciman (Rad.)
T. Scanlon (Nat.)
A. J. Sherwell (Rad.)
Rt. Hn. Sir J. A. Simon (Rad.)
H. B. L. Smith (Rad.)
T. F. Smyth (Nat.)
P. Snowden (Lab.)
J. H. Thomas (Lab.)
W. Thorne (Lab.)
C. P. Trevelyan (Rad.)
G. J. Wardle (Lab.)
J. White (Nat.)
P. Williams (Rad.)
L. Williams (Rad.)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Holt (Rad.) and Mr. Whitehouse (Rad.)

The following members of the Labour Party voted in favour of the Compulsory Military Service Bill:

Rt. Hon. G. N. Barnes.
C. W. Bowerman.
C. Duncan.
John Hodge.
James O'Grady.
J. W. Taylor.
Robert Tootill.
A. Wilkie.

THE BILL AND CONSCIENCE.

EXEMPTION NOT ACCEPTABLE.

In the early summarised reports of the Premier's speech it appeared that the Government had gone far to meet the conscientious objector to military service. From the full report of the speech it is now clear that it is not the intention of the Government to exempt conscientious objectors from military service at all. They may not be obliged to fulfil combatant duties, but they are obliged, under the Bill, as interpreted by Mr. Asquith's speech, to come within the military machine and fulfil military duties. Mr. Asquith said:

Those of us who know the real facts of British life know quite well that there are a great many people belonging to various religious denominations, or to various schools of thought, who are quite prepared to serve their country in the war, but who object, on conscientious grounds, to the taking of life. They are, however, quite willing to perform many other military duties. . . . It is suggested in the case of such men that the exemption which they should get—and which I am curious to all that they would claim—should take the form of exemption from military compulsion during peace only. It is no discredit to the utmost was preferable to Conscription. He believed the voluntary system could only be worked when the people were told the truth, and he expressed the conviction that the time would come when those who had declined to go on the recruiting platform would be able to disabuse the fallacious suggestion that they had not been serving their country.

DRIFTING TO THE DEVIL.

Replying to the suggestion that the Derby scheme would have failed but for the Premier's pledge, Mr. MacDonald said he was not sure it would not have been better for the country to have been faced with the clear issue of Conscription rather than it should take it piece-meal, so that at no moment would we be able to say we had got Conscription at that moment, but had not had it five days before. "There is nothing more terrible," exclaimed Mr. MacDonald with tremendous force, "nothing more terrible in its consequences than to drift, drift, DRIFT into a bad system so that at no moment you are facing the devil fair and square and fighting him clear and above board." Mr. MacDonald said the only conclusion one could draw from the resolution was that those who supported it could not support the Bill.

Mr. MacDonald emphasised the point made by previous speakers that the principle of Compulsion cannot be restricted to this measure. "When you start with a Compulsory Bill," he said, "you cannot possibly go back to voluntaryism. The distinction between married and unmarried men is purely artificial. The moment you put a Bill on the Statute Book to say to an individual, 'Single or married, it is part of your ordinary civic duties to join the army,' that moment you have declared for a method which will have to be carried out to its full extent, because there is no half-way house possible for the nation after it has taken that step."

Mr. MacDonald argued that the real difference in the Labour movement at the present time centres on the question of military necessity. "The difference between us," he said, "is whether the democracy, our movement, has not a separate attitude as to military necessity. The professional soldier looks at the State from his own point of view, the point of view of military necessity. The function of our movement, the function of a Cabinet, is to co-ordinate the demand of the military expert with other national demands. You know how dangerous the expert always is. National life is not maintained by soldiers only, even in time of war. We cannot possibly afford a purely military view to throw all our other considerations into the background," nor to supply as many men as the War Office may at any time demand, irrespective of other demands."

One of Mr. MacDonald's best sentences was, "You can win the war, and in winning it pay such a price that the nation will have lost." Speaking for those who have taken his point of view, Mr. MacDonald said, "We in our way are fulfilling a national need and performing national service. I criticise military requirements from the point of view of the sum total of the requirements of the war." Concluding, Mr. MacDonald said he was opposed to Conscription and the Government Bill.

THE COMPULSION AMENDMENT.

Mr. W. J. Davies, of the Brassworkers, moved the following amendment:

> We support the measure of Compulsion for the purpose of enforcing single men of military age to attest under Lord Derby's group system on condition that adequate Labour representation is granted on all local tribunals under that scheme.

His speech was a pleasant interlude. One delegate likened it to Charlie Chaplin's turn in the midst of tragedy, pathos, and drama. Whilst the Conference was amused, however, it would not accept his statements. "We have got to obey the law," he said, anticipating the passage of the Bill. "No, no," shouted the delegates. "If the Government carry the Bill it will be administered," he added. "We will strike," shouted the delegates. The Conference enjoyed this "turn" for some time, but when Mr. Davies began to revert to the reign of George III., the delegates, with cries of "What about Queen Anne?" made clear they had had enough.

Seconding the amendment, as he was careful to explain, not on his own behalf but on

BELLAMY'S GREAT SPEECH.

Mr. A. Bellamy moved the Railwaymen's amendment:

> This Conference reaffirms the decision of the Bristol Trade Unions Congress when it unanimously protested in the name of over three million organised workers against compulsory military service. It regrets that the unity and solidarity of the nation have been gravely imperilled, and industrial and political liberty menaced, by the proposal to introduce such a system, against which it makes a most emphatic protest, and decides to use every means in its power to oppose.
>
> The Conference rejoices at the magnificent success of the appeal to the voluntary principle, which in so short a period has supplied this country with an army of four million free men, and is emphatically of opinion that no case has been made out for any measure of limited or temporary compulsion, which we regard as the first step to a general application of a vicious principle. We declare that all the men required for military and industrial purposes can be obtained by a continuance of the voluntary method.
>
> This Conference further considers that the proposals of the Government would be economically disastrous to the life of the nation, and declares its opposition to the Bill, and recommends the Labour Party in Parliament to oppose the measure in all its stages.

He was received very warmly, and he delivered a masterly speech which probably had a greater effect upon the Conference than any other uttered during the day. Mr. Bellamy spoke quietly, he reasoned his case well, and he revealed the qualities of statesmanship in the highest sense of the word. He said the purpose of the resolution was to enable the Conference to come to a decision about which there might be no misunderstanding. "It is imperative that we should state our position emphatically," he said amidst cheers. He told how he had heard Mr. Bonar Law say that Lord Derby had admitted his figures to be guesswork. "Are we to give up so vital a principle for figures which are admitted to be guesswork?" he asked, and, needless to say, the delegates responded "No!"

A RAILWAY STRIKE?

Mr. Bellamy said the Railwaymen's Executive would not lend their voice or vote to favour compulsory military service; they would take every possible means to oppose the Bill. "Do you mean to say you are going to call a strike," Mr. Bellamy was asked on behalf of the inevitable critic. "You may ask us such questions just now," replied Mr. Bellamy with a smile, "but my answer is 'wait and see.'" He made clear that the railwaymen's representatives had done all they could to make the voluntary system a success, and that they desire to see a victory for the Allies. They agreed that we must see that the Tommies in the trenches were backed up here, "but," said Mr. Bellamy, "a measure of Compulsion would help the Tommies to lose the war, not to win it." The Bill could not possibly get in a sufficiently large number of men to make a difference in the result of the war. "They can fool some of the people some of the time, but not all the people all the time," he commented, to the delight of the Conference. Conscription was not being introduced for the sake of 300,000 men. "It is being introduced, I believe firmly and sincerely, to put around the necks of the working class a chain so strong that it will be able to hold him effectively when the ruling classes desire." The workers had gone on strike and sacrificed their livelihood many times for issues much less vital than this. He believed thousands of workers would do it now if necessary, and not quietly. In South Wales they had attempted to apply a measure of Compulsion, but they had utterly failed. "Put this Bill on the Statute Book," he said to the Government, "and you will arouse a passion so strong that, in the past, even Kings and Governments have not been able to withstand it."

Mr. Bellamy reminded the Conference that nearly a million Trade Unionists were in the army, and by conversation with their French comrades they had learned to hate Conscription. "Talk with a Frenchman," one railwayman in the army had writen to him, "and you will understand the fetters of Conscription. Concluding, Mr. Bellamy appealed to the Conference to vote for the resolution and make it clear to the Government that Trade Unionists would fight it to the death than in the observance?" Neither Mr. Asquith nor Mr. Henderson might be in office when the war is over, and a subsequent Government would not be bound by the pledges of this Government. The greatest service that could be rendered by this country to the Allies was to preserve its industrial life. The war was becoming one of attrition between the man power of Germany and the money power of Britain. If we maintain our navy and army, the French army, supply munitions for the Russian army, assist Italy, succoured Belgium and Serbia, maintained our exports and essential industrial services, we should have quite sufficient to do.

THE FINAL VOTES.

On the conclusion of Mr. Wake's speech there were loud cries of "Vote, vote, vote," and so clearly had the delegates come to a decision that they declined to listen to Mr. T. E. Naylor. The amendment was then put to the Conference, with the following result:

For the Amendment	1,715,000
Against the Amendment	934,000
MAJORITY FOR THE AMENDMENT	781,000

The announcement of the figures was received with prolonged and enthusiastic cheers. It was the intention of the Chairman to submit the amendment as a substantive motion formally by a show of hands, but Mr. James Sexton excitedly demanded a second card vote, asserting that the previous vote had not been accurately taken. The second division showed:

For Mr. Bellamy's Resolution	1,998,000
Against Mr. Bellamy's Resolution	783,000
MAJORITY FOR	1,215,000

Whes it was found that the majority had been still further increased the enthusiasm knew no bounds. Delegates leapt to their feet, waved hats and handkerchiefs, and shouted until they were hoarse. In the excitement a resolution was carried without opposition, demanding the complete withdrawal of the Bill, expressing the opinion that the group system should be continued on voluntary methods, and pledging the Labour movement to support the system until the successful conclusion of the war. Some opposition was expressed to this resolution, but it was carried without a card vote. With the previous resolution in their minds, the delegates began to sing "The Red Flag," and left the hall still cheering over their triumph against our British "Prussians."

A VOICE FROM THE ARMY.

Burning to oppose Conscription.

Sir,—Mr. MacDonald is quite correct in his statement that there are to-day men in the Army who are prouder than ever of their association with the I.L.P.

I am one.

My heart and brain are burning to be in this fight against Conscription. Whatever individual views of Socialists may be regarding the righteousness of the nation's participation in the war, surely they, as lovers of liberty, cannot allow the present menace to become a reality.

Do they not yet know the uses to which Conscription can be put? Have they not learned any lesson from the French railway strike?

Or is it that they, too, are being blinded by the glamour of patriotism that is being thrown over all the encroachments made upon the liberties won for us by our fathers and forefathers?

There is, however, one great hope for the opponents of compulsion. They will have some unexpected allies. For do not all the great employers cry out at every strike against the interference of the Trade Unionists with the liberty of the blacklegs? Do not the landlords complain of the interference with their liberty of action, caused by the passing of an Act to restrict their rent-grabbing propensities?

Surely, then, these champions of liberty will resist to the uttermost any attempt made to interfere with the bodily and spiritual liberty of the nation. Perhaps an appeal can be made to them by the leaders of the Anti-Conscription movement.

Best of luck to the I.L.P. in this New Year. May we yet be able to see in our time a happy and contented land living in friendship and fellowship with the free peoples of other lands.

—Yours etc., LANCE CORPORAL.

William Clough (Nat.)
John R. Clynes (Lab.)
T. J. Condon (Nat.)
James Cosgrave. (Nat.)
Patrick Crumley (Nat.)
William Delany (Nat.)
Hon. R. D. Denman (Rad.)
Joseph Devlin (Nat.)
John Dillon (Nat.)
Cpt. A. Donelan (Nat.)
William Doris (Nat.)
Wm. J. Duffy (Nat.)
Dr. J. Esmonde (Nat).
Sir T. Esmonde (Nat.)
J. P. Farrell (Nat.)
W. Field (Nat.)
J. Fitzgibbon (Nat.)
M. J. Flavin (Nat.)
Sir W. A. Gelder (Rad.)
L. Ginnell (Nat.)
H. J. Glanville (Rad.)
F. Goldstone (Lab.)
E. J. Graham (Nat.)
J. Hackett (Nat.)
A. G. C. Harvey (Rad.)
T. E. Harvey (Rad.)
J. P. Hayden (Nat.)
R. Hazleton (Nat.)
J. M. Hogge (Rad.)
Walter Hudson (Lab.)
E. T. John (Rad.)
Leif Jones (Rad.)
F. W. Jowett (Lab.)
M. Keating (Nat.)
E. Kelly (Nat.)
V. P. Kennedy (Nat.)
D. Kilbride (Nat.)
J. King (Rad.)
R. Lambert (Rad.)
Rt. Hon. T. Lough (Rad.)
T. Lundon (Nat.)
A. A. Lynch (Nat.)
J. R. MacDonald (Lab.)
J. MacVeagh (Nat.)
J. D. Nugent (Nat.)
P. O'Brien (Nat.)
J. O'Connor (Nat.)
P. O'Doherty (Nat.)
T. O'Donnell (Nat.)
J. O'Dowd (Nat.)
J. O'Kelly (Nat.)
W. O'Malley (Nat.)
Dr. C. O'Neill (Nat.)
P. J. O'Shaughnessy (Nat.)
J. J. O'Shee (Nat.)
T. O'Sullivan (Nat.)
R. L. Outhwaite (Rad.)
J. Parker (Lab.)
J. Phillips (Nat.)
A. Ponsonby (Rad.)
W. M. R. Pringle (Rad.)
M. Reddy (Nat.)
J. E. Redmond (Nat.)
G. C. Rees (Rad.)
T. Richards (Lab.)
T. Richardson (Lab.)
A. Rowntree (Rad.)
Sir W. Runciman (Rad.)
T. Scanlon (Nat.)
A. J. Sherwell (Rad.)
Rt. Hn. Sir J. A. Simon (Rad.)
H. B. L. Smith (Rad.)
T. F. Smyth (Nat.)
P. Snowden (Lab.)
J. H. Thomas (Lab.)
W. Thorne (Lab.)
C. P. Trevelyan (Rad.)
G. J. Wardle (Lab.)
C. White (Nat.)
P. Williams (Rad.)
L. Williams (Rad.)

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Holt (Rad.) and Mr. Whitehouse (Rad.)

The following members of the Labour Party voted in favour of the Compulsory Military Service Bill:

Rt. Hon. G. N. Barnes.	James O'Grady.
C. W. Bowerman.	J. W. Taylor.
C. Duncan.	Robert Tootill.
John Hodge.	A. Wilkie.

THE BILL AND CONSCIENCE.

EXEMPTION NOT ACCEPTABLE.

In the early summarised reports of the Premier's speech it appeared that the Government had gone far to meet the conscientious objector to military service. From the full report of the speech it is now clear that it is not the intention of the Government to exempt conscientious objectors from military service at all. They may not be obliged to fulfil combatant duties, but they are obliged, under the Bill, as interpreted by Mr. Asquith's speech, to come within the military machine and fulfil military duties. Mr. Asquith said:

> Those of us who know the real facts of British life know quite well that there are a great many people belonging to various religious denominations, or to various schools of thought, who are quite prepared to serve their country in the war, but who object, on conscientious grounds, to the taking of life. They are, however, quite willing to perform many other military duties. . . It is suggested in the case of such men that the exemption which they should get—and which I am certain is all that they would claim—should take the form of exemption from military combatant duties only. It is no discredit whatever to a man if he has obtained a certificate of that kind, just as effectively to discharge the duties of a citizen for military purposes within the limits of his own conscientious scruples. He could take—as most of us can—military duties in the fullest sense of the term.

From this extract it wil be seen that Mr. Asquith has entirely misunderstood the position of many thousands of conscientious objectors, who object not merely to taking human life, but to participating in war which is waged by the method of human slaughter. We understand that the Service Committee of the Society of Friends, the Committee of the Fellowship of Reconciliation, and the Committee of the No-Conscription Fellowship are drawing the attention of the Government and the public to this misconception of their attitude.

TRADES UNIONISTS—Beware of the Plot Against You!

THE CONSCRIPTIONISTS ARE DETERMINED TO CRUSH THE WORKER.

SMASH THEIR PRETTY GAME BEFORE IT IS TOO LATE.

If humour has a place in a situation so serious, it was surely present in the painstaking efforts of the supporters of Compulsion to convince the Labour Conference and the country that they hated nothing so much as Compulsion. Nevertheless, they were determined to register their votes in favour of the hateful principle!

It is noticeable that the people behind the agitation are the people who always wanted Conscription because of the power it would bestow upon the ruling classes, and one Cabinet Minister whose popularity is rapidly declining, and who is doubtless moved by a mixture of personal ambition and a desire for revenge upon the workers he has not been able to hoodwink.

There is no doubt about the reasons of the Conscriptionists. They have stated them themselves. Here are some of their democratic opinions!

Lt.-Col. W. H. Maxwell, in the Outlook for September, 1915, said:

Trade Unionism—that shelter for slinking shirkers—is imperilling our existence, and by its action a rot of our national soul has set in. One remedy, and one alone, can eradicate this state of rot—martial law will cure it.

The Saturday Review of August 21, 1915, was equally blunt:

National Service is required as much for the effect it will have upon MINERS AND MUNITIONS, as for the part it will play in the actual raising of armies.

The same sentiment found expression in the Spectator of August 28, 1915:

Not every man will be wanted as a soldier, but all will be "fetched" to do what is wanted of them, WHETHER IN WORKSHOPS, OR GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS, OR MINES, OR MERCHANT SHIPS.

The following appeared in the Daily News of January 29, 1915:

Arguing in favour of compulsory Cadet Corps, he (Lord Methuen) quotes the example of the South African Citizen Army, and he says: "Little did we anticipate that within three years this force should (sic) have SCOTCHED A STRIKE and quelled a rebellion."

On August 28 again spake the Saturday Review, saying unto us:

It (Conscription) is not only a question of raising a given number of recruits, but of getting accepted by all citizens, CIVILIAN WORKERS as well as soldiers, the principle of public obligation.

Major-General Sir Alfred E. Turner, who is presumably not suffering from excessive poverty, thus insulted the workers in the Saturday Review of August 7, 1915:

The strikers gained their ends, and with them an everlasting stain on their reputation, which not all the rain of heaven can wash out—the stain of showing themselves perfectly ready to betray their country for filthy lucre. Compulsory service might not produce loyalty, but it would produce a sense of duty and discipline that would prevent such disgraceful and damaging incidents.

Col. Lee, M.P., wants to conscript life to save money. Cheap soldiers! According to the Times report, he said on August 18, 1915:

Conscription would save an immense amount of money. . . . At present each British soldier costs three times as much as a German, and owing to the necessity of bribing men to enlist we were squandering money at a rate which could only lead us to bankruptcy. The remedy was not fewer soldiers, but less wasteful methods, and those were only possible if we adopted compulsory service.

The Spectator expressed the same sentiment four days before. This is what it said:

The compelled man would, of course, receive the same treatment as regards food, clothing, and so forth as the volunteer, BUT THE SEPARATION ALLOWANCE MUST BE MADE ON A LESS GENEROUS SCALE TO THOSE DEPENDENT ON HIM, and only given where genuine poverty existed. It must neither be automatic nor lavish, and A CONSIDERABLY LARGER PROPORTION OF THE ALLOWANCE SO MADE MUST BE DEDUCTED FROM THE COMPELLED SOLDIERS' PAY.

Col. Sir Augustus Fitzgeorge, son of the Royal Duke of Cambridge, said on August 26, 1915:

COMPULSORY SERVICE WAS NECESSARY AT THIS TIME WHEN THE PEOPLE WERE GETTING OUT OF HAND.

We admire the frankness and honesty of these men. They fight openly, and we can meet them on definite and clearly defined ground. They are out to smash us, and we are out not to be smashed!

And now we will give just two quotations to warn the workers against accepting the "thin end of the wedge." If they give the Conscriptionists a start, it will be difficult to stop them! Lord Roberts said on page 13 of his "Fallacies and Facts":

When the people accept the principle of universal military training there will then be no difficulty in adjusting the details of the scheme.

And Lord Dudley, speaking on Compulsory Training in Australia, said:

He felt sure they would have to increase the length of training. . . . But they were right to go slow. . . . It was tactful and politic not to make the term of service too arduous AT FIRST, and to let it grow.—DAILY CHRONICLE, September 18, 1911.

The Labour Conference has given its first word to the Trade Union smashers. It will do well to stick to its word through thick and thin, and not be turned from it by any nonsense about the necessity of Conscription to win the war. At this stage it is perfectly obvious that if the war cannot be won without Conscription it cannot be won with it!

DANGEROUS SITUATION IN THE COUNTRY.

SOUTH WALES MINERS THREATEN TO STRIKE: CLYDE WORKERS DECIDE ON ACTION.

WILL THE GOVERNMENT TAKE WARNING?

Will Parliament dare to proceed with the Prussianising policy in view of the determined resistance of the organised workers declared in Conference? That is the question.

If such incredible action is taken, if Parliament, in its present state of blind obedience to the militarists among us, ignores that momentous decision, what will the Labour forces do? What will the Clyde workers do? What will the South Wales miners do? Let Parliament, and particularly the Government, give careful attention to the possible results of their proposed legislation.

The Labour movement is not in a mood to suffer those very military tyrannies that so many of its members have gone to fight.

The workers have had experience of the tender and affectionate relation of militarism to Trade Unionism. France has supplied it. It happened not many years ago, and the memory is still green.

The railway workers of that country were provoked into a strike. Our railwaymen have been under the same necessity and will fully sympathise with their French comrades. Yes, but a British strike has more power behind it than a French strike. It has the power of comparatively free men. Frenchmen have the power of Conscription against them.

They came out on strike, and immediately the Government, under M. Briand, the present Premier of France, called to the Colours all the men within the conscript system. They were ordered to go back to their work as soldiers.

gigantic stride forward. The miners, the railwaymen, and the transport workers have formed a working alliance. This Triple Alliance is regarded with grave concern by the employers. They are frightened by it. They realise the power it can wield. They see the workers steadily gaining position after position, and terror is taking possession of their souls.

What is the significance of the determined move towards compulsion when it is considered in the light of that Trade Union development?

It is a sinister significance.

If Conscription were allowed to become the law of the land, the Triple Alliance between the miners, the railwaymen, and the transport workers would be utterly useless. Those three Unions must bear in mind the experience of France.

Labour has said decisively that Conscription shall not become the law of the land, but the fight is not yet over. Parliament has consented to the first reading of the Thin End of the Wedge Bill by a majority of 298.

That is to say, the position at the moment is that the Labour movement is at grips with Parliament. It has to convince that 298 majority that compulsion cannot be enforced because Labour will not have it.

It has only to stand right through the fight [illegible] by the decision, and the fight is won. The two or three hundred Prussian-minded members of Parliament cannot carry the [illegible] and the workers by their unbending attitude may yet help him out.

The Clyde is not a happy hunting ground for Lloyd George and his fellow Compulsionists, but what about South Wales?

Mr. James Winstone, President of the South Wales Miners' Federation, speaking at Pontypool on Sunday, said that the Executive of the Federation had unanimously adopted a resolution of opposition to any form of compulsory military service, and he warned the Government of the danger of a stoppage in the South Wales coalfield, which would have serious consequences to the British Navy. The intensity of Mr. Winstone's feeling can be judged by the fact that he would rather be riddled with bullets than accept Conscription.

The Clyde and South Wales just now are certainly strongholds of liberty, but in England the spirit of freedom will not be killed without a tremendous struggle. That is made unmistakably clear by the decision of many local Labour bodies, typical of which is the Birmingham Trades and Labour Council, representing 70,000 working people. The resolution was very strong. It declared:

That in view of the renewed activity of the Conscriptionists inside and outside the Cabinet and the reported division of the Cabinet in favour of Conscription, this Council, representing 70,000 Birmingham workpeople, reaffirms its unalterable opposition to Conscription. It has closely followed the agitation for [illegible]

Your Part in the Fight!

We are in for the biggest fight in the history of the Labour Movement.

We are up against a powerful conspiracy to "Prussianise" our country.

But we can win if we all do our bit.

We are trying to do ours. Will you do yours?

If you want to take a hand you must be well informed.

That is to say—you must read the Labour Leader, which is leading the fight against Conscription.

revenge upon the workers he has not be able to hoodwink.

There is no doubt about the reasons of the Conscriptionists. They have stated them themselves. Here are some of their democratic opinions!

Lt.-Col. W. H. Maxwell, in the Outlook for September, 1915, said:

> Trade Unionism—that shelter for slinking shirkers—is imperilling our existence, and by its action a rot of our national soul has set in. One remedy, and one alone, can eradicate this state of rot—martial law will cure it.

The Saturday Review of August 21, 1915, was equally blunt:

> National Service is required as much for the effect it will have upon MINERS AND MUNITIONS, as for the part it will play in the actual raising of armies.

The same sentiment found expression in the three years this [illegible] should (sic) have SCOTCHED A STRIKE and quelled a rebellion."

On August 28 again spake the Saturday Review, saying unto us:

> It (Conscription) is not only a question of raising a given number of recruits, but of getting accepted by all citizens, CIVILIAN WORKERS as well as soldiers, the principle of public obligation.

Major-General Sir Alfred E. Turner, who is presumably not suffering from excessive poverty, thus insulted the workers in the Saturday Review of August 7, 1915:

> The strikers gained their ends, and with them an everlasting stain on their reputation, which not all the rain of heaven can wash out—the stain of showing themselves perfectly ready to betray their country for filthy lucre.

[illegible] methods, and those were only possible if we adopted compulsory service.

The Spectator expressed the same sentiment four days before. This is what it said:

> The compelled man would, of course, receive the same treatment as regards food, clothing, and so forth as the volunteer, BUT THE SEPARATION ALLOWANCE MUST BE MADE ON A LESS GENEROUS SCALE TO THOSE DEPENDENT ON HIM, and only given where genuine poverty existed. It must neither be automatic nor lavish, and A CONSIDERABLY LARGER PROPORTION OF THE ALLOWANCE SO MADE MUST BE DEDUCTED FROM THE COMPELLED SOLDIERS' PAY.

Col. Sir Augustus Fitzgeorge, son of the Royal Duke of Cambridge, said on August 26, 1915:

> When the people accept the principle of universal military training there will then be no difficulty in adjusting the details of the scheme.

And Lord Dudley, speaking on Compulsory Training in Australia, said:

> He felt sure they would have to increase the length of training. . . . But they were right to go slow. . . . It was tactful and politic not to make the term of service too arduous AT FIRST, and to let it grow.—DAILY CHRONICLE, September 18, 1911.

The Labour Conference has given its first word to the Trade Union smashers. It will do well to stick to its word through thick and thin, and not be turned from it by any nonsense about the necessity of Conscription to win the war. At this stage it is perfectly obvious that if the war cannot be won without Conscription it cannot be won with it!

DANGEROUS SITUATION IN THE COUNTRY.

SOUTH WALES MINERS THREATEN TO STRIKE: CLYDE WORKERS DECIDE ON ACTION.

WILL THE GOVERNMENT TAKE WARNING?

Will Parliament dare to proceed with the Prussianising policy in view of the determined resistance of the organised workers declared in Conference? That is the question.

If such incredible action is taken, if Parliament, in its present state of blind obedience to the militarists among us, ignores that momentous decision, what will the Labour forces do? What will the Clyde workers do? What will the South Wales miners do? Let Parliament, and particularly the Government, give careful attention to the possible results of their proposed legislation.

The Labour movement is not in a mood to suffer those very military tyrannies that so many of its members have gone to fight.

The workers have had experience of the tender and affectionate relation of militarism to Trade Unionism. France has supplied it. It happened not many years ago, and the memory is still green.

The railway workers of that country were provoked into a strike. Our railwaymen have been under the same necessity and will fully sympathise with their French comrades. Yes, but a British strike has more power behind it than a French strike. It has the power of comparatively free men. Frenchmen have the power of Conscription against them.

They came out on strike, and immediately the Government, under M. Briand, the present Premier of France, called to the Colours all the men within the conscript system. They were ordered to go back to their work as soldiers.

One morning, as railwaymen, they struck to enforce their demands. The next morning, as soldiers, they were compelled, under military law, to run the railways as usual.

They were forced by military tyranny to break their own strike.

They were turned into blacklegs against themselves.

They were trapped into disloyalty to their Trade Unions

All their labour in creating and strengthening the Unions for their own protection was useless because they had not thrown off the grip of the militarists.

AND THAT IS CONSCRIPTION.

Are the British workers expected, under cover of the national difficulty, to place themselves under the same despotism? They would be unworthy Trade Unionists indeed if they did so.

Trade Unionism in Britain has just made a gigantic stride forward. The miners, the railwaymen, and the transport workers have formed a working alliance. This Triple Alliance is regarded with grave concern by the employers. They are frightened by it. They realise the power it can wield. They see the workers steadily gaining position after position, and terror is taking possession of their souls.

What is the significance of the determined move towards compulsion when it is considered in the light of that Trade Union development?

It is a sinister significance.

If Conscription were allowed to become the law of the land, the Triple Alliance between the miners, the railwaymen, and the transport workers would be utterly useless. Those three Unions must bear in mind the experience of France.

Labour has said decisively that Conscription shall not become the law of the land, but the fight is not yet over. Parliament has consented to the first reading of the Thin End of the Wedge Bill by a majority of 298.

That is to say, the position at the moment is that the Labour movement is at grips with Parliament. It has to convince that 298 majority that compulsion cannot be enforced because Labour will not have it.

It has only to stand right through the fight firmly by its decision, and the fight is won. The two or three hundred Prussian-minded members of Parliament cannot coerce the three million workers who have declared their will.

The temper of the Labour movement in the country indicates a solemn determination to give effect to the Conference decision. In Scotland it will be found a difficult business to enforce such a law. The Clyde Workers' Committee, for instance, has sent this resolution round the workshops and shipyards:

> That this delegate meeting of the Clyde Workers' Committee, recognising that the purport of the Conscriptionists is not a fuller supply of soldiers but the cheapening of soldiers and the military control of industry and thus the abolition of the functions of our Trade Unions, resolves to take such action as is necessary to prevent Conscription.

And steps have been taken to make that resolution effective. That is the kind of determination that will kill the Prussians in our midst. Mr. Asquith's speech very strongly suggests that he is not at all happy in his present position, into which he has been manœuvred by those nagging "Prussians," and the workers by their unbending attitude may yet help him out.

The Clyde is not a happy hunting ground for Lloyd George and his fellow Compulsionists, but what about South Wales?

> Mr. James Winstone, President of the South Wales Miners' Federation, speaking at Pontypool on Sunday, said that the Executive of the Federation had unanimously adopted a resolution of opposition to any form of compulsory military service, and he warned the Government of the danger of a stoppage in the South Wales coalfield, which would have serious consequences to the British Navy. The intensity of Mr. Winstone's feeling can be judged by the fact that he would rather be riddled with bullets than accept Conscription.

The Clyde and South Wales just now are certainly strongholds of liberty, but in England the spirit of freedom will not be killed without a tremendous struggle. That is made unmistakably clear by the decision of many local Labour bodies, typical of which is the Birmingham Trades and Labour Council, representing 70,000 working people. The resolution was very strong. It declared:

> That in view of the renewed activity of the Conscriptionists inside and outside the Cabinet and the reported decision of the Cabinet in favour of Conscription, this Council, representing 70,000 Birmingham workpeople, reaffirms its unalterable opposition to Conscription. It has closely followed the agitation for Conscription from the outbreak of the war, and holds the view that the purpose of that agitation has never been directed to securing any national advantage, but has been confessedly pursued for the purpose of smashing the Trade Union movement and undermining the power of the British democracy. We regard the proposed division of the nation's manhood into two parts—viz., married and unmarried—as a trick to divide and diminish the opposition to Conscription by making Conscription appear to be the friend of the married man and winning for it his support. We repudiate such a trick, and pledge ourselves to resist the introduction of this pernicious Prussian principle of Conscription of human life in any and every form to the utmost extent of our power.

The anger which has been aroused throughout the Labour movement, and the powerful and clearly defined opposition, demonstrates at least the absolute failure of the Conscriptionists to secure that general consent which the Prime Minister declared was necessary before the measure could be contemplated.

Will he now withdraw the Bill?

Your Part in the Fight!

We are in for the biggest fight in the history of the Labour Movement.

We are up against a powerful conspiracy to "Prussianise" our country.

But we can win if we all do our bit.

We are trying to do ours. Will you do yours?

If you want to take a hand you must be well informed.

That is to say—you must read the Labour Leader, which is leading the fight against Conscription.

And you must see that your friends read it. ALL of them.

BUY THE

LABOUR LEADER,

EACH THURSDAY,

Get your friend to buy it; help it and advertise it.

The gain will be yours.

The "LABOUR LEADER" is published each Thursday, price 1d., and it can be obtained from any Newsagent, or from the Publisher, "Labour Leader," 30, Blackfriars Street, Manchester.

Printed and Published by THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS, LTD., at 30, Blackfriars Street, Manchester; London Depôt: St. Bride's House, Salisbury Square, Fleet Street, E.C., by Trade Union Labour. Entered at the New York Post Office as second-class matter.

679/26

BRITISH CITIZEN.

EDITED BY S. MORTIMER HOLDEN. — THE WEEK'S OPINIONS OF LEADING MEN AND WOMEN.

NO. 5. LONDON, SATURDAY, JAN. 8, 1916. ONE PENNY.

Delegates Vote Against Conscription and save your Trade Unions.

S. MORTIMER HOLDEN

The duty of delegates attending the Labour Conference in London on Conscription is to vote against the Conscription Bills and save their Trade Unions from Aristocratic annihilation.

There was really no necessity for the Conference because the great Trade Union Congress at Bristol in September unanimously passed a resolution against Conscription. And it must be distinctly understood that the Labour Conference at Westminster this week is not a Conference of the Trade Union Congress. It is a conference of those Trade Unions only who support the running of Labour M.P.'s. of representatives of the Fabian Society and of some Women Trade Union representatives. The great Miners' Federation of Great Britain, for example, consisting of nearly a million miners will not be represented. As this Trade Union can carry any Congress by its numbers the result of the Conference this week although it will—nay it must go—against the Conscription Bill will not have the weight of the miners vote. That vote, as is already known, is against Conscription so all that the Conference has to do is to follow the miners. Whether they do so or not the miners will not have Conscription.

There is no new phase to be considered. What the delegates ought to do is therefore, to re-affirm the decision of the Trade Union Congress and declare with a voice of thunder that they will not agree to Conscription, and that they mean to save their Trade Unions from this Northcliffe Press attack to destroy them, that they mean to preserve Individual Liberty and to respect the conscientious objections of those who refuse to be compelled to enlist.

No matter how moderate and in whatever form the Conscription Bill is passed it must be resisted to the uttermost.

All delegates will no doubt be deeply impressed by the able, forcible and unanswerable arguments against Conscription by Professor Arnold Lupton, M P. 190-10, a noble fighter for the People's Freedom and for liberty of Conscience. Delegates, follow Mr. Arnold Lupton, follow Sir John Simon, follow Dr Clifford follow John Burns, follow John Morley, follow your already vehement resolution against Conscription and urge your Labour M.P.'s to vote against the Con-

Why we should not have CONSCRIPTION!

by Professor Arnold Lupton. M.P. 1906-10.

MILITARY AND NAVAL FORCES.

MARRIED OR SINGLE.

CONSCRIPTS OR VOLUNTEERS.

WHICH AND WHY?

In the month of May, 1914, the establishment of our Army and Navy including Reserves and Territorials exceeded one million men. (This was excluding Native Troops and British Volunteers in India.) Since that time, and up till Christmas, 1915, Parliament has voted an additional 3,000,000 men for the Army and an additional 100,000 men for the Navy. Therefore, the present Forces of the United Kingdom are about 4,111,000. If to that number we add 300,000 killed and missing, we have the total number sanctioned by Parliament—4,411,000. In addition we have in the United Kingdom about 300,000 well-trained Volunteers over 40 years of age, only requiring weapons and ammunition to make an efficient force for Home Defence, making a total of 4,711,000.

In addition to these figures are the Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and African Troops, say 500,000; the Indian Volunteers, mostly European—40,000, and the Native Indian Troops, say 200,000, to which we may add, say 50,000 killed and missing.

These figures give us a total number of 5,501,000 fighting men of which at the present time, after deducting killed and missing, we have left 5,151,000.

Out of this total the United Kingdom has supplied 4,711,000. This is not merely those who have volunteered, but those who have been accepted, passed the medical examination, finally retained and actually used for military service. The above figures are given on the assumption that enough men, married and single, have volunteered to supply the last million voted by Parliament.

The total population of the United Kingdom in July, 1914, was 47½ millions.

Those who have studied the question state that the maximum number or men that a country can afford for the fighting services, having due regard to the production of munitions, is one-tenth of the total population. Therefore, the maximum number that this country can advantageously afford to put into the fighting services is 4,750,000, that is to say, we might supply this number if the civilian part of the population had no other duties to perform than to maintain that fighting force, but it is well known that the people of the United Kingdom have to supply the Allies with enormous sums of taking another million of men from the Dominions if they are willing to come but the United Kingdom has already done its full share.

It follows from the above statement that to raise additional men, either by Conscription or Voluntary Enlistment in the United Kingdom will be disastrous and instead of helping, will hinder the victory of the Allies.

Our way to victory, now as 100 years ago, is to find money, guns, ammunition and clothing, for the ten million Russian soldiers who are still waiting for this equipment.

The Conscriptionists have however invented the ingenious plan of dividing the Volunteers into two classes, married and unmarried, and they have said that the married men are not to be taken into the fighting force until all the unmarried men have either volunteered or been driven by force into the Army.

This plan does credit to their ingenuity, because every person acquainted with the working classes of the United Kingdom knows that the more capable and vigorous part marry young, and that therefore, the vast majority of the men suitable for the Army are married men, and that a very large proportion of the unmarried men are unsuitable for the Army.

Under Lord Derby's scheme of enlistment, the idea was adopted of "starring" a large part of the more capable bachelors, such as farmer's sons, so that they should not be even canvassed or asked to enlist, and in this way, the number of bachelors who are not enlisted or attested should be increased to such a figure as to enable them to say that an important proportion of young unmarried men have not volunteered.

The case for Conscription having entirely broken down, the advocates of this system have skilfully engineered a scheme by which to bring it in on this side issue, their object being by hook or crook to get their favourite plan of White Slavery on to the Statute Book.

In former years, when we required only a small army for foreign service, it was quite reasonable to take bachelors, and so save the nation the cost of maintaining the wives and children of soldiers. There was every probability that 90 per cent. of the men enlisting would return to civil life and be able to marry and raise children.

But the present war is very different. The Under-Secretary for War, speaking in Parliament on the 22nd December, 1915, said "15 per cent. per month is the wastage at the Front." That is to say, that if there are 105 men maintained at the Front in the course of seven months 105 other men must be supplied to maintain that number, but out of this 105 new men, about one half will be men recovered from wounds or illness, so that the actual number of entirely new men

Citizen Diary

London, January 8th, 1916.

"To save Mr. Asquith's face because he gave a pledge to the married men which he had no right to make the whole nation have to be stampeded into Conscription and rushed into slavery" exclaimed Councillor Kneeshaw to the Birmingham Trades Council who representing seventy thousand workers passed a resolution against Conscription.

"Since when have politicians pledges or even Prime Ministers pledges become so sacred that the nation should be stampeded into slavery in order that a pledge should be kept?"

Such is the voice of the workers of Birmingham seventy thousand strong. and their voice is the voice of three million more Trade Unionists throughout the country.

"The Nation" the sixpenny Liberal weekly, alone of the Liberal papers has held fast to the faith and resists Conscription to the uttermost.

"The Nation" followed the line of the "British Citizen" last week and blamed Mr. Lloyd George for the Cabinet acceptance of Conscription and practically declared that the Liberal members of Parliament had lost political confidence in him. "The Nation" also said the Liberal Cabinet ministers owing to the acceptance of Conscription and the throwing over of the cardinal principle of Liberalism, had ended the career of the Liberal Party and a new Party would have to be created.

That new Party has already been created in the establishment of the "British Citizen Party" which has been fighting by public meeting, literature and propoganda since the Northcliffe Campaign for six months, and whose programme for the legalising of equal pay for men and women at not less than thirty shillings a week and the right to work, and the limitation of profits will be acceptable to all.

Mr. Lloyd George and all who support the Conscription Bill should no longer be admitted to any Democratic Party.

The "Labour" M.P.'s who support Conscription will no longer have a place in the movement for Human Liberty and Economic Freedom.

The latest development is that the Conscription Bill is to force all single men and widowers from 18 to 41 to enlist.

Why did the Government send out a whip to attend the House of Commons on Wednesday when the Conscription Bill will be introduced and add that a division may be taken? Was it to take a Division on the Wednesday order to anticipate the Labour Conference on Thursday?

Mr. Asquith, with regret as he said, admitting the Tories into the Cabinet. He did so to the dissatisfaction of the Liberal Party. Now he finds that the Tories supported by Mr. Lloyd George have overpowered him and are forcing Conscription on the people.

All honour to Sir John Simon for relinquishing his seat in the Cabinet rather than precipitate the people into the slavery abyss of Conscription. We look to him to lead the campaign against its imposition. Let Mr. McKenna and Mr Runciman follow suit and a nation will understood that the Labour Conference at Westminster this week is not a Conference of the Trade Union Congress. It is a conference of those Trade Unions only who support the running of Labour M.P.'s, of representatives of the Fabian Society and of some Women Trade Union representatives. The great Miners' Federation of Great Britain, for example, consisting of nearly a million miners will not be represented. As this Trade Union can carry any Congress by its numbers the result of the Conference this week although it will—nay it must go—against the Conscription Bill will not have the weight of the miners vote. That vote, as is already known, is against Conscription so all that the Conference has to do is to follow the miners. Whether they do so or not the miners will not have Conscription.

There is no new phase to be considered. What the delegates ought to do is therefore, to re-affirm the decision of the Trade Union Congress and declare with a voice of thunder that they will not agree to Conscription, and that they mean to save their Trade Unions from this Northcliffe Press attack to destroy them, that they mean to preserve Individual Liberty and to respect the conscientious objections of those who refuse to be compelled to enlist.

No matter how moderate and in whatever form the Conscription Bill is passed it must be resisted to the uttermost.

All delegates will no doubt be deeply impressed by the able, forcible and unanswerable arguments against Conscription by Professor Arnold Lupton, M P. 190-10, a noble fighter for the People's Freedom and for liberty of Conscience. Delegates, follow Mr. Arnold Lupton, follow Sir John Simon, follow Dr Clifford follow John Burns, follow John Morley, follow your already vehement resolution against Conscription and urge your Labour M.P.'s to vote against the Conscription Bill and your Trade Union members to resist it.

We are hoping that Sir John Simon will lead the attack on the Conscription Bill in the House of Commons and that Mr. Hobhouse, and other Liberals followed by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, Mr. Philip Snowden, Mr. Whitehouse, Mr. C. P. Trevelyan, Mr. Denman, Mr. Ponsonby, Sir Wm. P. Byles, Mr. John Redmand, and the whole Irish members will fight the Conscription Bill to the death. Let them fight as Charles Bradlough did for Liberty of Conscience and as the Irish Members did against coercion and be carried out rather than yield to the measures for the enslavement of the people.

No matter whether the Conscription Bill is forced through Parliament or not so long as the Trade Unions hold fast to their faith the three million Trade Unionists opposed to Conscription will have to be reckoned with.

WHICH AND WHY?

In the month of May, 1914, the establishment of our Army and Navy including Reserves and Territorials exceeded one million men. (This was excluding Native Troops and British Volunteers in India.) Since that time, and up till Christmas, 1915, Parliament has voted an additional 3,000,000 men for the Army and an additional 100,000 men for the Navy. Therefore, the present Forces of the United Kingdom are about 4,111,000. If to that number we add 300,000 killed and missing, we have the total number sanctioned by Parliament—4,411,000. In addition we have in the United Kingdom about 300,000 well-trained Volunteers over 40 years of age, only requiring weapons and ammunition to make an efficient force for Home Defence, making a total of 4,711,000.

In addition to these figures are the Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and African Troops, say 500,000; the Indian Volunteers, mostly European—40,000, and the Native Indian Troops, say 200,000, to which we may add, say 50,000 killed and missing.

These figures give us a total number of 5,501,000 fighting men of which at the present time, after deducting killed and missing, we have left 5,151,000.

Out of this total the United Kingdom has supplied 4,741,000. This is not merely those who have volunteered, but those who have been accepted, passed the medical examination, finally retained and actually used for military service. The above figures are given on the assumption that enough men, married and single, have volunteered to supply the last million voted by Parliament.

The total population of the United Kingdom in July, 1914, was 47½ millions.

Those who have studied the question state that the maximum number or men that a country can afford for the fighting services, having due regard to the production of munitions, is one-tenth of the total population. Therefore, the maximum number that this country can advantageously afford to put into the fighting services is 4,750,000, that is to say, we might supply this number if the civilian part of the population had no other duties to perform than to maintain that fighting force, but it is well known that the people of the United Kingdom have to supply the Allies with enormous sums of money with which to provide munitions, and also to maintain a huge fleet of transports and mine-sweepers.

From these figures it is evident that the country has already supplied the fighting services with as many men as it is wise to take from other necessary occupations.

Our Colonial population of European blood in July, 1914 was as follows:—

Canada and Newfoundland	...8,200,000
Australia and New Zealand	...6,100,000
Africa, India, the Indies, etc.	1,700,000
Total	16,000,000

Therefore, the contribution of the Colonies to the War, if on the same ratio as that of the United Kingdom, should be 1,500,000.

I do not know the actual number yet supplied or in process of supply, but I think 500,000 is a liberal estimate. Therefore, there still remains the possibility

Our way to victory, now as 100 years ago, is to find money, guns, ammunition and clothing, for the ten million Russian soldiers who are still waiting for this equipment.

The Conscriptionists have however invented the ingenious plan of dividing the Volunteers into two classes, married and unmarried, and they have said that the married men are not to be taken into the fighting force until all the unmarried men have either volunteered or been driven by force into the Army.

This plan does credit to their ingenuity, because every person acquainted with the working classes of the United Kingdom knows that the more capable and vigorous part marry young, and that therefore, the vast majority of the men suitable for the Army are married men, and that a very large proportion of the unmarried men are unsuitable for the Army.

Under Lord Derby's scheme of enlistment, the idea was a kind of "starring" a large part of the more capable bachelors, such as farmer's sons, so that they should not be even canvassed or asked to enlist, and in this way, the number of bachelors who are not enlisted or attested should be increased to such a figure as to enable them to say that an important proportion of young unmarried men have not volunteered.

The case for Conscription having entirely broken down, the advocates of this system have skilfully engineered a scheme by which to bring it in on this side issue, their object being by hook or crook to get their favourite plan of White Slavery on to the Statute Book.

In former years, when we required only a small army for foreign service, it was quite reasonable to take bachelors, and so save the nation the cost of maintaining the wives and children of soldiers. There was every probability that 90 per cent. of the men enlisting would return to civil life and be able to marry and raise children.

But the present war is very different. The Under-Secretary for War, speaking in Parliament on the 22nd December, 1915, said "15 per cent. per month is the wastage at the Front." That is to say, that if there are 105 men maintained at the Front in the course of seven months 105 other men must be supplied to maintain that number, but out of this 105 new men, about one half will be men recovered from wounds or illness, so that the actual number of entirely new men required is, say, 50 men for every 100 in the trenches in seven months, and from that one may argue that if the war continues for fourteen months, every 100 men maintained at the Front will be all that remain out of 200 supplied. The 100 which no longer exists in the Army will be represented by, say 50 dead men and 50 permanently disabled.

The question therefore arises, how far the Government of this country is justified in sending millions of young unmarried men to destruction, having regard to the fact that they leave behind them no children, no heirs of their undying fame, no means of maintaining the greatness of the British race, that to the extent to which these young bachelors are sacrificed, it is not merely their young lives that are lost, but the future of the British Empire and the British race, which is to that extent injured and weakened.

(Continued on page 5.)

non more Trade Unionists throughout the country.

"The Nation" the sixpenny Liberal weekly, alone of the Liberal papers has held fast to the faith and resists Conscription to the uttermost.

"The Nation" followed the line of the "British Citizen" last week and blamed Mr. Lloyd George for the Cabinet acceptance of Conscription and practically declared that the Liberal members of Parliament had lost political confidence in him. "The Nation" also said the Liberal Cabinet ministers owing to the acceptance of Conscription and the throwing over of the cardinal principle of Liberalism, had ended the career of the Liberal Party and a new Party would have to be created.

That new Party has already been created in the establishment of the "British Citizen Party" which has been fighting by public meeting, literature and propoganda since the Northcliffe Campaign for six months, and whose programme for the legalising of equal pay for men and women at not less than thirty shillings a week and the right to work, and the limitation of profits will be acceptable to all.

Mr. Lloyd George and all who support the Conscription Bill should no longer be admitted to any Democratic Party.

The "Labour" M.P.'s who support Conscription will no longer have a place in the movement for Human Liberty and Economic Freedom.

The latest development is that the Conscription Bill is to force all single men and widowers from 18 to 41 to enlist.

Why did the Government send out a whip to attend the House of Commons on Wednesday when the Conscription Bill will be introduced and add that a division may be taken? Was it to take a Division on the Wednesday order to anticipate the Labour Conference on Thursday?

Mr. Asquith, with regret as he said, admitting the Tories into the Cabinet. He did so to the dissatisfaction of the Liberal Party. Now he finds that the Tories supported by Mr. Lloyd George have overpowered him and are forcing Conscription on the people.

All honour to Sir John Simon for relinquishing his seat in the Cabinet rather than precipitate the people into the slavery abyss of Conscription. We look to him to lead the campaign against its imposition. Let Mr. McKenna and Mr Runciman follow suit and a nation will bless them.

In order to try and pacify the Irish the Cabinet have decided to exclude Ireland from the Conscription Bill. But it will not avail. The Irish Party as witnessed Mr. John Dillon's onslaught on Conscription in another column, have already decided that it is dangerous for the safety of Irish Home Rule to allow Conscription for England, Wales and Scotland and they will oppose it. They will oppose it on other funds—that the Trade Unions and English Scottish and Welsh Democracy have always supported the Irish Home Hule cause and been the friends of Ireland. And Ireland will stand by their English comrades now in resisting Conscription.

Professor Arnold Lupton's slashing onslaught on Conscription in to-day's "Citizen" will convince anyone in doubt as to the course they should take on Conscription.

S. M. H.

679/27

THE AWFUL MISERY OF THE SERBIAN RETREAT.

GRAPHIC DESCRIPTION BY A LADY.

Twenty-two more of the plucky British women, whose retreat from the heart of Serbia forms one of the most thrilling episodes in the story of the nursing service, reached London recently. By mountain and torrent, through blizzard and abysmal mud and days of drenching rain, sleeping often by the wayside, with rations running short and clothes in tatters, they made the great trek of nearly 300 miles in seven weeks—and made it smiling.

One of the cheeriest spirits in the party, which belonged to the Stobart Hospital, was Mrs. W. H. Aldridge, wife of the well-known secretary of the National Housing Council, and herself for ten years secretary of the Manchester and Salford Women's Trade Union Council. She is an open-air woman, with the grit of a British Tommy—and his soft heart, too. Only women of that stamp can come through the fire of such an adventure unscathed.

Fresh from the journey, with her war-worn camp kit cumbering the passage outside, she drew for "The Daily News" some word vignettes of scenes by the way.

WEARY SOLDIERS.

"It had been a drenching night, and we set out in our kolas (ox-wagons) without breakfast owing to the impossibility of making a fire. Then the rain turned to snow, driven before a gale. By mid-day we were in trouble: two of the string of 30 kolas—one for each of us—stuck, turned over, and had to be abandoned. So two of the others 'took lodgers,' which was a tight fit but kept one cheerful.

"Again and again we passed refugees sheltering in their wagons. The oxen had dropped in their tracks and lay dying in the snow. Parties of soldiers dragged themselves along. In some places scores of rifles were being covered up by the flakes.

"That night we slept—or rested—thirty in one small room at Pristina.

"Next day we saw some of the things the blizzard had done. In a few hours we passed five corpses. They were lying where they had fallen—generally with upturned faces. Nobody touched them. Passers-by just stepped over a body, or drove round it if it was lying right in the track."

Earlier in the trek, between Rashka and Mitrovitza, a painful sight was the hundreds of dead or dying animals that strewed the roadside. When a starved horse or bullock or sheep fell in the clinging mud the peasantry left it to its fate, and the chances were that some of those who came after would take the best part of the carcass for food.

PRISONERS' PLIGHT.

"Our people were afraid to touch the meat offered them for that reason," said Mrs. Aldridge. "There was plenty of it—though very little bread—but the holes in the flayed or half-flayed carcases we were continually passing reminded one to forcibly of the way in which it might have been obtained. Most of the people one saw they were nearly all men, for the women were staying behind to try and keep the homes together were carrying lumps of raw meat. They scorched and gnawed them when they came to the first handy fire.

"It was dreadful to see the Austrian sad Irish songs.

"Then we inspanned, and by and by came out by a pass upon a wonderful prospect of the Montenegrin mountains. Everything was drenched with the clearest silver moonlight. And as we stood there one of the girls said: 'It seems like being in eternity—no time or space.' That was how one felt after going through the Valley of the Shadow in Serbia."

THE GREATEST JOY OF ALL.

A roundabout route to Ipek had to be followed in order to escape the Bulgarian army that was now sweeping rapidly down upon Monastir, which had been the party's original objective. At Ipek the oxen and wagons were sold or exchanged for ponies, and with 15 of these half-starved creatures—for there was no corn, only a little hay to feed them on—the nurse pushed on through the Montenegrin Highlands towards the Albanian frontier.

At Scutari, after seven weeks of constant travel, came the greatest joy of all —"lots of hay that we simply burrowed in, and a hot meal of soup and potatoes actually prepared for us and English marines—the last down from Belgrade, with great beards that they hated and a rich Cockney accent that we simply loved. They had had a fearful time of it, fighting by day and marching by night."

Unfortunately the party sustained two casualties. Miss Clifton, belonging to the Serbian Relief, was wounded by a stray bullet in a dispute between Serbian soldiers and peasants, and one Scottish nurse was killed in a disaster in a flooded river, when 20 motor-cars had to be abandoned.

One of the interesting pieces of news brought back by Mrs Aldridge is that Mrs. Stobart was safe and well with a contingent of the Serbian army at Ipek rather more than a fortnight ago. Considerable anxiety as to her fate had been felt in this country.

THREATENED TITLES.

LOSSES OF THE PEERAGE IN THE WAR.

Mournful interest attaches to the 1916 edition of "Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, and Companionage," which has just been issued by Messrs. Dean and Son (Limited).

"Sixteen months of war have wrought sad changes in very many of the families referred to in 'Debrett,' says Mr. A. G. M. Hesilrige, the editor, who estimates that the number of peers and sons of present or former peers who are actively serving in the naval or military forces of the Crown now considerably exceeds a thousand.

The roll of honour of those who have fallen on the battlefield or died of wounds amounts to 800, and an analysis shows that it contains the names of one member of the Royal Family—Prince Maurice of Battenberg—six peers, 16 baronets, six knights, and seven M.P.'s no fewer than 164 Companions of various Orders, 95 sons of peers, 82 sons of baronets, and 84 sons of knights. Lord Desborough, Sir George Dashwood, Sir H. E. St. Lawrence Clarke and Sir Lulham Pound have each lost two sons. In the list, too, are 81 heirs to hereditary titles, and Mr. Hesilrige finds that, as an immediate result of the war, either the succession has been unduly precipitated or the normal descent has been

THAT INSIDIOUS ENEMY WINTER.

"I have just returned from Italy, where I visited some of the zones of war and many of the hospitals" says Annie Vivanti Chartres in a letter to the "Daily News." "The Italian soldiers, fighting magnificently on the dizzy heights of the Alps, fear one foe and one only—the cold, the biting, torturing cold which assails them in those icy trenches 10,000ft. above the sea.

Many of the Bersaglieri and infantry hail from the sunny south, from Naples and Cicily, and had never beheld a flake of snow. Now they stand hip-deep in it; they sleep in it; they die in it, and all the fire of their ardent souls, all the glow of their enthusiasm, cannot vanquish this truculent and insidious enemy, cannot warm the blood slowly freezing in their veins or stop the gangrene stealing up into their tortured limbs. There is not enough wool in Italy to clothe them as they should be clothed. Every Sunday and on many week-days for months past huge carts have driven slowly through the streets of every town and the cry for wool—"lana, lana"—is raised by the people and by Boy Scouts beating drums. Then windows open and all who have a woollen garment to spare a shawl, a fur wrap, a pair of socks, a jersey—throw it into the cart or into the outspread sheets held under their windows by the Scouts.

"Wool, wool." The Italians have given what they had—their coats, their blankets, their furs—and still half-empty carts pass and the cry of the freezing soldiers is brought home to them in the call of "lana, lana," and in the dull roll of the drum.

Some time ago a noble woman, Signora Majno, suggested that all her compatriots should give up one of the wool mattresses hitherto considered indispensable to every Italian bed. No sooner said than done. The wool speedily woven was transformed into garments for the troops. Most people gave not only one of their mattresses but both, and now they sleep—all the sounder perhaps—on chilly "crine vegetale," or crackly leaves of maize. But the deadly cold on the Alpine heights increases day by day, and many hundreds of Italian soldiers in the thin grey-green uniforms that looked so well when their wearers started out in the warm sunshine of an Italian spring are brought back into the hospitals with their feet frozen, their joints actually breaking off bit by bit, their hands crumbling away, and gangrene eating its way along their maimed and tortured limbs. There they lie, those sad and broken men, sullen and silent amid their cheerful wounded companions, envying them, ashamed of their corroded bodies which shot and shrapnel have spared. They turn their ghastly faces aside when you pause by their bed. They do not answer when unwittingly you ask them of their wounds. "Not wounded frozen," murmurs the nurse, turning sadly away, and you follow quickly, dreading to meet the misery in the dull, despairing eyes of those who are "not wounded frozen."

Will anyone who reads this while sitting by a comfortable fire or travelling [illegible]

PRIMATE AND THE WAR.

NO FLAGGING OR DOUBTING.

Preaching at Canterbury Cathedral from the text, "In your patience ye shall win your souls," the Archbishop of Canterbury said: "This Christmas carries in every land a note of wide and deep disquiet, and of almost unbearable strain. In our own land, nay surely in every Christian land, the high festival is overhung with a dark cloud, a sort of indefinable disquiet, as the war circle widens and the issue, any definite issue and result, seems to recede back and back. We ordinary people have learned in these months, wherein it has been worked out with pitiless and unbending thoroughness, what war in plain prose really means. Yet there is not among us, so far as I know or believe, the very smallest flagging in our high and stern resolve that the cause which we believe in our hearts to be that of righteousness and honour and truth shall, God helping us, go forward to ultimate victory. Nor is there any real doubt that the strife must and shall lead to that issue for the whole world's good.

"We are coming to think with increase of awe what is the fearfulness of sacrifice in country after country which that end seems to require, but we shall face it unflinchingly with brows set firm and lips compressed and mental muscles taut. There will be no flagging or doubting. Of that I think we can be sure. Is it too much to hope that every one of us is trying to find out in what way he or she can make some additional sacrifice of self or leisure or money towards the common good? Make the most of every opporunity given you for unselfish work and for cheering the lives of others. And then—I tell it you in Christ's name —'In your patience ye shall win your souls.'

"A week hence the whole nation is solemnly invited to join in the offering of ourselves to the willing service of Him who enlisted us. We must one and all, in the remaining days of this year, be preparing for that solemn act with which the New Year is to begin—nothing less than the rededication to Him of our life as it is in the firm belief that He will pardon and mend and strengthen us. We brace ourselves anew, soldiers and civilians at home and abroad, to discharge the trust of so arming and so fighting either necessary or possible in years to come—so fighting and so conquering as to establish hereafter among the nations of the earth a simpler life, a simpler faith, a firmer fellowship, an enduring peace."

BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK AND SOCIAL QUESTIONS.

The Bishop of Southwark, at Southwark Cathedral, said we could this year and last year, perhaps, with a deeper and richer meaning than we had ever known before, pass from lip to lip the Christmas greeting, the joy of the Christmas certainty, that nothing could take from us but our own blindness and wilfulness, the peace which passeth all understanding. When duties and interests conflicted, and when motives be-his soft heart, too. Only women of that stamp can come through the fire of such an adventure unscathed.

Fresh from the journey, with her war-worn camp kit cumbering the passage outside, she drew for "The Daily News" some word vignettes of scenes by the way.

WEARY SOLDIERS.

"It had been a drenching night, and we set out in our kolas (ox-wagons) without breakfast owing to the impossibility of making a fire. Then the rain turned to snow, driven before a gale. By mid-day we were in trouble: two of the string of 30 kolas—one for each of us—stuck, turned over, and had to be abandoned. So two of the others, 'took lodgers,' which was a tight fit but kept one cheerful.

"Again and again we passed refugees sheltering in their wagons. The oxen had dropped in their tracks and lay dying in the snow. Parties of soldiers dragged themselves along. In some places scores of rifles were being covered up by the flakes.

"That night we slept—or rested—thirty in one small room at Pristina.

"Next day we saw some of the things the blizzard had done. In a few hours we passed five corpses. They were lying where they had fallen—generally with upturned faces. Nobody touched them. Passers-by just stepped over a body, or drove round it if it was lying right in the track."

Earlier in the trek, between Rashka and Mitrovitza, a painful sight was the hundreds of dead or dying animals that strewed the roadside. When a starved horse or bullock or sheep fell in the clinging mud the peasantry left it to its fate, and the chances were that some of those who came after would take the best part of the carcass for food.

PRISONERS' PLIGHT.

"Our people were afraid to touch the meat offered them for that reason," said Mrs. Aldridge. "There was plenty of it—though very little bread—but the holes in the flayed or half-flayed carcases we were continually passing reminded one to forcibly of the way in which it might have been obtained. Most of the people one saw—they were nearly all men, for the women were staying behind to try and keep the homes together—were carrying lumps of raw meat. They scorched and gnawed them when they came to the first handy fire.

"It was dreadful to see the Austrian prisoners searching for food, or imploring passers-by for a bit of soldiers' biscuit. They were given what could be spared, but it was not enough to keep life in them. And then there were the convicts from the Serbian prisons—men in chains, hardly able to drag one foot before another through the deep deep mud!"

Here is a more cheerful picture:

"On the road from Prizrend to Ipek we outspanned one beautiful moonlight by the roadside and made a jolly fire. Then one of the Serbian orderlies who were with us brought out some sort of rude bagpipes and played strange melancholy music while the others, linked together, swayed backwards and forwards in a slow rhythmic dance. And some of the nurses from Ireland sang an, and a hot meal of soup and potatoes actually prepared for us and English marines—the last down from Belgrade, with great beards that they hated and a rich Cockney accent that we simply loved. They had had a fearful time of it, fighting by day and marching by night."

Unfortunately the party sustained two casualties. Miss Clifton, belonging to the Serbian Relief, was wounded by a stray bullet in a dispute between Serbian soldiers and peasants, and one Scottish nurse was killed in a disaster in a flooded river, when 20 motor-cars had to be abandoned.

One of the interesting pieces of news brought back by Mrs Aldridge is that Mrs. Stobart was safe and well with a contingent of the Serbian army at Ipek rather more than a fortnight ago. Considerable anxiety as to her fate had been felt in this country.

THREATENED TITLES.

LOSSES OF THE PEERAGE IN THE WAR.

Mournful interest attaches to the 1916 edition of "Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, and Companionage," which has just been issued by Messrs. Dean and Son (Limited).

"Sixteen months of war have wrought sad changes in very many of the families referred to in 'Debrett,' says Mr. A. G. M. Hesilrige, the editor, who estimates that the number of peers and sons of present or former peers who are actively serving in the naval or military forces of the Crown now considerably exceeds a thousand.

The roll of honour of those who have fallen on the battlefield or died of wounds amounts to 800, and an analysis shows that it contains the names of one member of the Royal Family—Prince Maurice of Battenberg—six peers, 16 baronets, six knights, and seven M.P.'s no fewer than 164 Companions of various Orders, 95 sons of peers, 82 sons of baronets, and 84 sons of knights. Lord Desborough, Sir George Dashwood, Sir H. E. St. Lawrence Clarke and Sir Lulham Pound have each lost two sons. In the list, too, are 81 heirs to hereditary titles, and Mr. Hesilrige finds that, as an immediate result of the war, either the succession has been unduly precipitated or the normal descent has been changed in over 100 instances.

In several cases the peerage, or baronetcy, being now without heir in remainder, is threatened with extinction unless the Royal Prerogative is exercised in their favour. Among titles so affected are the Marquisate of Lincolnshire, the Baronies of Knaresborough, Playfair, Ribblesdale, Rosmead, and Stamfordham.

"Dod's Peerage" for 1916—the 76th issue—also gives a list of officers whose names appeared in the 1915 issue and who have lost their lives in the war. There are 435 names in the list—eight peers and 79 peers' sons being included. The peers are Lord Hawarden, Lord Brabourne, Lord Annesley, Lord de Freyne, Lord Vernon, Lord Congleton, Lord Kesteven, and Lord Seafield.

freezing in their veins or stop the gangrene stealing up into their tortured limbs. There is not enough wool in Italy to clothe them as they should be clothed. Every Sunday and on many week-days for months past huge carts have driven slowly through the streets of every town and the cry for wool—"lana, lana"—is raised by the people and by Boy Scouts beating drums. Then windows open and all who have a woollen garment to spare a shawl, a fur wrap, a pair of socks, a jersey—throw it into the cart or into the outspread sheets held under their windows by the Scouts.

"Wool, wool." The Italians have given what they had—their coats, their blankets, their furs—and still half-empty carts pass and the cry of the freezing soldiers is brought home to them in the call of "lana, lana," and in the dull roll of the drum.

Some time ago a noble woman, Signora Majno, suggested that all her compatriots should give up one of the wool mattresses hitherto considered indispensable to every Italian bed. No sooner said than done. The wool speedily woven was transformed into garments for the troops. Most people gave not only one of their mattresses but both, and now they sleep—all the sounder perhaps—on chilly "crine vegetale," or crackly leaves of maize. But the deadly cold on the Alpine heights increases day by day, and many hundreds of Italian soldiers in the thin grey-green uniforms that looked so well when their wearers started out in the warm sunshine of an Italian spring are brought back into the hospitals with their feet frozen, their joints actually breaking off bit by bit, their hands crumbling away, and gangrene eating its way along their maimed and tortured limbs. There they lie, those sad and broken men, sullen and silent amid their cheerful wounded companions, envying them, ashamed of their corroded bodies which shot and shrapnel have spared. They turn their ghastly faces aside when you pause by their bed. They do not answer when unwittingly you ask them of their wounds. "Not wounded—frozen," murmurs the nurse, turning sadly away, and you follow quickly, dreading to meet the misery in the dull, despairing eyes of those who are "not wounded—frozen."

Will anyone who reads this while sitting by a comfortable fire or travelling snugly wrapped in a warm coat send some fur or woollen garment—fur used or unused and wool in any shape or form (cardigans, shirts, vests, helmets, socks, gloves, belts or blankets) to the Italian Hospital, Queen's square, or to the house of Countess Greppi, 23, Lancaster gate. Each and every gift will be received and acknowledged with the deepest gratitude and immediately be forwarded to our allies fighting their way through the icy winds of the Carso, following over the snow drifts the tricolour with the cross. Surely those who have ever enjoyed Italian sunshine will to-day in their turn thus warm the heart of Italy through her valiant soldier sons. Surely Britain, the befriender of all who suffer, will help to free from its ice-bound fetters the white cross of Savoy.

know or believe, the very smallest flagging in our high and stern resolve that the cause which we believe in our hearts to be that of righteousness and honour and truth shall, God helping us, go forward to ultimate victory. Nor is there any real doubt that the strife must and shall lead to that issue for the whole world's good.

"We are coming to think with increase of awe what is the fearfulness of sacrifice in country after country which that end seems to require, but we shall face it unflinchingly with brows set firm and lips compressed and mental muscles taut. There will be no flagging or doubting. Of that I think we can be sure. Is it too much to hope that every one of us is trying to find out in what way he or she can make some additional sacrifice of self or leisure or money towards the common good? Make the most of every opporunity given you for unselfish work and for cheering the lives of others. And then—I tell it you in Christ's name—'In your patience ye shall win your souls.'

"A week hence the whole nation is solemnly invited to join in the offering of ourselves to the willing service of Him who enlisted us. We must one and all, in the remaining days of this year, be preparing for that solemn act with which the New Year is to begin—nothing less than the rededication to Him of our life as it is in the firm belief that He will pardon and mend and strengthen us. We brace ourselves anew, soldiers and civilians at home and abroad, to discharge the trust of so arming and so fighting either necessary or possible in years to come—so fighting and so conquering as to establish hereafter among the nations of the earth a simpler life, a simpler faith, a firmer fellowship, an enduring peace."

BISHOP OF SOUTHWARK AND SOCIAL QUESTIONS.

The Bishop of Southwark, at Southwark Cathedral, said we could this year and last year, perhaps, with a deeper and richer meaning than we had ever known before, pass from lip to lip the Christmas greeting, the joy of the Christmas certainty, that nothing could take from us but our own blindness and wilfulness, the peace which passeth all understanding. When duties and interests conflicted, and when motives became confused, Christmas Day declared that we, at least, should put our Christianity in the first place and that we should be moved at all costs by obedience to the principles, and the sanctions of our Christian profession.

If we thought of what we called political or social questions, the questions of temperance, housing, the relief of poverty, or the question of the proper relations between capital and labour and their due responsibility one to another for us, in all these questions we at least said that Christmas time declared that we must put expediency and what would pay best and our political prejudices and personal interests in the last place.

679/28

Professor Arnold Lupton's onslaught on Conscription.

(Continued from Front Page.)

I have read that our Indian Contingent (consisting of married men) expressed surprise that this country sent its bachelors to the war having regard to the future of the Empire.

Mr. Outhwaite, M.P., speaking in Parliament on the 21st December, 1915, said "It is a terrible thing to contemplate that the youth of the country should be killed off, and what is to happen to the future of the country? I do not suppose they are doing what I see the German Government is doing: issuing notices to young men who have been called up, that before they go to fight, they are expected to leave children behind."

It is not necessary for our Government to adopt that course, because a sufficient number of married men have volunteered. These men are not only the better fighters, being the more vigorous part of the population, but will for the most part leave children who will maintain the future of the race.

It has been urged by Conscriptionists however, that it is cheaper to send the bachelors because they leave no wives or children to be maintained by the State. These men, who are stopping at home in ease and comfort, desire to force the very young men into the trenches sooner than go themselves (such is their patriotism), or pay the money necessary to maintain the wives and children of married men who are quite ready to go without any compulsion.

One reason why, amongst the masses of the people, the married men are ready to go is because there is a clear understanding as to the allowances to be paid their wives and children; whereas, in the case of the bachelors, there is no clear understanding as to allowances to be paid to those who are partly or entirely, or who may become in course of years, dependent on them. On the contrary, the men who stop at home and manage these things have been trying to economise as regards allowances to dependents of bachelors who go to the Front.

It would appear that the only thing to be gained by a compulsory measure compelling bachelors to go to the Front will be that it will produce disunion in the nation and in Parliament; that the proposition may lead to a change of Government, and that therefore some people who are out of office may come into office.

There are, however, many sincere Conscriptionists in the country and in Parliament who think that that measure is necessary in order to control the industrial classes, not for the purposes of this war, which there is every reason to expect will be concluded before Conscription can be got into working order, but for the future, so that there shall be no nonsense about strikes and such controversies; men refusing to work at the rate of wages that their betters think fit for them, and meeting in riotous assemblies, which would be quickly shot down by a Conscription Army. This, I know, is the view taken by many good and sincere men; but is that the view which any Minister of State will dare to express from his place in Parliament!

There are some people in and out of Parliament, and, I fear, on the Ministerial Bench, who view the principle of liberty so lightly that they think it is only necessary for the Ministry to say courage at the risk of their lives by resisting what they consider to be a wicked law.

But for this threat of Conscription, the nation, except for an insignificant minority (which should be left alone), is united and enthusiastic in helping the Government to carry on the great campaign; some in the fighting services some in munitions, some helping the wounded, some giving voluntary help in a thousand useful ways, others subscribing their money, others simply cheerfully paying taxes, putting their savings into the War Loan, or subscribing in response to innumerable calls.

But let the Government introduce Conscription and there will be an end of this unity, this enthusiasm. There will be a large section, whether a majority or minority time alone can show, but a powerful and determined section of the people who will stop helping the Government, and devote all their intellectual, physical and pecuniary resources to resist this attack upon their liberties.

There are several eminent Conscriptionists represented in both Houses of Parliament who are of German or foreign parentage, and necessarily inherit German or foreign ideas, who have no conception of the British love of liberty. In times of peace it may possibly be not so very imprudent either to "take a leap in the dark" or to "damn the consequences," but at the present time it it not prudent to play tricks with the British people.

It should also be noted that great additional numbers of men would become available for the Army (if such numbers could be spared from other necessary work, which is not the case) by raising the age limit, but it must be borne in mind that a large proportion of the most vehement Conscriptionists are just those who might be caught by raising the age limit. That is my observation, both in town and country. It is men of good health and strength of say 45 who would make admirable recruits for a short service, and who could easily pass the Recruiting Officer if they wished. It is these lusty and loud-tongued patriots that are so anxious to compel the youths to take the place in the trenches that could be filled so much more efficiently by older men.

It must also be noted that the Conscriptionists are, for the most part, men who love compulsion for compulsion's sake. The desire to dominate is one of the strongest passions of human nature. Hence the desire to compel a man to go and fight instead of adopting the easier and simpler plan of paying him such wages as are required to induce him to go.

The Australian soldier, a single man without dependents, has all found and 6s. a day, that is, £2 2s. per week pay in cash to spend as he likes.

The Englishman is offered only 1s. a day for fighting. If he is making munitions, he is perhaps getting 10s. a day. A very slight addition to the pay offered to the British soldier would greatly increase the attractiveness of the service to him. But no, the Conscriptionists will not offer that. They are mostly furious old men and women exceedingly anxious to save their own pockets—which is the first consideration in their mind—otherwise, the simple, natural and obvious plan of paying the soldier a decent wage would be tried in preference to compulsion.

The Conscriptionists make a great deal of the fact that in the American Civil War, Conscription was adopted. Now it is true that Conscription was adopted by both sides. The Confederates who adopted the plan first were ultimately defeated. The Federals adop[illegible] but not more than [illegible] quired for munitions, coal mining, transport, and other labour? Really the case for Compulsion in this work is far stronger than that for the Army, because we have already a million men in the Army who are practically idle for want of weapons and ammunition. The principle of Compulsion once conceded, it is certain to be adopted everywhere.

If the Government should bring into Parliament a Bill for Conscription, it will certainly try to bluff the House into passing it. They will threaten resignation; they will say, "The Germans are coming"; they will ask, "Is England to suffer as Belgium and Servia have suffered?" The reply to these arguments is—our Fleet and the Armies that we have are quite sufficient to protect France, Russia, and Italy, and with their aid, to win this war; that the German offensive has been already effectually smashed and stopped, and that our Fleet gives us complete protection at home; [illegible] to our population, this country has already supplied for the fighting services THREE TIMES as many men as Russia has supplied.

If the Ministry resign—that is to say, if the Ministers all go on strike at once, and any harm results, they will be to blame. Parliament will not be to blame for refusing to adopt Conscription in any form, or however much it may be limited. But if the Ministry should go on strike, the permanent officials will carry on all the Civil, Military, and Naval Services just as well without them, and there will be no difficulty in finding other Members of Parliament just as capable as the present Ministers of answering questions in Parliament and otherwise representing the King in a constitutional manner.

Since writing the above, I have seen in the "Daily News" of the 31st December that there have been over 2,000,000 attestations. That of these, it is expected 1,250,000 will be fit for the Army. There have been, in addition, 300,000 enlistments during the recent Recruiting Campaign. This makes a total of 1,550,000, whereas Parliament has only sanctioned the enlistment of 1,000,000.

The Conscriptionists expect to force in another 200,000 unmarried men, whereas without Compulsion, we have already got 550,000 more men than are required.

It is evident from the above figures that the object of the Conscriptionists is not to get a larger Army, but merely to get the principle of Compulsion established and the destruction of our liberties completed before the end of the war.

All the talk of the Prime Minister's pledge is obviously nonsense. It is impossible to conceive that he has pledged himself and his Government to Compulsion for the sake of a possible addition of 200,000 men to an Army of Volunteers already numbering 5,501,000.

BANK AMALGAMATION.

THE MANCHESTER and LIVERPOOL DISTRICT BANK and the BANK of WHITEHAVEN.

We are officially informed that a provisional agreement has been concluded for the transfer of the business of the Bank of Whitehaven Ltd. to the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Co. Ltd.

The terms provide for the payment of the sum of £216,766 which is equivalent to £22 for each share. The Whitehaven bank shareholders are entitled to receive one half of the purchase price in shares of the District Bank at £36 per share. The current and deposit accounts of the District Bank after the amalgamation of the figures of the Whitehaven bank will be approximately £[illegible]

CONSCRIPTION TERMS OF THE NEW BILL.

The I.L.P. announce that they will resist the Conscription Bill to the uttermost.

Ministers, the Parliamentary correspondent of the "Times" writes, accepted the principle of compulsion at their last meeting on Tuesday. In the interval, a Committee of the Cabinet has been engaged in drafting a bill to give legislative effect to the decision that the Prime Minister's pledge must be redeemed at once. This Cabinet Committee was appointed some time before the recent crisis arose, and it has therefore been able to examine thoroughly the varied history of compulsory military service. It had all its data to hand and its precedents ready when the Cabinet on Tuesday asked for the draft of a bill which should carry out the Prime Minister's pledge. The draft has been quickly completed, and it was in the hands of every member of the Cabinet

It is understood that the bill, as drafted, is based upon the following principles:—

1. That compulsion shall be applied forthwith to all the single men who have failed to attest under Lord Derby's scheme.
2. That the machinery of the Derby scheme shall be made statutory for this purpose.
3. That these provisions shall only be enacted for the period of the present war.

The bill, of course, may emerge in a very dfferent form from the Cabinet.

NEXT MONTH'S LABOUR CONFERENCE.

The three days' conference of the Labour party will take place at Bristol at the end of January promises to be of exceptional interest.

Many resolutions on recruiting topics —some approving of the part taken by Labour in the campaign and some disapproving—will provide an opportunity for a discussion on compulsion, and on this question there is certain to be much outspoken nd strong comment. Nine different affiliated bodies have given notice to move in most emphatic terms a resoluton protesting against any form of conscription as being dangerous to the national unity.

The conference wil be asked to consider an application from the British Socialist party for affiliation to the Labour party. The application is made on the basis of 20,000 members, and it points out that there are seven Parliamentary candidates which the B.S.P. has already in the field, and which it is pledged to carry forward at the next general election. The Executive Committee suggest that for the purpose of the next general election the candidates of the B.S.P. shall be accepted and placed on the list of candidatures sanctioned by the Labour party executive.

Many resolutions deal with the problem of peace terms. The Ealing, Acton and Chiswick Council call upon the Government to formulate and publicly declare terms of peace which they might be ready to make, and to this the Manchester and Salford party will seek to add: "That no proposals for peace involving the evacuation of invaded territory should be decided by the Cabinet without being first submitted to the House of Commons."

A topic which will undoubtedly arouse keen discussion is the Munitions Act, and as an amendment to a resolution calling for its immediate repeal the London and Provincial Union of Licensed Vehicle Workers will propose that the party "shall obtain from the Govern-the future of the race.

It has been urged by Conscriptionists however, that it is cheaper to send the bachelors because they leave no wives or children to be maintained by the State. These men, who are stopping at home in ease and comfort, desire to force the very young men into the trenches sooner than go themselves (such is their patriotism), or pay the money necessary to maintain the wives and children of married men who are quite ready to go without any compulsion.

One reason why, amongst the masses of the people, the married men are ready to go is because there is a clear understanding as to the allowances to be paid their wives and children; whereas, in the case of the bachelors, there is no clear understanding as to allowances to be paid to those who are partly or entirely, or who may become in course of years, dependent on them. On the contrary, the men who stop at home and manage these things have been trying to economise as regards allowances to dependents of bachelors who go to the Front.

It would appear that the only thing to be gained by a compulsory measure compelling bachelors to go to the Front will be that it will produce disunion in the nation and in Parliament; that the proposition may lead to a change of Government, and that therefore some people who are out of office may come into office.

There are, however, many sincere Conscriptionists in the country and in Parliament who think that that measure is necessary in order to control the industrial classes, not for the purposes of this war, which there is every reason to expect will be concluded before Conscription can be got into working order, but for the future, so that there shall be no nonsense about strikes and such controversies; men refusing to work at the rate of wages that their betters think fit for them, and meeting in riotous assemblies, which would be quickly shot down by a Conscription Army. This, I know, is the view taken by many good and sincere men; but is that the view which any Minister of State will dare to express from his place in Parliament?

There are some people in and out of Parliament, and, I fear, on the Ministerial Bench, who view the principle of liberty so lightly that they think it is only necessary for the Ministry to say that there is to be Conscription and that it will be forced on the country without difficulty.

There, I venture to say, they are entirely mistaken. It is conceivable that a majority in Parliament may pass the law, but the majority of the nation, as distinguished from the majority of the electors, will certainly not approve of such a law, and that there will be strenuous resistance. But is there any man who at the same time is both sane and sober, who thinks that it will strengthen the cause of the Allies for it to be known throughout the world that police and soldiers in this country are engaged in leading gangs of prisoners to a guarded camp and afterwards marched against their will to the Front? It is not that these men will be cowards; on the contrary, many of them may be the bravest of the brave, and they will show their so very imprudent rather to take a leap in the dark" or to "damn the consequences," but at the present time it it not prudent to play tricks with the British people.

It should also be noted that great additional numbers of men would become available for the Army (if such numbers could be spared from other necessary work, which is not the case) by raising the age limit, but it must be borne in mind that a large proportion of the most vehement Conscriptionists are just those who might be caught by raising the age limit. That is my observation, both in town and country. It is men of good health and strength of say 45 who would make admirable recruits for a short service, and who could easily pass the Recruiting Officer if they wished. It is these lusty and loud-tongued patriots that are so anxious to compel the youths to take the place in the trenches that could be filled so much more efficiently by older men.

It must also be noted that the Conscriptionists are, for the most part, men who love compulsion for compulsion's sake. The desire to dominate is one of the strongest passions of human nature. Hence the desire to compel a man to go and fight instead of adopting the easier and simpler plan of paying him such wages as are required to induce him to go.

The Australian soldier, a single man without dependents, has all found and 6s. a day, that is, £2 2s. per week pay in cash to spend as he likes.

The Englishman is offered only 1s. a day for fighting. If he is making munitions, he is perhaps getting 10s. a day. A very slight addition to the pay offered to the British soldier would greatly increase the attractiveness of the service to him. But no, the Conscriptionists will not offer that. They are mostly furious old men and women exceedingly anxious to save their own pockets—which is the first consideration in their mind—otherwise, the simple, natural and obvious plan of paying the soldier a decent wage would be tried in preference to compulsion.

The Conscriptionists make a great deal of the fact that in the American Civil War, Conscription was adopted. Now it is true that Conscription was adopted by both sides. The Confederates who adopted the plan first were ultimately defeated. The Federals adopted the plan later, but not more than one soldier in ten fighting in the Federal Ranks had been conscripted, nine-tenths were Volunteers and all of them were paid very high wages, and all their dependents and all the wounded were pensioned and well taken care of to the end of their lives, but that part of the Federal programme does not commend itself to our Conscriptionists.

If Parliament concedes the principle of Compulsory Service of unmarried men in the Army, it will very soon be faced with the demand for Compulsory Service of all men, both married and single in the munition and other works in this country.

If for the most terrible and horrible of all work young men are to be compelled to fight for a 1s. a day, on what possible ground can Parliament resist Compulsion for those who are said to be relimited. But if the Ministry should go on strike, the permanent officials will carry on all the Civil, Military, and Naval Services just as well without them, and there will be no difficulty in finding other Members of Parliament just as capable as the present Ministers of answering questions in Parliament and otherwise representing the King in a constitutional manner.

Since writing the above, I have seen in the "Daily News" of the 31st December that there have been over 2,000,000 attestations. That of these, it is expected 1,250,000 will be fit for the Army. There have been, in addition, 300,000 enlistments during the recent Recruiting Campaign. This makes a total of 1,550,000, whereas Parliament has only sanctioned the enlistment of 1,000,000.

The Conscriptionists expect to force in another 200,000 unmarried men, whereas without Compulsion, we have already got 550,000 more men than are required.

It is evident from the above figures that the object of the Conscriptionists is not to get a larger Army, but merely to get the principle of Compulsion established and the destruction of our liberties completed before the end of the war.

All the talk of the Prime Minister's pledge is obviously nonsense. It is impossible to conceive that he has pledged himself and his Government to Compulsion for the sake of a possible addition of 200,000 men to an Army of Volunteers already numbering 5,501,000.

BANK AMALGAMATION.

THE MANCHESTER and LIVERPOOL DISTRICT BANK and the BANK of WHITEHAVEN.

We are officially informed that a provisional agreement has been concluded for the transfer of the business of the Bank of Whitehaven Ltd. to the Manchester and Liverpool District Banking Co. Ltd.

The terms provide for the payment of the sum of £216,766 which is equivalent to £22 for each share. The Whitehaven bank shareholders are entitled to receive one half of the purchase price in shares of the District Bank at £36 per share. The current and deposit accounts of the District Bank after the amalgamation of the figures of the Whitehaven bank will be approximately £29,500,000.

The Whitehaven bank, which was established in 1837, is one of the few remaining joint stock banks with a note issue; in consequence of the amalgamation the authorised note issue of £32,681, will, of course, lapse.

Three directors of the Whitehaven bank will join the Board of the District Bank, and will continue their active interest in the business of the Whitehaven district. The whole of the staff will be retained.

The progress of the District Bank is shown in the following figures.

CURRENT, DEPOSIT AND OTHER ACCOUNTS.

1910	£22,522,459
1911	23,497,271
1912	25,070,072
1913	25,916,689
1914	27,412,987

2. That the machinery of the Derby scheme shall be made statutory for this purpose.

3. That these provisions shall only be enacted for the period of the present war.

The bill, of course, may emerge in a very dfferent form from the Cabinet.

NEXT MONTH'S LABOUR CONFERENCE.

The three days' conference of the Labour party will take place at Bristol at the end of January promises to be of exceptional interest.

Many resolutions on recruiting topics —some approving of the part taken by Labour in the campaign and some disapproving—will provide an opportunity for a discussion on compulsion, and on this question there is certain to be much outspoken nd strong comment. Nine different affiliated bodies have given notice to move in most emphatic terms a resoluton protesting against any form of conscription as being dangerous to the national unity.

The conference wil be asked to consider an application from the British Socialist party for affiliation to the Labour party. The application is made on the basis of 20,000 members, and it points out that there are seven Parliamentary candidates which the B.S.P. has already in the field, and which it is pledged to carry forward at the next general election. The Executive Committee suggest that for the purpose of the next general election the candidates of the B.S.P. shall be accepted and placed on the list of candidatures sanctioned by the Labour party executive.

Many resolutions deal with the problem of peace terms. The Ealing, Acton and Chiswick Council call upon the Government to formulate and publicly declare terms of peace which they might be ready to make, and to this the Manchester and Salford party will seek to add: "That no proposals for peace involving the evacuation of invaded territory should be decided by the Cabinet without being first submitted to the House of Commons."

A topic which will undoubtedly arouse keen discussion is the Munitions Act, and as an amendment to a resolution calling for its immediate repeal the London and Provincial Union of Licensed Vehicle Workers will propose that the party "shall obtain from the Government a definite pledge to be placed on the Statute book guaranteeing the return of their rights to all trade unions."

Other resolutions will deal with women's war service, and a demand will be made that men of non-military age shall have priority of employment over female labour, and also that women shall be paid not less than the rates paid to men for the same work.

In view of the increased cost of living the raising of the old-age pension from 5s to 7s 6d. will also be suggested.

For the Executive Committee several additional names will be put forward. The nominations for the secretaryship are Messrs W. C. Anderdson, J. R. Clynes, Arthur Henderson, J. Ramsay Macdonald, J. S. Middleton, and Tom Richardson. All but Mr. Henderson declined the nomination.

679/29

Bishop Knox on Women's Thrift.

LESSONS FROM THE WAR.

English people always have been a wasteful people. . . . Our women have not been educated, as the women of France have been educated, to the managment of money.

These remarks were made by the Bishop of Manchester, who, as president of the Manchester and Salford Savings Bank, occupied the chair at the 98th annual meeting, held in the bank. Bishop Knox emphasised the necessity for economy as part of war service. Referring to the conditions of Germany and England, he sopke of the "contest between Individualism and Socialism.

A satisfactory report was presented. It was stated that about 10,000 depositors were subscribers to the 4½ per cent War Loan, the amount being nearly three-quarters of a million pounds.

Supporting the chairman was the Lord Mayor of Manchester (Alderman Copeland and the chairman (Mr. Francis Godlee).

Moving the adoption of the report the Bishop of Manchester said he felt that this year had been one of exceptional trial and searching for the whole of the savings bank system. Never before had there been such an opportunity for investors to obtain such interest on small savings. He considered the bank had stood the test successfully, as was indicated by the figures given.

Continuing, the Bishop remarked that there never was such a time of great prosperity for a large number of those who were known as the working classes, but whom he preferred to call the weekly wage earners. Not only the banks, but the whole nation, he believed would have been intensely gratified if there had been an increase in saving proportionate with the increase of wages. The wage earners should be more fully informed in regard to economy, we must remember that economical habits are not acquired to order. They have to be learnt by discipline and practice," went on Dr. Knox. "The English people have always been a wasteful people, and I think we may add that during this war there has been to some extent a transference in the management of the money. The men in their millions are away, and a large portion of the wages is being received by the women—who, having previously received from their husbands just the sum it was necessary to carry them through the week, now find themselves in the position of having what is to them fabulous wealth. Our women have not been educated as the women of France have been educated to the management of money."

MONEY WELL SPENT.

In France, continued his lordship, the mother was the business head of the household, and had for many generations past exercised the economy of the household and the savings of the household. On the whole one thing to be thankful for at present was that some of the money now coming so largely into the possession of the weekly wage-earners fierce contest between individualism and socialism on a very large scale. The German nation at the root was managed on Socialistic principles—Socialism in this respect, everybody was taught that his duty to the State came before all other duties. We had all been breathing, individualism in an exaggerated way Now the two principles were at a death grapple.

Dr. Knox asked how it was that in spite of all the pessimism and the headlines of disasters supposed to be happening; in spite of the gloomy Cassandras who were flourishing in the columns of some of the daily papers, there was apparent among the nation to-day a note of optimism—evidence that somehow or other things were looking very different to what they did a little while ago. He thought the justification was this: that while it might be imagined that a few men could satisfactorily administer the affairs of millions [illegible] and turn their energies in one direction with absolute efficiency, yet mistakes crept in, blunders being colossal. With the individuals, however, in spite of weakness and unpreparedness, there was room for making mistakes and for recovery.

THE BANK'S REPORT.

Moving a vote of thanks to the president and others, which was afterwards endorsed, the Lord Mayor remarked that that was his first visit to the bank meeting. Taking occasion to refer to the report Alderman Copeland said he looked upon the working man as being conservative—he did not mean in a political sense—but in the direction that when once he had found he was well treated by an institution he continued with it, in spite of any seeming attraction there might be to go elsewhere.

The report showed that the assets were £6,046,796 and the liabilities £5,899,951, leaving a clear surplus of £146,845 after paying every depositor in full. This was £2,632 more than at the close of the preceding year. The total receipts were £2,362,998, and the repayments £2,578,555; 24,663 accounts had been opened and 17,492 accounts closed, making the total number of accounts remaining open at the close of the year 153,924. The report and balance sheet were adopted.

LINCOLN'S WORDS TO-DAY.

The following letter appears in the "Daily News."

Sir,—About fifty years ago the following sentences were uttered in our mother-tongue by the greatest American statesman that has ever lived. They appear to embody a fine thought for Christmas, 1915:

The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did there. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought there have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from those who are dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that those dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

J. LANDFEAR LUCAS.
Glendora, Hindhead.

ELEVEN SUSPENDED ONE AFTER ANOTHER.

A number of Labour men in the Glasgow Town Council created a disturbance at a meeting of the Council, and in the end eleven of them had to be suspended before the ordinary business on the agenda could be proceeded with.

The Labour members of the Council have been active recently in organising meetings in the city for the purpose of protesting against conscription in any shape or form. They had endeavoured to secure the largest halls in the city for these meetings, but on one occasion they were refused the City Hall and on another St. Andrew's Hall, both of which belong to the Corporation, and the anti-conscription meetings had to be held in the open air.

The Labour [illegible] discussion on the question of the Corporation's refusal to let the halls for anti-conscription meetings. Lord Provost Dunlop was unable to be present at the Council as he was accompanying Mr. Lloyd George to the munitions works in the district. Bailie W. B. Smith presided.

When the minutes of a sub-committee on the halls was submitted the disturbance began by a lively discussion. This committee had refused an application by Mr. John Taylor on behalf of the Independent Labour party (Glasgow Federation, for the use of St. Andrew's Hall on Wednesday, December 8th, for the purpose of holding a demonstration of protest against conscription. This minute, it was stated, was reported for the information of the Corporation.

The Town Clerk, in reply to a question by Mr. George Smith, pointed out that by the time the minute had come before the Finance Committee the date was past, and, therefore, there could be no effective consideration of the subject.

The chairman ruled that the minute could not be discussed at that meeting, and he asked that the business on the agenda be proceeded with.

The Labour members refused to acquiesce in this ruling, and obstructed the business.

After a heated discussion, the suspension of first one Labour member and then another was moved and carried until eleven councillors—almost the entire Labour group present—had to leave the Council.

One of the last men to leave was a Mr Izett, who created a lively scene.

Mr. Izett rose to object to the minute.

The Town Clerk: Oh; I say, this is getting stale.

A Voice: He wants to be suspended.

Bailie Maclure moved that the suspension.

Mr. Izett: This will be the first time I have been suspended, and I am not going to take it so calmly as the others. This is not the way to carry on the business of the city of Glasgow.

On a division the motion for suspension was carried.

The Chairman (to Mr. Izett, who persisted in addressing the Council): Will you leave the house?

Mr. Izett: No, I won't. You are a disgrace to the chair.

Two Council officers approached Mr. Izett, but he refused to move.

Mr. Izett: I am not going out of the

THE DISCUSSION OF PEACE TERMS.

Mr. Geo. Benson in a letter to the "Manchester Guardian" says:—

As your recent article on the German Chancellor's speech pointed out, the Governments of all the belligerent nations have stated that they are fighting for guarantees of futre safety and peace. Such guarantees cannot be obtained by one nation or group of nations alone. Superior military power defensible frontiers, and similar "material guarantees" have never safeguarded peace and never will. To believe that one nation or group can by any [illegible] for itself by repressing another nation or group is an almost childish misunderstanding of history, psychology, and nationality. An attempt to obtain guarantees at the expense of other nations will merely lead to the re-establishment of the balance of power, which has been the cause of half the wars of the last century. No political organisation of Europe can be permanent, and any arrangement in which the balance is tipped against one section will of necessity be temporary. Sooner or later will come the rearrangement, Europe will again become two hostile camps, and the supposed guarantees of peace will have vanished. The one possible effective guarantee of peace is the abolition of antagonism as the basis of European statecraft and the substitution of the mutual insurance of each single nation by all; in other words, the Concert of Europe. Thus the European nations are rending each other to obtain something which co-operation alone can bring, and which isolation or division must immediately destroy.

The position of the English and German Governments, both of which are prepared to consider any terms of peace offered but neither prepared to formulate them, looks unpleasantly like the spectacle of two small boys both tired of the pummelling but each afraid to cry "Hold!" Both sides fear that such a step would be considered a sign of weakness. But how? Surely Surely definition of aim is a source of strength. If the Government is fighting for the unconditional surrender of Germany let it say so. Such a declaration would have less weakness than vague, meaningless phrases about the crushing of Prussian militarism. It would certainly denote strength and determination even if it lacked intelligence If, on the other hand, we are fighting for reasonable terms, what would do more than publication to strengthen our influence with neutrals and to weaken the influence of Prussian militarists over the mind of the German people?

The nation which first puts forward its terms of peace gains a distinct tactical advantage, for terms produced later must be formulated with reference to and receive direction from them. The second nation with its eye upon neutral opinion abroad and public opinion at home will be compelled to go one step further in the direction of reasonableness, and in subsequent negotiations, which would seem to be the inevitable consequence of such statements the nation first in the field would have the advantage.

A CHRISTMAS CALL TO WAR

tors were subscribers to the 4½ per cent War Loan, the amount being nearly three-quarters of a million pounds.

Supporting the chairman was the Lord Mayor of Manchester (Alderman Copeland and the chairman (Mr. Francis Godlee).

Moving the adoption of the report the Bishop of Manchester said he felt that this year had been one of exceptional trial and searching for the whole of the savings bank system. Never before had there been such an opportunity for investors to obtain such interest on small savings. He considered the bank had stood the test successfully, as was indicated by the figures given.

Continuing, the Bishop remarked that there never was such a time of great prosperity for a large number of those who were known as the working classes, but whom he preferred to call the weekly wage earners. Not only the banks, but the whole nation, he believed would have been intensely gratified if there had been an increase in saving proportionate with the increase of wages. The wage earners should be more fully informed in regard to economy, we must remember that economical habits are not acquired to order. They have to be learnt by discipline and practice," went on Dr. Knox. "The English people have always been a wasteful people, and I think we may add that during this war there has been to some extent a transference in the management of the money. The men in their millions are away, and a large portion of the wages is being received by the women—who, having previously received from their husbands just the sum it was necessary to carry them through the week, now find themselves in the position of having what is to them fabulous wealth. Our women have not been educated as the women of France have been educated to the management of money."

MONEY WELL SPENT.

In France, continued his lordship, the mother was the business head of the household, and had for many generations past exercised the economy of the household and the savings of the household. On the whole one thing to be thankful for at present was that some of the money now coming so largely into the possession of the weekly wage-earners was being well spent. It was stated, for instance, rents were being readily paid. With regard to furniture, also, the demand was so great that in some cases about 30 per cent. more than in normal times had to be paid, but less satisfactory was the purchase of cheap jewellery. It was not possible to say what the picture shows had been getting. We had ourselves to blame for the lack of economy. We had not succeeded in inculating the self-discipline necessary. "If the war somehow or other brings us to understand that there are other things which are quite as important for our children and young people to learn as many of the things upon the time-table, that we could give instruction on new lines which would be most helpful—well, the war will not have been altogether ruinous to ourselves and may bring us blessings in disguise."

It appeared to be, stated the Bishop that at the present moment there was a was room for making mistakes and for recovery.

THE BANK'S REPORT.

Moving a vote of thanks to the president and others, which was afterwards endorsed, the Lord Mayor remarked that that was his first visit to the bank meeting. Taking occasion to refer to the report Alderman Copeland said he looked upon the working man as being conservative—he did not mean in a political sense—but in the direction that when once he had found he was well treated by an institution he continued with it, in spite of any seeming attraction there might be to go elsewhere.

The report showed that the assets were £6,046,796 and the liabilities £5,899,951, leaving a clear surplus of £146,845 after paying every depositor in full. This was £2,632 more than at the close of the preceding year. The total receipts were £2,362,998, and the repayments £2,578,555; 24,663 accounts had been opened and 17,492 accounts closed, making the total number of accounts remaining open at the close of the year 153,924. The report and balance sheet were adopted.

LINCOLN'S WORDS TO-DAY.

The following letter appears in the "Daily News."

Sir,—About fifty years ago the following sentences were uttered in our mother-tongue by the greatest American statesman that has ever lived. They appear to embody a fine thought for Christmas, 1915:

The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did there. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought there have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from those who are dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that those dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

J. LANDFEAR LUCAS.

Glendora, Hindhead.

LADIES FREE.

Ladies, if you are wise, before parting with your money for useless remedies, write to me for FREE SAMPLE sufficient for a cure, of my renowned Treatment for all irregularities. No nauseous drugs. No useless injections. Acts like magic in the most obstinate and unyielding cases. Guaranteed absolutely effective under one hour. Failure impossible, so why worry. Send no money Sample, sworn testimonials, guaranteed genuine under penalty of £5,000, and "The Manual of Wisdom," sent absolutely free.

The MANAGERESS, LE BRASSEUR SURGICAL CO., LTD. (Dept. K.A.), Birmingham (sufficient address). Tel. No.: Midland 2598. Telegrams: "Surgical, Birmingham."

works in the district. Bailie W. B. Smith presided.

When the minutes of a sub-committee on the halls was submitted the disturbance began by a lively discussion. This committee had refused an application by Mr. John Taylor on behalf of the Independent Labour party (Glasgow Federation) for the use of St. Andrew's Hall on Wednesday, December 8th, for the purpose of holding a demonstration of protest against conscription. This minute, it was stated, was reported for the information of the Corporation.

The Town Clerk, in reply to a question by Mr. George Smith, pointed out that by the time the minute had come before the Finance Committee the date was past, and, therefore, there could be no effective consideration of the subject.

The chairman ruled that the minute could not be discussed at that meeting, and he asked that the business on the agenda be proceeded with.

The Labour members refused to acquiesce in this ruling, and obstructed the business.

After a heated discussion, the suspension of first one Labour member and then another was moved and carried until eleven councillors—almost the entire Labour group present—had to leave the Council.

One of the last men to leave was a Mr Izett, who created a lively scene.

Mr. Izett rose to object to the minute.

The Town Clerk: Oh; I say, this is getting stale.

A Voice: He wants to be suspended.

Bailie Maclure moved that the suspension.

Mr. Izett: This will be the first time I have been suspended, and I am not going to take it so calmly as the others. This is not the way to carry on the business of the city of Glasgow.

On a division the motion for suspension was carried.

The Chairman (to Mr. Izett, who persisted in addressing the Council): Will you leave the house?

Mr. Izett: No, I won't. You are a disgrace to the chair.

Two Council officers approached Mr. Izett, but he refused to move.

Mr. Izett: I am not going out of the house, as a mark of my displeasure. You have behaved in a scandalous way

The chairman requested the Council officers to remove Mr. Izett, and, if necessary ,to get more assistance.

Mr. Izett: I am not going.

Several members of the Council made personal appeals to Mr. Izett to go quietly, and ultimately he consented to leave the meeting.

The scene lasted for nearly an hour and a half.

---

of the balance of power, which has been the cause of half the wars of the last century. No political organisation of Europe can be permanent, and any arrangement in which the balance is tipped against one section will of necessity be temporary. Sooner or later will come the rearrangement, Europe will again become two hostile camps, and the supposed guarantees of peace will have vanished. The one possible effective guarantee of peace is the abolition of antagonism as the basis of European statecraft and the substitution of the mutual insurance of each single nation by all; in other words, the Concert of Europe. Thus the European nations are rending each other to obtain something which co-operation alone can bring, and which isolation or division must immediately destroy.

The position of the English and German Governments, both of which are prepared to consider any terms of peace offered but neither prepared to formulate them, looks unpleasantly like the spectacle of two small boys both tired of the pummelling but each afraid to cry "Hold!" Both sides fear that such a step would be considered a sign of weakness. But how? Surely Surely definition of aim is a source of strength. If the Government is fighting for the unconditional surrender of Germany let it say so. Such a declaration would have less weakness than vague, meaningless phrases about the crushing of Prussian militarism. It would certainly denote strength and determination even if it lacked intelligence If, on the other hand, we are fighting for reasonable terms, what would do more than publication to strengthen our influence with neutrals and to weaken the influence of Prussian militarists over the mind of the German people?

The nation which first puts forward its terms of peace gains a distinct tactical advantage, for terms produced later must be formulated with reference to and receive direction from them. The second nation with its eye upon neutral opinion abroad and public opinion at home will be compelled to go one step further in the direction of reasonableness, and in subsequent negotiations, which would seem to be the inevitable consequence of such statements the nation first in the field would have the advantage.

A CHRISTMAS CALL TO WAR.

At St. Columba's, Pont street, Dr. Archibald Fleming took for his text the words in Thessalonians, "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly."

The Christmas call to peace, he said, was ever, in a sense, a call to war. And this year more than ever we were called again to arm ourselves on behalf of the Prince of Peace. We were to go from the Bethlehem cradle fresh-fired to fight for peace. We were pledged more than ever to cast out from the comity of nations, in which it had been given to our own nation to play so powerful and responsible a part, all that made for baseness or corruption, all that dishonoured holiness, all that did violence to the heavenly laws of freedom, justice, and love. In this way, and in this way alone, we were to seek peace and ensue it.

Yorkshire Post

679/30

SUPPORTERS OF SIR JOHN SIMON.

The following letter was handed to Sir John Simon last evening:—

We, the undersigned, desire to express our wholehearted appreciation of your action in regard to conscription, and to assure you of our active and immediate support, whether as private individuals or in so far as we represent organisations, in any opposition to the Bill you and your colleagues decide to organise. We realise that our names are representative of only a limited section of the public, but we had ventured to take the initiative through our conviction that these views reflect a widespread opinion in the country.

The signatories are as follows:—C. G. Ammon, W. A. Appleton, J. H. Banks, Eleanor Barton, Margaret Bondfield, John Clifford, G. D. H. Cole, Margaret Llewellyn Davies, G. Lowes Dickinson, J. W. Graham, F. W. Hirst, J. A. Hobson, Henry T. Hodgkin, George Lansbury, P. W. Pethick Lawrence, Mary Macarthur, Sam Marsh, Catherine Marshall, H. W. Massingham, Francis Meynell, J. S. Middleton, J. Campbell Morgan, Grace Neal, W. E. Orchard, Sylvia Pankhurst, Clarissa Potter, Bertrand Russell, Alfred Salter, Olive Schreiner, Mary Sheepshanks, Robert Smillie, F. R. Swan, John Turner Williams, Robert Williams, and J. Winstone.

Weston Mercury

"ONLY A LIMITED SECTION."

APPRECIATION OF SIR JOHN SIMON'S ATTITUDE.

The following letter was handed to Sir John Simon on Tuesday evening:—

"We, the undersigned, desire to express our wholehearted appreciation of your action in regard to conscription, and to assure you of our active and immediate support, whether as private individuals or in so far as we represent organisations, in any opposition to the Bill you and your colleagues decide to organise. We realise that our names are representative of only a limited section of the public, but we have ventured to take the initiative through our conviction that these views reflect a widespread opinion in the country.—Yours faithfully, (Signed)

"C. G. Ammon,
W. A. Appleton,
J. H. Banks,
Eleanor Barton,
Margaret Bondfield,
John Clifford,
G. D. H. Cole,
Margaret Llewellyn Davies,
G. Lowes Dickinson,
J. W. Graham,
F. W. Hirst,
J. A. Dobson,
Henry T. Hodgkin,
George Lansbury,
P. W. Pethick Lawrence,
Mary McArthur,
Sam Marsh,
Catherine Marshall,
H. W. Massingham,
Francis Meynell,
J. S. Middleton,
J. Campbell Morgan,
Grace Neal,
W. E. Orchard,
Sylvia Pankhurst,
Clarissa Potter,
Bertrand Russell,
Alfred Salter,
Olive Schreiner,
Mary Sheepshanks,
Robert Smillie,
F. R. Swan,
John Turner,
J. E. Williams,
Robert Williams,
J. Winstone."

Sussex Daily News

The Member for the Attercliffe Division

Mr. W. C. Anderson, the Labour Member for the Attercliffe Division of Sheffield, who was chosen by the majority of the Labour Party to move that the Military Service Bill be rejected, is a comparatively new figure at Westminster. He was for a number of years a knocker at several doors, and on account of his part in Scottish organization the expectation was that he would come in for some place North of the Tweed. A death, however, brought the vacancy at Attercliffe, and Mr. Anderson got the Labour ticket. However one may differ from him in his views, it must be said that he has courage in his belief, for Sheffield is one of the last cities in the country to hesitate about this matter. It is an armament centre, and is following the war with the utmost eagerness. Possibly Mr. Anderson derives some of his fortitude from the opinions of his wife—who was so well known as Miss Mary MacArthur—a social worker of pronounced views, but of undoubted ability. Miss MacArthur was one of the deputation to the Anti-Compulsion Members at the House of Commons on Monday. It is interesting to note, by the way, that Mr. Will Thorne raised a protest, when Mr. Anderson got up to move his amendment, against his being taken to represent the Labour Party. Mr. Thorne expressed his surprise that the Speaker called upon Mr. Anderson, inasmuch as half a dozen other M.P.'s had earlier handed in similar notices. It is an old custom, however, that the Speaker shall exercise his discretion when an identical motion appears in the names of several M.P.'s. The method of discretion is quaintly described as one of "sight." The Speaker saw Mr. Anderson, and, therefore, called upon him. He did this with an appropriate convenience, for, after all, the Attercliffe Member does speak for the only considerable number of legislators who are declared against the Bill. The Liberal M.P.'s who voted against the first reading are a more uncertain quantity, and the Irish voted rather by way of protest than from resolve to fight the Bill step by step.

The Daily Telegraph
12/1/16

679

SIR JOHN SIMON'S SUPPORTERS.

The following letter has been addressed to the late Home Secretary, Sir John Simon, signed by individuals who are opposed to compulsion:

"18, Bride-lane, London. E.C., 11th January, 1916.

"The Right Hon. Sir John Simon.

"Sir—We, the undersigned, desire to express our whole-hearted appreciation of your action in regard to Conscription, and to assure you of our active and immediate support, whether as private individuals or in so far as we represent organisations, in any opposition to the bill you and your colleagues decide to organise.

"We realise that our names are representative of only a limited section of the public, but we have ventured to take the initiative through our conviction that these views reflect a widespread opinion in the country.—Yours faithfully.

C. G. AMMON.
W. A. APPLETON.
J. H. BANKS.
ELEANOR BARTON.
MARGARET BONDFIELD.
JOHN CLIFFORD.
G. D. H. COLE.
MARGARET LLEWELLYN DAVIES.
G. LOWES DICKINSON.
J. W. GRAHAM.
F. W. HIRST.
J. A. HOBSON.
HENRY T. HODGKIN.
GEORGE LANSBURY.
P. W. PETHICK LAWRENCE.
MARY MACARTHUR.
SAM MARSH.
CATHERINE MARSHAM.
H. W. MASSINGHAM.
FRANCIS MEYNELL.
J. S. MIDDLETON.
J. CAMPBELL MORGAN.
GRACE NEAL.
W. E. ORCHARD.
SYLVIA PANKHURST.
CLARISSA E. POTTER.
BERTRAND RUSSELL.
ALFRED SALTER.
OLIVE SCHREINER.
MARY SHEEPSHANKS.
ROBERT SMILLIE.
F. R. SWAN.
JOHN TURNER.
J. E. WILLIAMS.
ROBERT WILLIAMS.
J. WINSTONE.

The Times
12/1/16

SIR J. SIMON'S SUPPORTERS.

LETTER FROM 36 SYMPATHIZERS.

The following letter was handed to Sir John Simon last evening:—

We, the undersigned, desire to express our whole-hearted appreciation of your action in regard to Conscription, and to assure you of our active and immediate support, whether as private individuals or in so far as we represent organizations in any opposition to the Bill you and your colleagues decide to organize.

We realize that our names are representative of only a limited section of the public, but we have ventured to take the initiative through our conviction that these views reflect a widespread opinion in the country. Yours faithfully,

C. G. AMMON
W. A. APPLETON
J. H. BANKS
ELEANOR BARTON
MARGARET BONDFIELD
JOHN CLIFFORD
G. D. H. COLE
MARGARET LLEWELLYN DAVIES
G. LOWES DICKINSON
J. W. GRAHAM
F. W. HIRST
J. A. HOBSON
HENRY T. HODGKIN
GEORGE LANSBURY
F. W. PETHICK LAWRENCE
MARY MACARTHUR
SAM MARSH
CATHERINE MARSHALL
H. W. MASSINGHAM
FRANCIS MEYNELL
J. S. MIDDLETON
J. CAMPBELL MORGAN
GRACE NEAL
W. E. ORCHARD
SYLVIA PANKHURST
CLARISSA E. POTTER
BERTRAND RUSSELL
ALFRED SALTER
OLIVE SCHREINER
MARY SHEEPSHANKS
ROBERT SMILLIE
F. R. SWAN
JOHN TURNER
J. E. WILLIAMS
ROBERT WILLIAMS
J. WINSTONE

The Yorkshire Post
Leeds
31/1/16

LABOUR AND COMPULSORY SERVICE.

VIEWS OF YORKSHIRE TRADE UNIONISTS.

SIR WILLIAM PRIESTLEY'S OUTSPOKENNESS GIVES OFFENCE.

The attitude of labour towards the conditions set up by the Military Service Act and the Munitions Act, and the influx of women into industrial pursuits, were the main topics discussed at the half-yearly meeting of the Federated Trades Councils of Yorkshire, which was held in Huddersfield Town Hall on Saturday afternoon. In the unavoidable absence of the Mayor (Alderman Blamires) the delegates were welcomed by the Deputy Mayor (Alderman Jessop) and Mr. A. Shaw, president of the Huddersfield Trades Council. The chair was taken by Mr. Barber, of Bradford.

The report of the Secretary (Mr. Ben Turner) stated that the Munitions Act had been one of the most irritating Acts of Parliament passed during the war, and generally speaking there was bad temper in the engineering workshops because of the way in which the Act had been worked. There had been a big call for women to enter munition and other factories, and the points that working women should bear in mind were that they should get equal pay for filling men's places, and that when the war heroes returned home they should cease work and resume home duties. After placing on record the Federation's protest against compulsory military service, the report urged that whenever the franchise was dealt with the bravery and sacrifice of the women should be recognised and justice done to them by giving them the freedom men claimed for themselves.

The Chairman announced that following upon the conferences held by the Federation on the question of military service, copies of a resolution protesting against compulsory measures had been forwarded to various Yorkshire Members of Parliament. The replies received included one from Sir William Middlebrook, who wrote stating that the assurances given by the Prime Minister of the safeguards to be inserted in the Military Service Bill would reassure the members of the Federation. "It is an extremely serious struggle," the letter proceeded, "in which we are engaged, and the need for using all available powers for gaining victory renders it necessary to suspend for the time being many convictions, however distasteful such a course may be to those like ourselves who value most highly our voluntary system." A reply which would astonish the delegates had also been received from Sir William Priestley. This read as follows:—"I am directed by Sir William Priestley to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of your favour of recent date in reference to conscription, and to assure you that the same shall receive his careful and prompt attention after the war is won." To his mind, the Chairman said, that was a direct insult to the organised workers of Bradford, who would leave no stone unturned to see that when the next General Election came Sir William Priestley would not have a seat in East Bradford. (Hear, hear.) It was a cowardly reply to any body of workers. Sir William was only a public representative, and he ought to treat the members of the Federation with the same courtesy that he expected from other people.

Mr. Rowan (Mexborough) said he liked calling a spade a spade, and there were those in the country who agreed with compulsory service. Sir William Priestley had given them a direct answer, and it was better to give a direct answer than evade the point and stroke the backs of people. They could not call a man a coward for giving a direct answer, and that was the only good point in the letter.

Mr. T. H. Gill (York) said the matter immediately concerned the trade unionists of Bradford, and he moved that copies of the correspondence be sent to the Bradford Trades Council with a view to that body taking action in the matter.

Mr. G. H. Pearson (Leeds), who seconded the proposal, said the answer was by no means a straight one. It was a direct and deliberate insult to the workers.

The proposal was adopted.

DELEGATES AND A "DOWN TOOLS" POLICY.

The Chairman submitted a resolution regretting the passing of the Military Service (No. 2) Bill, and declaring the intention of the Federation to work for its repeal by all peaceful and constitutional means. He said that, personally, he would have liked to be in a position to have advocated a "down tools" policy, but he was bound to take the facts as they appeared to him. Whatever might be their invididual feelings, they could not fly in the face of the national party. Personally, he did not care for it, but they had to recognise what was the expressed opinion of the organised Labour party of the country.

Mr. C. A. Glyde (Bradford) seconded the resolution.

Mr. Gill (York) complained that no previous notice had been given of the resolution, and he, for one, had no mandate from his Council how to vote. At the present moment they could hardly say where they were with regard to the matter, for with the passing of the Bill the situation had changed considerably since their last conference. He did not like to be in a neutral position, but he would have to be neutral that day.

The resolution was carried with four dissentients, several delegates abstaining from voting.

Mr. J. S. Armitage (Huddersfield), who moved a resolution calling for the complete withdrawal of the Munitions Act, said that so great was the unrest among the trades concerned that only the complete withdrawal of the measure could satisfy the democracy. The Act was being used for political ends, and in its amended state it did not make things much better. It more [illegible] at the present moment they could hardly say where they were with regard to the matter, for with the passing of the Bill the situation had changed considerably since their last conference. He did not like to be in a neutral position, but he would have to be neutral that day.

The resolution was carried with four dissentients, several delegates abstaining from voting.

Mr. J. S. Armitage (Huddersfield), who moved a resolution calling for the complete withdrawal of the Munitions Act, said that so great was the unrest among the trades concerned that only the complete withdrawal of the measure could satisfy the democracy. The Act was being used for political ends, and in its amended state it did not make things much better in some respects. There were such things as Orders in Council, and there was nothing in the amendments that prevented Orders in Council.

Mr. G. Hutchinson (York), who seconded, said he was a member of the Local Munitions Tribunal in York, and his experience of the Act was that it was most unsatisfactory. It was time they took a definite stand in the matter.

Mr. C. A. Glyde (Bradford) complained of the restrictions that were being imposed upon the country by the Government, and said that, whether he got six months' imprisonment or not, he desired to make the statement that any member of his class who worked in a munitions factory for less than 30s. a week for an ordinary working week was justified in striking in order to get a living wage of 30s.

The resolution was adopted.

The Influx of Women into Industry.

A resolution demanding industrial equality of men and women, and calling upon the trade union movement to prevent employers from using women to lower the standard hitherto obtained by organised workers, was moved by Mr. C. Whitwam (Huddersfield), who said that the resolution embodied a principle that textile workers had been agitating for long before war broke out.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Jenkins (Spen Valley), supported by Mr. G. H. Pearson (Leeds), and adopted, as also was a resolution urging that preparations be made for a national campaign for an eight hours working day.

Certain grievances of the clerical staff of the Great Central Railway Company were aired by Mr. Gill (York), who moved a resolution urging that guarantees be given the Railway Clerks' Association that no member of the staff will be interfered with because of his or her membership in the Association. Mr. Gill said that more women had been introduced on to the railways than into any other industry, and in numerous cases they had been brought in to do work previously done by men at less than half the wages received by the men.

Mr. Riley (Selby) seconded, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. Brewer (Wakefield) moved a resolution strongly deprecating the action of the West Riding Asylum authorities in placing female nurses in charge of male patients, and calling for an immediate reversion from a course that was physically, morally, and economically bad. Mr. Brewer said that nurses were refusing to do the work simply because from a physical point of view they were helpless to deal with male patients. On account of the war, 110 male attendants had left the Wakefield Asylum to go, many of them, into the military hospitals. Surely, women nurses would be more capable of dealing with sane soldiers than insane asylum patients. Another point was that the nurses were only getting two-thirds of the pay the male attendants received.

Mr. Gill (York) seconded, and the resolution was adopted.

The Chairman, introducing what he termed an urgent question, said that no section of the community had made greater sacrifices than had the organised workers of the country. There was scarcely a vestige of organised labour left now, but some employers were going a step further. They were now attempting to exploit child labour. Some time ago the Bradford Chamber of Commerce asked the local education authority to revise the school-leaving age on the ground that a certain percentage of machinery was standing for want of labour. To its credit, the Education Committee declined the request. Bradford was one of the black spots of England so far as child labour was concerned. They had something like 6,000 half-timers in the city. The Chamber of Commerce had now appealed to the Board of Trade, and on Wednesday last two factory inspectors appeared before the Education Committee to ascertain why they had refused to reduce the school-leaving age. That was not the duty of factory inspectors. The shortage of labour was not due to the lack of half-time labour, for there were more half-timers in Bradford this year than ever before in the history of the city. He moved that the Executive be empowered to go into the question, with a view to a county conference being held to consider the matter.

The proposal was agreed to.

It was decided to hold the next meeting at Mexborough in July, and the following were appointed to vacancies on the Executive:—Mr. Gill (York), Mr. Greenfield (Shipley), Mr. Rowan (Mexborough), and Mr. Calvert (Wakefield).

The Labour Leader 11-1-16 679/32 679

THE CAMPAIGN IN THE COUNTRY.

RISING TIDE OF INDIGNATION AND REVOLT.

The introduction of the Thin-End-of-the-Wedge Bill has aroused a great and widespread opposition. All the varying forces against Conscription are rapidly coming together, and a solid movement of enormous dimensions is developing.

British liberty must not be surrendered on so slender a pretext, even under the cover of a war professedly fought to safeguard it. Men and women of all shades of opinion, differing widely in their interpretations of the war and in their conceptions of Britain's part in it, feel this so strongly that they are sinking their differences and uniting their strength to meet the militarism at home, which would like to raise itself upon the Prussian model.

If the Conscriptionists persist, if they continue to hold the majority view in the Cabinet, and if Parliament sanctions the measure, the country will be the scene of a struggle as determined as the Chartist struggles of the last century. Liberty dies hard.

The campaign against the Bill has already aroused enthusiasm throughout the country. The firm resolve of the Labour Conference has filled the ranks of liberty with a new hope, and the spirit of resolute resistance to this attempt to militarise our national life is spreading like fire through town and village.

The campaign has already assumed proportions which indicate the power of the opposition, and no government with the minutest sense of responsibility can ignore the situation which is being created by this, its crowning act of folly. The opposition is growing in volume every hour. The campaign is strengthening every day. Our readers will appreciate the strength of the movement from the review we give here of the position in the country.

A POWERFUL DEPUTATION.

On Monday night an influential deputation, representing various political, social, and religious organisations, attended the House of Commons to lay before the members who are resisting the Bill the reasons for the opposition of those represented by the deputation. Among many representative persons the following were either present or had expressed their concurrence with the objects of the deputation: Mr. Clifford Allen, Professor Andrews, Councillor W. H. Ayles, Mr. Harrison Barrow, the Rev. S. Beddow, Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mr. Fred Bramley, Mr. A. Fenner Brockway, Mr. Barrow Cadbury, Dr. Clifford, Mr. G. D. H. Cole, Miss Llewellyn Davies, Mrs. Despard, Mr. J. A. Hobson, Mr. J. H. Hudson, Councillor J. W. Kneeshaw, Mr. George Lansbury, Mr. F. W. Pethick Lawrence, Miss Mary Macarthur, Miss Catherine Marshall, Mr. H. W. Massingham (Editor of the Nation), Rev. Stanley Mellor, Mr. J. S. Middleton, Rev. Dr. Orchard, Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, Rev. Richard Roberts, Rev. G. T. Sadler, Dr. Alfred Salter, Miss Olive Schreiner, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, Mr. John Turner, and Mr. Robert Williams.

Mr. J. A. Hobson, referring to Mr. Asquith's stipulation, said there was already evidence that there would be no "general consent" but at least a powerful minority, and he complained that no serious analysis of the figures upon which the Bill was based had been made. Miss Catherine Marshall expressed the views of the women's organisations, and Mr. Clifford Allen spoke for the conscientious objectors, pointing out that the exemption proposals were quite inadequate. He said the conscientious objector was opposed root and branch to the whole measure and did not intend to centre his attention upon that part of the Bill concerning himself.

NATIONAL CENTRAL COUNCIL.

This very influential deputation has now formed itself into a National Council, to co-ordinate and maintain the agitation against the Bill in the country. Local committees which are formed to oppose the Bill should work in co-operation with this Council, who will supply speakers and provide literature of all kinds.

All communications should be addressed to H. N. Langdon Davies, 18, Bride Lane, London, E.C.

THE STRENGTH OF MANCHESTER.

In Manchester a strong Central Committee [illegible] way Guild, the National Industrial and Professional Women's Suffrage Society, and the Women's International League "to take immediate steps to organise a vigorous campaign against the Military Service (No. 2) Bill."

This committee is speedily getting to work. It is intended to hold dinner-hour meetings outside the large works in the district. In a communication signed by representatives of the organisations mentioned, it is stated that publication of the terms of the Bill has intensified the opposition of Labour, since it is clear that it involves the application of industrial compulsion. "The feeling throughout the Labour and Trade Union Movement in Manchester and Salford is very strong, and drastic action is threatened should this measure of the Government be enacted and put into operation. . . . The opposition in Manchester and Salford is widespread, determined, and powerful, and it will take every course open to it to defeat the attempt to impose compulsion upon the country."

At a delegate Conference called by the Committee, a resolution, to use every means to oppose compulsory service, was carried by an overwhelming majority. The delegates present numbered 200 and only nine voted against the motion.

CENTRAL COUNCIL FOR GLOUCESTER.

A conference of the anti-Conscription forces in Gloucester has been called for Saturday with the object of establishing a No-Conscription Council representative of all organisations and individuals who are of opinion that the passing of this measure would be a violation of the rights of freedom so long enjoyed by this country, and would constitute a grave menace to the social progress of the nation and the world. Several organisations, including the Trades and Labour Council, have appointed their delegates to the conference.

YORKSHIRE RESOLVES UPON ACTION.

The Yorkshire I.L.P. Divisional Council has circulated all the branches in the Yorkshire area, calling upon them immediately to initiate or co-operate in the formation of local anti-Compulsion Committees to be composed of all organisations in favour of opposing compulsion.

The Huddersfield Trades Council, I.L.P., and B.S.P. have decided to form a local council to organise opinion against the passing of the Compulsory Service Bill.

A Conference, under the auspices of the Yorkshire Federation of Trades Councils, sat at Bradford on Saturday. The Secretary of the Bradford Trades and Labour Council, Mr. Walter Barber, presided over 145 delegates, representing Trades Councils from all over Yorkshire. With only one dissentient, the Conference adopted this resolution: "That this Conference, representing the Trade Unions of Yorkshire, believing that the object of the Conscriptionists is not a fuller supply of soldiers, but the cheapening of soldiers and the military control of industry, and is therefore a menace to the working classes, especially the organised workers, resolves to take such action as is necessary to prevent the passing into law of the Military Service Bill now before Parliament."

VIGOROUS ACTION IN THE MIDLANDS.

The Birmingham and Midlands No-Conscription Council is conducting a very vigorous campaign. Many thousand of leaflets have been distributed during the last few days throughout the whole area. Four of the members rose from their beds at 5 a.m. last Saturday to give leaflets to the men going into the big works in their district. The demands for literature have far exceeded the supply.

Every Trades Council and Labour Party in the kingdom has been made acquainted with the resolution passed by the Birmingham Trades and Labour Council, and has been asked to go and do likewise. They have also been supplied with a list of quotations from the Conscriptionists which shows what those gentlemen are after.

Arrangements are now well in hand for a literature campaign on quite a gigantic scale, and along other lines the agitation is moving rapidly. Birmingham and the Midlands will render a good account of itself.

NONCONFORMIST OPPOSITION.

A large body of Nonconformists is coming out into the open against the bill.

chairman of the N.U.R., presiding, said he had never attended any national conference that was more generally representative than was the special Trade Union Congress. With the exception of the miners, it was safe to say that every industry in the country affiliated with the national bodies was represented at that Congress. He would say to those who alleged that the vote was not representative of Trade Unionists that, taking away the whole of the vote of the Independent Labour Party and of the Trades Councils and local Labour Parties—organisations which were affiliated and entitled to be present and to vote—and leaving only the purely Trade Union vote, there was a majority of over a million for the resolution that was carried. That was his answer to those who, if the vote had gone the other way, would have claimed it as one of the largest votes that had ever been given in the history of the Trade Unions.

He was sorry that representative Labour men should have attempted to belittle the Congress, because some of them were the very people who desired the Conference and helped to bring it into being, and if they were manly they ought to accept the decision of the Congress.

A resolution approving of the Congress decision was adopted with 19 dissentients, and finally the following motion was carried by over 100 votes to 8:

> That this meeting, representing the organised Labour forces of Stockport, hereby records its appreciation of the fine stand made by Mr. A. Bellamy against Conscription in any form, and especially against the Military Service (No. 2) Bill, at the Special Congress at London, and also heartily endorses the vote against the Bill given by Mr. G. J. Wardle, M.P.

ENDORSEMENT FROM LEEDS.

The Leeds Labour Party met on Sunday afternoon to hear the report of the President, Mr. Harold E. Clay, who was the delegate to the Labour Conference in London. In the course of a long discussion on the situation, an amendment in favour of Compulsory Service was defeated, and the meeting later passed a resolution endorsing the National Congress resolution. Another resolution was carried, recommending Labour members of Parliament to secure the holding up of the Compulsion Bill for at least three months, and an extension of the time for attestation under the group system to the same period.

MEN OF MILITARY AGE RESIST.

A meeting of men of military age in Leeds and District was held in Leeds on Friday evening. Unanimously the meeting passed a resolution regretting the introduction of the Military Service (No. 2) Bill, believing that it is neither necessary nor justifiable and is an infringement of the right of freedom of conscience, and asking the Government to withdraw it. The meeting pledged itself individually and collectively, should the Bill become law, to assist to the utmost of its power all who for conscience sake withstand its provisions, and to resist the enactment by refusing to take part in the prosecution of the war.

RESISTANCE OF LABOUR COUNCILS.

Strong opposition to the Military Service Bill is expressed in a resolution passed at a special delegate meeting of the Borough of Camberwell Trades and Labour Council representing 4,000 organised workers. The members of the House of Commons, and the Labour Party in particular, are urged to "fight the Bill in all its stages and so save the country from the hands of the British Junkers and the curse of militarism." Instruction was given to the executive to arrange public protests against the Bill and to the delegates present to inform the members of the various societies affiliated to the Council that the Council will endeavour to assist any members who may resist such an Act.

The Blackburn Trades and Labour Council has declared against the Bill by 54 votes against 11.

The Battersea Labour League deeply regrets the introduction of the Bill and records its firm opposition to any measure of compulsion.

The Carnarvonshire Labour Council at the third annual conference expressed its opposition to every form of compulsory service, both [illegible]

ing Committee and purporting to be "representative of all political parties." Arrangements were made for effective opposition to the Bill in the district.

TRADE UNION DETERMINATION.

The Executive Council of the Building Workers' Industrial Union resolves to support the attitude against Conscription taken by the Labour Conference and appeals to all its members to give it their unanimous support in the action it may take. Firm resolutions of opposition to the Bill come from the following organisations:

Liverpool Branch of the National Union of Bookbinders and Machine Rulers.

Stratford Branch of the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen.

Ebbw Vale Branch of the National Union of Railwaymen.

No. 4 Branch of the National Amalgamated Society of House and Ship Painters and Decorators.

London West Branch of the Society of Amalgamated Toolmakers.

Newport No. 1 Branch of the N.U.R.

THE I.L.P. AT WORK.

The I.L.P. branches all over the country may be relied upon to organise a strong resistance to this attempt to suffocate British liberty. Public meetings in many districts have already been held; others are in preparation. Many more will be organised as the agitation gathers impetus, and the volume of protest will grow, if the effort is persisted in, until it will become a storm which will give our Jingoes reason to wish they had never tampered with the rights of the people under cover of a war for liberty. Resolutions of determined opposition have reached us during the last few days from:

Conference of the Scottish I.L.P.
Newbury I.L.P.
Stockport I.L.P.
Stapleford and Sandiacre I.L.P. (Public meeting: Unanimous).
Northampton I.L.P.
Rotten Park (Birmingham) I.L.P.
Gillingham I.L.P.
Lewisham I.L.P.
Kirkby-in-Ashfield I.L.P.
Erdington Labour Church (Public meeting: Unanimous).
Edinburgh I.L.P. (public meeting, unanimous).
Edinburgh Central I.L.P.
Lewisham I.L.P.
Macclesfield I.L.P.
Galashiels I.L.P.
Jarrow I.L.P.

THE N-C.F. RESOLVE.

The attitude of the No-Conscription Fellowship needs no comment. A number of branches, however, have expressed their solemn determination to resist in definite resolutions. Such resolutions reach us from:

Streatham Branch of the N.-C.F.
Cardiff group of the N.-C.F.
Tottenham Branch of the N.-C.F.
Nelson Branch of the N.-C.F.
Wandsworth and Wimbledon N.-C.F.

The Portsmouth Branch of the N.-C.F., viewing with alarm the danger to the liberty of the subject in the attempt to force compulsory military service on the people, urges the Labour movement to demand the withdrawal of the Bill, and, if necessary, to call for a cessation of all organised Labour in the country.

THE GENERAL PROTEST.

From other sources we have received expressions of protest. Resolutions against the Bill have reached us from the following organisations:

The National Peace Council.
Executive Council of the Liverpool Socialist Sunday Schools Union.
Bristol Socialist Sunday School (public meeting).
Independent Church at Llandrillo, Merioneth (Minister, I. T. Davies).
Dundee Free Religious Movement.
Women's International League (Public meeting: Five dissentients).

COMPULSION FOR FOREIGN SERVICE

Sir,—There is an additional reason, one which I have not yet seen in print, why this Compulsion Bill should not become law. A study of [illegible]

The Labour Leader 14-1-16 6 79/52 679

THE CAMPAIGN IN THE COUNTRY.

RISING TIDE OF INDIGNATION AND REVOLT.

The introduction of the Thin-End-of-the-Wedge Bill has aroused a great and widespread opposition. All the varying forces against Conscription are rapidly coming together, and a solid movement of enormous dimensions is developing.

British liberty must not be surrendered on so slender a pretext, even under the cover of a war professedly fought to safeguard it. Men and women of all shades of opinion, differing widely in their interpretations of the war and in their conceptions of Britain's part in it, feel this so strongly that they are sinking their differences and uniting their strength to meet the militarism at home, which would like to raise itself upon the Prussian model.

If the Conscriptionists persist, if they continue to hold the majority view in the Cabinet, and if Parliament sanctions the measure, the country will be the scene of a struggle as determined as the Chartist struggles of the last century. Liberty dies hard.

The campaign against the Bill has already aroused enthusiasm throughout the country. The firm resolve of the Labour Conference has filled the ranks of liberty with a new hope, and the spirit of resolute resistance to this attempt to militarise our national life is spreading like fire through town and village.

The campaign has already assumed proportions which indicate the power of the opposition, and no government with the minutest sense of responsibility can ignore the situation which is being created by this, its crowning act of folly. The opposition is growing in volume every hour. The campaign is strengthening every day. Our readers will appreciate the strength of the movement from the review we give here of the position in the country.

A POWERFUL DEPUTATION.

On Monday night an influential deputation, representing various political, social, and religious organisations, attended the House of Commons to lay before the members who are resisting the Bill the reasons for the opposition of those represented by the deputation. Among many representative persons the following were either present or had expressed their concurrence with the objects of the deputation: Mr. Clifford Allen, Professor Andrews, Councillor W. H. Ayles, Mr. Harrison Barrow, the Rev. S. Beddow, Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mr. Fred Bramley, Mr. A. Fenner Brockway, Mr. Barrow Cadbury, Dr. Clifford, Mr. G. D. H. Cole, Miss Llewellyn Davies, Mrs. Despard, Mr. J. A. Hobson, Mr. J. H. Hudson, Councillor J. W. Kneeshaw, Mr. George Lansbury, Mr. F. W. Pethick Lawrence, Miss Mary Macarthur, Miss Catherine Marshall, Mr. H. W. Massingham (Editor of the Nation), Rev. Stanley Mellor, Mr. J. S. Middleton, Rev. Dr. Orchard, Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, Rev. Richard Roberts, Rev. G. T. Sadler, Dr. Alfred Salter, Miss Olive Schreiner, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, Mr. John Turner, and Mr. Robert Williams.

Mr. J. A. Hobson, referring to Mr. Asquith's stipulation, said there was already evidence that there would be no "general consent" but at least a powerful minority, and he complained that no serious analysis of the figures upon which the Bill was based had been made. Miss Catherine Marshall expressed the views of the women's organisations, and Mr. Clifford Allen spoke for the conscientious objectors, pointing out that the exemption proposals were quite inadequate. He said the conscientious objector was opposed root and branch to the whole measure and did not intend to centre his attention upon that part of the Bill concerning himself.

NATIONAL CENTRAL COUNCIL.

This very influential deputation has now formed itself into a National Council, to coordinate and maintain the agitation against the Bill in the country. Local committees which are formed to oppose the Bill should way Guild, the National Industrial and Professional Women's Suffrage Society, and the Women's International League "to take immediate steps to organise a vigorous campaign against the Military Service (No. 2) Bill."

This committee is speedily getting to work. It is intended to hold dinner-hour meetings outside the large works in the district. In a communication signed by representatives of the organisations mentioned, it is stated that publication of the terms of the Bill has intensified the opposition of Labour, since it is clear that it involves the application of industrial compulsion. "The feeling throughout the Labour and Trade Union Movement in Manchester and Salford is very strong, and drastic action is threatened should this measure of the Government be enacted and put into operation. . . . The opposition in Manchester and Salford is widespread, determined, and powerful, and it will take every course open to it to defeat the attempt to impose compulsion upon the country."

At a delegate Conference called by the Committee, a resolution, to use every means to oppose compulsory service, was carried by an overwhelming majority. The delegates present numbered 200 and only nine voted against the motion.

CENTRAL COUNCIL FOR GLOUCESTER.

A conference of the anti-Conscription forces in Gloucester has been called for Saturday with the object of establishing a No-Conscription Council representative of all organisations and individuals who are of opinion that the passing of this measure would be a violation of the rights of freedom so long enjoyed by this country, and would constitute a grave menace to the social progress of the nation and the world. Several organisations, including the Trades and Labour Council, have appointed their delegates to the conference.

YORKSHIRE RESOLVES UPON ACTION.

The Yorkshire I.L.P. Divisional Council has circulated all the branches in the Yorkshire area, calling upon them immediately to initiate or co-operate in the formation of local anti-Compulsion Committees to be composed of all organisations in favour of opposing compulsion.

The Huddersfield Trades Council, I.L.P., and B.S.P. have decided to form a local council to organise opinion against the passing of the Compulsory Service Bill.

A Conference, under the auspices of the Yorkshire Federation of Trades Councils, sat at Bradford on Saturday. The Secretary of the Bradford Trades and Labour Council, Mr. Walter Barber, presided over 145 delegates, representing Trades Councils from all over Yorkshire. With only one dissentient, the Conference adopted this resolution: "That this Conference, representing the Trade Unions of Yorkshire, believing that the object of the Conscriptionists is not a fuller supply of soldiers, but the cheapening of soldiers and the military control of industry, and is therefore a menace to the working classes, especially the organised workers, resolves to take such action as is necessary to prevent the passing into law of the Military Service Bill now before Parliament."

VIGOROUS ACTION IN THE MIDLANDS.

The Birmingham and Midlands No-Conscription Council is conducting a very vigorous campaign. Many thousand of leaflets have been distributed during the last few days throughout the whole area. Four of the members rose from their beds at 5 a.m. last Saturday to give leaflets to the men going into the big works in their district. The demands for literature have far exceeded the supply.

Every Trades Council and Labour Party in the kingdom has been made acquainted with the resolution passed by the Birmingham Trades and Labour Council, and has been asked to go and do likewise. They have also been supplied with a list of quotations from the Conscriptionists which shows what those chairman of the N.U.R., presiding, said he had never attended any national conference that was more generally representative than was the special Trade Union Congress. With the exception of the miners, it was safe to say that every industry in the country affiliated with the national bodies was represented at that Congress. He would say to those who alleged that the vote was not representative of Trade Unionists that, taking away the whole of the vote of the Independent Labour Party and of the Trades Councils and local Labour Parties—organisations which were affiliated and entitled to be present and to vote—and leaving only the purely Trade Union vote, there was a majority of over a million for the resolution that was carried. That was his answer to those who, if the vote had gone the other way, would have claimed it as one of the largest votes that had ever been given in the history of the Trade Unions.

He was sorry that representative Labour men should have attempted to belittle the Congress, because some of them were the very people who desired the Conference and helped to bring it into being, and if they were manly they ought to accept the decision of the Congress.

A resolution approving of the Congress decision was adopted with 19 dissentients, and finally the following motion was carried by over 100 votes to 8:

> That this meeting, representing the organised Labour forces of Stockport, hereby records its appreciation of the fine stand made by Mr. A. Bellamy against Conscription in any form, and especially against the Military Service (No. 2) Bill, at the Special Congress at London, and also heartily endorses the vote against the Bill given by Mr. G. J. Wardle, M.P.

ENDORSEMENT FROM LEEDS.

The Leeds Labour Party met on Sunday afternoon to hear the report of the President, Mr. Harold E. Clay, who was the delegate to the Labour Conference in London. In the course of a long discussion on the situation, an amendment in favour of Compulsory Service was defeated, and the meeting later passed a resolution endorsing the National Congress resolution. Another resolution was carried, recommending Labour members of Parliament to secure the holding up of the Compulsion Bill for at least three months, and an extension of the time for attestation under the group system to the same period.

MEN OF MILITARY AGE RESIST.

A meeting of men of military age in Leeds and District was held in Leeds on Friday evening. Unanimously the meeting passed a resolution regretting the introduction of the Military Service (No. 2) Bill, believing that it is neither necessary nor justifiable and is an infringement of the right of freedom of conscience, and asking the Government to withdraw it. The meeting pledged itself individually and collectively, should the Bill become law, to assist to the utmost of its power all who for conscience sake withstand its provisions, and to resist the enactment by refusing to take part in the prosecution of the war.

RESISTANCE OF LABOUR COUNCILS.

Strong opposition to the Military Service Bill is expressed in a resolution passed at a special delegate meeting of the Borough of Camberwell Trades and Labour Council representing 4,000 organised workers. The members of the House of Commons, and the Labour Party in particular, are urged to "fight the Bill in all its stages and so save the country from the hands of the British Junkers and the curse of militarism." Instruction was given to the executive to arrange public protests against the Bill and to the delegates present to inform the members of the various societies affiliated to the Council that the Council will endeavour to assist any members who may resist such an Act.

ing Committee and purporting to be "representative of all political parties." Arrangements were made for effective opposition to the Bill in the district.

TRADE UNION DETERMINATION.

The Executive Council of the Building Workers' Industrial Union resolves to support the attitude against Conscription taken by the Labour Conference and appeals to all its members to give it their unanimous support in the action it may take. Firm resolutions of opposition to the Bill come from the following organisations:

Liverpool Branch of the National Union of Bookbinders and Machine Rulers.

Stratford Branch of the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen.

Ebbw Vale Branch of the National Union of Railwaymen.

No. 4 Branch of the National Amalgamated Society of House and Ship Painters and Decorators.

London West Branch of the Society of Amalgamated Toolmakers.

Newport No. 1 Branch of the N.U.R.

THE I.L.P. AT WORK.

The I.L.P. branches all over the country may be relied upon to organise a strong resistance to this attempt to suffocate British liberty. Public meetings in many districts have already been held; others are in preparation. Many more will be organised as the agitation gathers impetus, and the volume of protest will grow, if the effort is persisted in, until it will become a storm which will give our Jingoes reason to wish they had never tampered with the rights of the people under cover of a war for liberty. Resolutions of determined opposition have reached us during the last few days from:

Conference of the Scottish I.L.P.
Newbury I.L.P.
Stockport I.L.P.
Stapleford and Sandiacre I.L.P. (Public meeting: Unanimous).
Northampton I.L.P.
Rotten Park (Birmingham) I.L.P.
Gillingham I.L.P.
Lewisham I.L.P.
Kirkby-in-Ashfield I.L.P.
Erdington Labour Church (Public meeting: Unanimous).
Edinburgh I.L.P. (public meeting, unanimous).
Edinburgh Central I.L.P.
Lewisham I.L.P.
Macclesfield I.L.P.
Galashiels I.L.P.
Jarrow I.L.P.

THE N.-C.F. RESOLVE.

The attitude of the No-Conscription Fellowship needs no comment. A number of branches, however, have expressed their solemn determination to resist in definite resolutions. Such resolutions reach us from:

Streatham Branch of the N.-C.F.
Cardiff group of the N.-C.F.
Tottenham Branch of the N.-C.F.
Nelson Branch of the N.-C.F.
Wandsworth and Wimbledon N.-C.F.

The Portsmouth Branch of the N.-C.F., viewing with alarm the danger to the liberty of the subject in the attempt to force compulsory military service on the people, urges the Labour movement to demand the withdrawal of the Bill, and, if necessary, to call for a cessation of all organised Labour in the country.

THE GENERAL PROTEST.

From other sources we have received expressions of protest. Resolutions against the Bill have reached us from the following organisations:

The National Peace Council.
Executive Council of the Liverpool Socialist Sunday Schools Union.
Bristol Socialist Sunday School (public meeting).
Independent Church at Llandrillo, Merioneth (Minister, J. T. Davies).

raise itself upon the Prussian model.

If the Conscriptionists persist, if they continue to hold the majority view in the Cabinet, and if Parliament sanctions the measure, the country will be the scene of a struggle as determined as the Chartist struggles of the last century. Liberty dies hard.

The campaign against the Bill has already aroused enthusiasm throughout the country. The firm resolve of the Labour Conference has filled the ranks of liberty with a new hope, and the spirit of resolute resistance to this attempt to militarise our national life is spreading like fire through town and village.

The campaign has already assumed proportions which indicate the power of the opposition, and no government with the minutest sense of responsibility can ignore the situation which is being created by this, its crowning act of folly. The opposition is growing in volume every hour. The campaign is strengthening every day. Our readers will appreciate the strength of the movement from the review we give here of the position in the country.

A POWERFUL DEPUTATION.

On Monday night an influential deputation, representing various political, social, and religious organisations, attended the House of Commons to lay before the members who are resisting the Bill the reasons for the opposition of those represented by the deputation. Among many representative persons the following were either present or had expressed their concurrence with the objects of the deputation: Mr. Clifford Allen, Professor Andrews, Councillor W. H. Ayles, Mr. Harrison Barrow, the Rev. S. Beddow, Miss Margaret Bondfield, Mr. Fred Bramley, Mr. A. Fenner Brockway, Mr. Barrow Cadbury, Dr. Clifford, Mr. G. D. H. Cole, Miss Llewellyn Davies, Mrs. Despard, Mr. J. A. Hobson, Mr. J. H. Hudson, Councillor J. W. Kneeshaw, Mr. George Lansbury, Mr. F. W. Pethick Lawrence, Miss Mary Macarthur, Miss Catherine Marshall, Mr. H. W. Massingham (Editor of the Nation), Rev. Stanley Mellor, Mr. J. S. Middleton, Rev. Dr. Orchard, Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, Rev. Richard Roberts, Rev. G. T. Sadler, Dr. Alfred Salter, Miss Olive Schreiner, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, Mr. John Turner, and Mr. Robert Williams.

Mr. J. A. Hobson, referring to Mr. Asquith's stipulation, said there was already evidence that there would be no "general consent" but at least a powerful minority, and he complained that no serious analysis of the figures upon which the Bill was based had been made. Miss Catherine Marshall expressed the views of the women's organisations, and Mr. Clifford Allen spoke for the conscientious objectors, pointing out that the exemption proposals were quite inadequate. He said the conscientious objector was opposed root and branch to the whole measure and did not intend to centre his attention upon that part of the Bill concerning himself.

NATIONAL CENTRAL COUNCIL.

This very influential deputation has now formed itself into a National Council, to co-ordinate and maintain the agitation against the Bill in the country. Local committees which are formed to oppose the Bill should work in co-operation with this Council, who will supply speakers and provide literature of all kinds.

All communications should be addressed to B. N. Langdon Davies, 18, Bride Lane, London, E.C.

THE STRENGTH OF MANCHESTER.

In Manchester a strong Central Committee has been formed, representative of the Manchester and Salford Trades and Labour Council, the Manchester and Salford Labour Party, the Manchester and Salford I.L.P. Federation, the Conscientious Objector's Group of the Society of Friends, the No-Conscription Fellowship, the Fellowship of Reconciliation, the Manchester and Salford Women's Trade Union Council, the Manchester and Salford Women's Trades and Labour Council, the Women's Co-operative Guild, the Women's Labour League, the Manchester Women's Adult Schools, the Manchester Women's Peace Society, the Stockport Women's Rail-chester and Salford is very strong, and drastic action is threatened should this measure of the Government be enacted and put into operation. . . . The opposition in Manchester and Salford is widespread, determined, and powerful, and it will take every course open to it to defeat the attempt to impose compulsion upon the country."

At a delegate Conference called by the Committee, a resolution, to use every means to oppose compulsory service, was carried by an overwhelming majority. The delegates present numbered 200 and only nine voted against the motion.

CENTRAL COUNCIL FOR GLOUCESTER.

A conference of the anti-Conscription forces in Gloucester has been called for Saturday with the object of establishing a No-Conscription Council representative of all organisations and individuals who are of opinion that the passing of this measure would be a violation of the rights of freedom so long enjoyed by this country, and would constitute a grave menace to the social progress of the nation and the world. Several organisations, including the Trades and Labour Council, have appointed their delegates to the conference.

YORKSHIRE RESOLVES UPON ACTION.

The Yorkshire I.L.P. Divisional Council has circulated all the branches in the Yorkshire area, calling upon them immediately to initiate or co-operate in the formation of local anti-Compulsion Committees to be composed of all organisations in favour of opposing compulsion.

The Huddersfield Trades Council, I.L.P., and B.S.P. have decided to form a local council to organise opinion against the passing of the Compulsory Service Bill.

A Conference, under the auspices of the Yorkshire Federation of Trades Councils, sat at Bradford on Saturday. The Secretary of the Bradford Trades and Labour Council, Mr. Walter Barber, presided over 145 delegates, representing Trades Councils from all over Yorkshire. With only one dissentient, the Conference adopted this resolution: "That this Conference, representing the Trade Unions of Yorkshire, believing that the object of the Conscriptionists is not a fuller supply of soldiers, but the cheapening of soldiers and the military control of industry, and is therefore a menace to the working classes, especially the organised workers, resolves to take such action as is necessary to prevent the passing into law of the Military Service Bill now before Parliament."

VIGOROUS ACTION IN THE MIDLANDS.

The Birmingham and Midlands No-Conscription Council is conducting a very vigorous campaign. Many thousand of leaflets have been distributed during the last few days throughout the whole area. Four of the members rose from their beds at 5 a.m. last Saturday to give leaflets to the men going into the big works in their district. The demands for literature have far exceeded the supply.

Every Trades Council and Labour Party in the kingdom has been made acquainted with the resolution passed by the Birmingham Trades and Labour Council, and has been asked to go and do likewise. They have also been supplied with a list of quotations from the Conscriptionists which shows what those gentlemen are after.

Arrangements are now well in hand for a literature campaign on quite a gigantic scale, and along other lines the agitation is moving rapidly. Birmingham and the Midlands will render a good account of itself.

NONCONFORMIST OPPOSITION.

A large body of Nonconformists is coming out into the open against the Bill.

They are led by Dr. Clifford and Dr. Campbell Morgan and other well-known Free Churchmen. A strong committee of Nonconformists opposed to compulsion has been formed in Manchester, and at a public meeting held on Tuesday evening a resolution against the Government Bill was carried by an overwhelming majority.

MR. BELLAMY ON THE CONGRESS.

A meeting, representing the organised Labour and Socialist bodies of Stockport, was held on Monday to discuss the Military Service (No. 2) Bill. Mr. A. Bellamy, the Union vote, there was a majority of over a million for the resolution that was carried. That was his answer to those who, if the vote had gone the other way, would have claimed it as one of the largest votes that had ever been given in the history of the Trade Unions.

He was sorry that representative Labour men should have attempted to belittle the Congress, because some of them were the very people who desired the Conference and helped to bring it into being, and if they were manly they ought to accept the decision of the Congress.

A resolution approving of the Congress decision was adopted with 19 dissentients, and finally the following motion was carried by over 100 votes to 8:

> That this meeting, representing the organised Labour forces of Stockport, hereby records its appreciation of the fine stand made by Mr. A. Bellamy against Conscription in any form, and especially against the Military Service (No. 2) Bill, at the Special Congress at London, and also heartily endorses the vote against the Bill given by Mr. G. J. Wardle, M.P.

ENDORSEMENT FROM LEEDS.

The Leeds Labour Party met on Sunday afternoon to hear the report of the President, Mr. Harold E. Clay, who was the delegate to the Labour Conference in London. In the course of a long discussion on the situation, an amendment in favour of Compulsory Service was defeated, and the meeting later passed a resolution endorsing the National Congress resolution. Another resolution was carried, recommending Labour members of Parliament to secure the holding up of the Compulsion Bill for at least three months, and an extension of the time for attestation under the group system to the same period.

MEN OF MILITARY AGE RESIST.

A meeting of men of military age in Leeds and District was held in Leeds on Friday evening. Unanimously the meeting passed a resolution regretting the introduction of the Military Service (No. 2) Bill, believing that it is neither necessary nor justifiable and is an infringement of the right of freedom of conscience, and asking the Government to withdraw it. The meeting pledged itself individually and collectively, should the Bill become law, to assist to the utmost of its power all who for conscience sake withstand its provisions, and to resist the enactment by refusing to take part in the prosecution of the war.

RESISTANCE OF LABOUR COUNCILS.

Strong opposition to the Military Service Bill is expressed in a resolution passed at a special delegate meeting of the Borough of Camberwell Trades and Labour Council representing 4,000 organised workers. The members of the House of Commons, and the Labour Party in particular, are urged to "fight the Bill in all its stages and so save the country from the hands of the British Junkers and the curse of militarism." Instruction was given to the executive to arrange public protests against the Bill and to the delegates present to inform the members of the various societies affiliated to the Council that the Council will endeavour to assist any members who may resist such an Act.

The Blackburn Trades and Labour Council has declared against the Bill by 54 votes against 11.

The Battersea Labour League deeply regrets the introduction of the Bill and records its firm opposition to any measure of compulsion.

The Carnarvonshire Labour Council at the third annual conference expressed its opposition to every form of compulsory service, both military and industrial, and its appreciation of the efforts of organised Labour in the country in upholding the voluntary system.

The Huddersfield and District Associated Trades and Labour Council, representing 58 societies and over 7,000 members, at a special meeting resolved to offer its uncompromising opposition to the Bill, and it recommends its affiliated bodies to consider means to prevent the Bill becoming operative. It also recognises the valuable aid rendered by Mr. A. J. Sherwell, M.P., by his opposition, and hopes he will continue it. It repudiates the telegram to Mr. Sherwell emanating from the Recruit-

Bookbinders and Machine Rulers.

Stratford Branch of the Associated Society of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen.

Ebbw Vale Branch of the National Union of Railwaymen.

No. 4 Branch of the National Amalgamated Society of House and Ship Painters and Decorators.

London West Branch of the Society of Amalgamated Toolmakers.

Newport No. 1 Branch of the N.U.R.

THE I.L.P. AT WORK.

The I.L.P. branches all over the country may be relied upon to organise a strong resistance to this attempt to suffocate British liberty. Public meetings in many districts have already been held; others are in preparation. Many more will be organised as the agitation gathers impetus, and the volume of protest will grow, if the effort is persisted in, until it will become a storm which will give our Jingoes reason to wish they had never tampered with the rights of the people under cover of a war for liberty. Resolutions of determined opposition have reached us during the last few days from:

Conference of the Scottish I.L.P.

Newbury I.L.P.

Stockport I.L.P.

Stapleford and Sandiacre I.L.P. (Public meeting: Unanimous).

Northampton I.L.P.

Rotten Park (Birmingham) I.L.P.

Gillingham I.L.P.

Lewisham I.L.P.

Kirkby-in-Ashfield I.L.P.

Erdington Labour Church (Public meeting: Unanimous).

Edinburgh I.L.P. (public meeting, unanimous).

Edinburgh Central I.L.P.

Lewisham I.L.P.

Macclesfield I.L.P.

Galashiels I.L.P.

Jarrow I.L.P.

THE N-C.F. RESOLVE.

The attitude of the No-Conscription Fellowship needs no comment. A number of branches, however, have expressed their solemn determination to resist in definite resolutions. Such resolutions reach us from:

Streatham Branch of the N.-C.F.

Cardiff group of the N.-C.F.

Tottenham Branch of the N.-C.F.

Nelson Branch of the N.-C.F.

Wandsworth and Wimbledon N.-C.F.

The Portsmouth Branch of the N.-C.F., viewing with alarm the danger to the liberty of the subject in the attempt to force compulsory military service on the people, urges the Labour movement to demand the withdrawal of the Bill, and, if necessary, to call for a cessation of all organised Labour in the country.

THE GENERAL PROTEST.

From other sources we have received expressions of protest. Resolutions against the Bill have reached us from the following organisations:

The National Peace Council.

Executive Council of the Liverpool Socialist Sunday Schools Union.

Bristol Socialist Sunday School (public meeting).

Independent Church at Llandrills, Merioneth (Minister, I. T. Davies).

Dundee Free Religious Movement.

Women's International League (Public meeting: Five dissentients).

COMPULSION FOR FOREIGN SERVICE

Sir,—There is an additional reason, one which I have not yet seen in print, why this Compulsion Bill should not become law. A study of the Bill will show that those soldiers (unmarried only—at present) who signed on for home service will be conscripted for general service. I understand that these men have had more persuasion than the ordinary man has had to enlist for foreign service. Obviously, then, these men who have still refused to sign for foreign service have vital objections to such a course. They have considered it their duty to defend their country, but they may object to taking part in a war which, as Mr. Buxton points out in the Daily News of January 8, would be aggressive.

The principle involved is vital—not only to these soldiers, but to the democracies of not this country alone, but of all Europe.—Yours, etc.,

L. Besanvalle.

LLOYD GEORGE ANGERS CLYDE WORKERS.

Mr. Lloyd George is apparently doing his utmost to fan into flame the fire of revolt on the Clyde. His conduct during his recent visit to Glasgow angered the men. His explanations of what occurred during the visit have angered them still more.

The Minister of Munitions will, it seems, stop at nothing to gain his own ends. In the House if Commons on January 5 he not only denied that he had received a hostile reception; he misrepresented almost to the degree of slander the men whom he had met in conference. Mr. George is a discredited man on Clydeside, and before long he will be a discredited man all over the country. Truth must prevail.

The majority of the Trade Union officials on the Clyde would have nothing to do with Mr. George on his recent visit, and only four officials took part in the Christmas Day conference. And yet the Minister of Munitions declares that "the meeting at Glasgow was organised by the Trade Unions"! The truth is, the conference was organised by the officials of the Ministry of Munitions, assisted by the four officials who broke away from the decision of the Clyde District Committee of the Federation of Engineering and Shipbuilding Trades. The Federation has agreed to publish a manifesto repudiating the action of these four officials. The conference was, as a matter of fact, attended by hundreds of men who had no connection with Trade Unions.

Replying to Mr. Pringle, Mr. George stated that the report of his meeting with the Parkhead shop stewards which appeared in the Forward was "absolutely untrue." Four of the Parkhead stewards, including Mr. David Kirkwood, the chairman of the conference, have sworn an affidavit before a Justice of the Peace stating that the Forward report is a true report, and before these notes appear in print the affidavit may have been produced in the House of Commons.

Speaking of the situation on the Clyde Mr. George said:

> The revolt was far more against the official leaders of Trade Unionism than against the Government. It was the trouble of a certain section of workmen. They were Syndicalists—some of them Socialists, but most of them Syndicalists—who had been trying to overthrow the official leaders of Trade Unionism for months and months before the war began. There was trouble over a strike which was repudiated by the Trade Union leaders. . . . They had formed an association of their own, and had run newspapers of their own, but they were not official Trade Union papers. . . . It was a powerful minority, and in some respects a very ably led minority. Mr. Kirkwood (a leading member of the Clyde Workers' Committee) was a very able man, an earnest and sincere man, but at any rate the men associated with him were in revolt against Trade Unionism.

In the above statement, which refers to the Clyde Workers' Committee, there are several untruths. First, it is alleged, "the revolt was far more against the official leaders of Trade Unionism than against the Government." The falsehood of this statement is proved by the fact that out of some thirty Union officials who were invited to take part in the Christmas Day Conference only four, as I have already said, responded. Writing of the meeting at which the officials decided to boycott the Conference, Mr. John Brown, the general secretary of the Associated Ironmoulders of Scotland, states in his January report:

> The meeting, however, almost unanimously decided to take no part in the organising of the conference to be held on Christmas Day. We understand that at least four trades broke away; but we hardly need say that the Ironmoulders remained loyal to the decision arrived at by the joint trades.

The revolt, then, was general on the part of the officials, and as a matter of fact the Clyde Workers' Committee attended the conference in opposition to the wishes of the officials.

Second: "They were Syndicalists—some of them Socialists, but most of them Syndicalists—who had been trying to overthrow the official leaders of Trade Unionism for months and months before the war began." That is absolutely untrue. There is no Syndicalist organisation on the Clyde, and a Syndicalist leader has written to the Scottish press repudiating Mr. George's allegation and pointing out that the Syndicalists have observed the industrial truce since the war began. Moreover, the Clyde Workers' Committee was only formed in February, 1915, and could not have been seeking to "overthrow the official leaders" for "months and months before the war began."

Third: "There was trouble over a strike which was repudiated by the Trade Union leaders." Another misstatement! Here reference is made to the engineers' strike in February, 1915, when the men "withdrew their labour" spontaneously as a protest against the delay of the employers in meeting their claim for an advance of 2d. an hour which should have been granted (in part or in whole) on January 9. It is true the men came out without the sanction of the executive, but the delegate conference of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, meeting after the strike, sanctioned it by deciding to pay benefits to the men who participated in the strike. The strike, therefore, although originally unofficial, was subsequently authorised.

Fourth: "They had formed an association of their own, and had run newspapers of their own, but they were not official Trade Union papers." It is true the shop stewards, who are officials of Trade Unions, have formed the Clyde Workers' Committee to organise and express the rank and file point of view, but the committee is in no way antagonistic to Trade Unionism. The committee had not "run newspapers of their own" until Monday last, when they issued The Clyde Worker, containing a reprint of the article for which the Forward was suppressed. The Clyde Worker is a modest four-page sheet, and if Lloyd George gets his way the first issue will be the last.

Fifth: "The men associated with him (Mr. Kirkwood) were in revolt against Trade Unionism." Another inaccuracy! The Clyde Workers' Committee is a genuine Trade Union organisation and membership of a Trade Union is a condition of membership. The delegates to the committee are appointed by the shop stewards in the various workshops, and their main business is to see that every workman is a member of a Trade Union. Had it not been for these shop stewards, all of whom are Union branch officials, the Munitions Act would have caused a slump in the membership of the several Unions, and more than one official has expressed his indebtedness to the shop stewards for their voluntary organising work. The following trades are at present represented on the committee:

> Amalgamated Society of Engineers, Amalgamated Society of Toolmakers, Boilermakers, Blacksmiths, Shipwrights, Coppersmiths, Brassfinishers, Patternmakers, Miners, Tinsmiths, Sheet-Iron Workers, Electricians, Joiners, Gas and General Workers' Union, Coopers, Steam Engine Fitters, Ironmoulders, School Teachers, National Federation of Women Workers.

According to Lloyd George, a committee representative of the above trades is out to destroy Trade Unionism! Could ignorance further go? The Clyde Workers' Committee is essentially a Trade Union organisation brought into being to safeguard Trade Unions, and because it is safeguarding Trade Unions Lloyd George is anxious to destroy it. He will fail.

The committee is not disturbed by Lloyd George's misrepresentations, for their followers know the truth. The committee has put vim into the rank and file; it has inspired them with hope; it has taught them how to use their strength. And the committee will yet live to see their antagonist discredited by the very weapons he has employed in vain to discredit it.

MYNER COLLIER.

Russian Union Suppressed in London: Open Letter to British Trade Unionists

Comrades,—In the present grave situation in which the Russian Seamen's Union finds itself, I appeal, as secretary of the Union, to your feelings of justice and Labour solidarity. In your country, on December 20, 1915, the representatives of Scotland Yard raided the office of the Union and seized all the papers, stamps, and documents, practically depriving the organisation of the means of carrying on its work. At the same time, in my absence, my private dwelling, which served as address for the official organ of the Union, was also raided. Not only were the copies of the paper seized, but also documents referring to a whole series of years, my manuscripts, even of ten years ago, my private correspondence, my personal documents. The agents of Scotland Yard declared that they would leave me in freedom for a time but that they may arrest me at any time, according to what they may find in my papers. Needless to say, all this has been not only highly inconvenient to myself, but also damaging to the work of the Union.

A particularly serious aspect of the affair is that it can have particularly unfortunate consequences for persons residing in Russia, with whom myself and the organisation corresponded, and whose names are now in the possession of the authorities.

Comrades, when I left Antwerp in October, 1914, three days before its fall, our organisation which had its headquarters there, resolved to go to England. In coming here, we entrusted our fate and the fate of thousands of our comrades in Russia to free Britain. We thought that the British laws would grant us a temporary asylum, such as we had enjoyed in hospitable little Belgium. We might have gone elsewhere, but we remembered the traditions of the English people in the past, its laws in the present. We trusted England!

You will remember that our Comrade Arles (Adamovitch) was handed over to the Russian Government while he was under British rule in Alexandria. We are thus subjected to a second attack from a Government which we had pictured as the defender of freedom. We ask why we should be subjected to insult and persecution in the heart of freedom-loving England such as no British Trade Union would tolerate? The activities of our Union do not differ in essence from those of British Trade Unions. They violate no law of this country. You have here the right of industrial combination, we in Russia have no such rights. Your Unions exist openly at home; we are compelled to fix the centres of our activities in foreign countries. The Russian Combination Law of March 4, 1906, deprives the Russian seamen of the right of organisation, and compels us against our will to be exiles from our native land. Prior to this law, the Russian Seamen's Union was a force to be reckoned with by the shipping companies, and even after the law representatives of the Union were consulted by the Ministry of Commerce. The movement has not ceased with the passing of the law. It has sprung to life ever anew, now on one sea and now on another, on this river and on that. The terrible condition of the ships, the low wages, the absence of every right, the application to the seamen of the ancient laws of Peter the Great; these are the springs of permanence of the Russian seamen's movement.

The Russian Government cannot charge the Seamen's Union with being a political organisation. Its activities are of a purely industrial character. This is clearly laid down in our Central Rules.

Comrades, in appealing to you I will allow myself, as one of the delegates to the International Transport Workers' Conference in 1915, to remind you of the resolution that was carried at that Conference and endorsed at the British Trade Union Congress in September of the same year. You pledged yourselves to defend the just cause of our comrade, Adamovitch, and of the Black Sea sailors. Adamovitch has, unfortunately, been condemned, but the organisation with which he was connected remains, and has sought again protection under the British Flag. Whatever we, as a Union, have done, we have done openly without violating the laws of this country. We accept full responsibility for our actions whatever may happen. We are aware that the path of the active workers of the Russian seamen's movement is a painful and difficult one. But we look in confidence to you, our fellow Trade Unionists, in Great Britain. You will not stand aside in the trials that have befallen us; you will turn away the sword that your country has for a second time drawn over our heads.

With fraternal greetings,

DMITRI ANITCHKIN,

Sec. of the Russian Seamen's Union.

15, Well Street, Cable Street,
London, E. Jan. 4, 1916.

Suppression of "Forward": Military and Police in Control.

Forward, contrary to expectations, was not published last week-end, the military authorities not having relaxed their control of the paper, and at the time of writing (Tuesday) it is not known if the Forward will be published this week either. On Monday the Civic Press, Limited, the printers of Forward, were allowed to resume "commercial work" under the supervision of the military, and two police officers were stationed on the premises to censor the printing matter! At that juncture the Forward was still in the hands of the militarists.

It is understood that the military officers found nothing in the Forward premises to warrant a prosecution of the editor or publisher, and in the circumstances it appears, despite denials, the paper was seized because the issue of January 1 contained a report of [illegible] in Forward which incurred the displeasure of the Minister of Munitions. The Worker has been circulated by the shop stewards in every workshop in the Clyde area, so that the truth will be known, despite Lloyd George.

The LABOUR LEADER and the Herald published the same facts about Lloyd George's Clyde visit as the Forward, although in a condensed form, and it is rather strange they should not have been proceeded against also. Is Lloyd George taking the Labour papers one at a time?

The Vanguard, the monthly organ of the Glasgow members of the British Socialist Party, has been suppressed absolutely by the order of Lieutenant-General Sir John Spencer Ewart, acting as the competent military authority under the Defence of the Realm Act. [illegible] the Forward nor the Vanguard has published matter affecting military or naval interests, and the official action against them, without cause, reason, or explanation, should not be tolerated in a free land.

If the workers lose their press they are completely at the mercy of the unscrupulous capitalists, who own and control the majority of the ordinary papers.

HOSTILITY TO C[illegible]PULSION.

We have just received [illegible] of a resolution carried at a conference of [illegible] Scottish Federation of the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks [illegible] Government in favour of Conscription, and calls upon the Executive Committee to declare a policy of active hostility. It further calls upon the Committee to declare that it will assist financially all our members who oppose Conscription.

It was seconded by Mr. Hugh Gemmell, of Glasgow, and supported by other speakers, married members declaring their determination to stand with the single young men in the fight. The resolution was carried without a single dissenting voice, and a telegram announcing the decision was immediately despatched to the Prime Minister. A resolution from Muirchurgh condemning Conscription and calling for the national ownership of land and the industrial resources of the country was [illegible] by the four officials who broke away from the decision of the Clyde District Committee of the Federation of Engineering and Shipbuilding Trades. The Federation has agreed to publish a manifesto repudiating the action of these four officials. The conference was, as a matter of fact, attended by hundreds of men who had no connection with Trade Unions.

Replying to Mr. Pringle, Mr. George stated that the report of his meeting with the Parkhead shop stewards which appeared in the Forward was "absolutely untrue." Four of the Parkhead stewards, including Mr. David Kirkwood, the chairman of the conference, have sworn an affidavit before a Justice of the Peace stating that the Forward report is a true report, and before these notes appear in print the affidavit may have been produced in the House of Commons.

Speaking of the situation on the Clyde Mr. George said:

Union officials who were invited to take part in the Christmas Day Conference only four, as I have already said, responded. Writing of the meeting at which the officials decided to boycott the Conference, Mr. John Brown, the general secretary of the Associated Ironmoulders of Scotland, states in his January report:

> The meeting, however, almost unanimously decided to take no part in the organising of the conference to be held on Christmas Day. We understand that at least four trades broke away; but we hardly need say that the Ironmoulders remained loyal to the decision arrived at by the joint trades.

The revolt, then, was general on the part of the officials, and as a matter of fact the Clyde Workers' Committee attended the conference in opposition to the wishes of the officials.

Second: "They were Syndicalists—some of [illegible] without the sanction of the executive, but the delegate conference of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers, meeting after the strike, sanctioned it by deciding to pay benefits to the men who participated in the strike. The strike, therefore, although originally unofficial, was subsequently authorised.

Fourth: "They had formed an association of their own, and had run newspapers of their own, but they were not official Trade Union papers." It is true the shop stewards, who are officials of Trade Unions, have formed the Clyde Workers' Committee to organise and express the rank and file point of view, but the committee is in no way antagonistic to Trade Unionism. The committee had not "run newspapers of their own" until Monday last, when they issued The Clyde Worker, containing a reprint of the article for which the Forward was suppressed. The Clyde Worker is a modest four-page sheet, and if Lloyd George [illegible] Joiners, Gas and General Workers' Union, Coopers, Steam Engine Fitters, Ironmoulders, School Teachers, National Federation of Women Workers.

According to Lloyd George, a committee representative of the above trades is out to destroy Trade Unionism! Could ignorance further go? The Clyde Workers' Committee is essentially a Trade Union organisation brought into being to safeguard Trade Unions, and because it is safeguarding Trade Unions Lloyd George is anxious to destroy it. He will fail.

The committee is not disturbed by Lloyd George's misrepresentations, for their followers know the truth. The committee has put vim into the rank and file; it has inspired them with hope; it has taught them how to use their strength. And the committee will yet live to see their antagonist discredited by the very weapons he has employed in vain to discredit it.

MYNER COLLIER.

Russian Union Suppressed in London: Open Letter to British Trade Unionists

Comrades,—In the present grave situation in which the Russian Seamen's Union finds itself, I appeal, as secretary of the Union, to your feelings of justice and Labour solidarity. In your country, on December 29, 1915, the representatives of Scotland Yard raided the office of the Union and seized all the papers, stamps, and documents, practically depriving the organisation of the means of carrying on its work. At the same time, in my absence, my private dwelling, which served as address for the official organ of the Union, was also raided. Not only were the copies of the paper seized, but also documents referring to a whole series of years, my manuscripts, even of ten years ago, my private correspondence, my personal documents. The agents of Scotland Yard declared that they would leave me in freedom for a time but that they may arrest me at any time, according to what they may find in my papers. Needless to say, all this has been not only highly inconvenient to myself, but also damaging to the work of the Union.

A particularly serious aspect of the affair is that it can have particularly unfortunate consequences for persons residing in Russia, with whom myself and the organisation corresponded, and whose names are now in the possession of the authorities.

Comrades, when I left Antwerp in October, 1914, three days before its fall, our organisation which had its headquarters there, resolved to go to England. In coming here, we entrusted our fate and the fate of thousands of our comrades in Russia to free Britain. We thought that the British laws would grant us a temporary asylum, such as we had enjoyed in hospitable little Belgium. We might have gone elsewhere, but we remembered the traditions of the English people in the past, its laws in the present. We trusted England!

You will remember that our Comrade Arles (Adamovitch) was handed over to the Russian Government while he was under British rule in Alexandria. We are thus subjected to a second attack from a Government which we had pictured as the defender of freedom. We ask why we should be subjected to insult and persecution in the heart of freedom-loving England such as no British Trade Union would tolerate? The activities of our Union do not differ in essence from those of British Trade Unions. They violate no law of this country. You have here the right of industrial combination, we in Russia have no such rights. Your Unions exist openly at home; we are compelled to fix the centres of our activities in foreign countries. The Russian Combination Law of March 4, 1906, deprives the Russian seamen of the right of organisation, and compels us against our will to be exiles from our native land. Prior to this law, the Russian Seamen's Union was a force to be reckoned with by the shipping companies, and even after the law representatives of the Union were consulted by the Ministry of Commerce. The movement has not ceased with the passing of the law. It has sprung to life ever anew, now on one sea and now on another, on this river and on that. The terrible condition of the ships, the low wages, the absence of every right, the application to the seamen of the ancient laws of Peter the Great; these are the springs of permanence of the Russian seamen's movement.

The Russian Government cannot charge the Seamen's Union with being a political organisation. Its activities are of a purely industrial character. This is clearly laid down in our Central Rules.

Comrades, in appealing to you I will allow myself, as one of the delegates to the International Transport Workers' Conference in 1915, to remind you of the resolution that was carried at that Conference and endorsed at the British Trade Union Congress in September of the same year. You pledged yourselves to defend the just cause of our comrade, Adamovitch, and of the Black Sea sailors. Adamovitch has, unfortunately, been condemned, but the organisation with which he was connected remains, and has sought again protection under the British Flag. Whatever we, as a Union, have done, we have done openly without violating the laws of this country. We accept full responsibility for our actions whatever may happen. We are aware that the path of the active workers of the Russian seamen's movement is a painful and difficult one. But we look in confidence to you, our fellow Trade Unionists, in Great Britain. You will not stand aside in the trials that have befallen us; you will turn away the sword that your country has for a second time drawn over our heads.

With fraternal greetings,
DMITRI ANITCHKIN,
Sec. of the Russian Seamen's Union.
15, Well Street, Cable Street,
London, E. Jan. 4, 1916.

Suppression of "Forward": Military and Police in Control.

Forward, contrary to expectations, was not published last week-end, the military authorities not having relaxed their control of the paper, and at the time of writing (Tuesday) it is not known if the Forward will be published this week either. On Monday the Civic Press, Limited, the printers of Forward, were allowed to resume "commercial work" under the supervision of the military, and two police officers were stationed on the premises to censor the printing matter! At that juncture the Forward was still in the hands of the militarists.

It is understood that the military officers found nothing in the Forward premises to warrant a prosecution of the editor or publisher, and in the circumstances it appears, despite denials, the paper was seized because the issue of January 1 contained a report of Lloyd George's conference with the Trade Union officials at Glasgow. Those "in the know" state the report hurt the dignity of Lloyd George, and that the paper was suppressed accordingly.

The Clyde Workers' Committee have asserted the right of freedom of the press by publishing a modest paper called The Worker, which contains a reprint in full of the article in Forward which incurred the displeasure of the Minister of Munitions. The Worker has been circulated by the shop stewards in every workshop in the Clyde area, so that the truth will be known, despite Lloyd George.

The LABOUR LEADER and the Herald published the same facts about Lloyd George's Clyde visit as the Forward, although in a condensed form, and it is rather strange they should not have been proceeded against also. Is Lloyd George taking the Labour papers one at a time?

The Vanguard, the monthly organ of the Glasgow members of the British Socialist Party, has been suppressed absolutely by the order of Lieutenant-General Sir John Spencer Ewart, acting as the competent military authority under the Defence of the Realm Act. The fifth issue of the Vanguard, an anti-war issue, was in type in the Civic Press when the order for suppression was made. It may rise again under a new name.

The seizure of Forward and the suppression of the Vanguard indicates that the Defence of the Realm Act is used to suppress political opinion, and makes it plain that, although we are a long way from Russia geographically, we are close to Russia politically. Neither the Forward nor the Vanguard has published matter affecting military or naval interests, and the official action against them, without cause, reason, or explanation, should not be tolerated in a free land.

If the workers lose their press they are completely at the mercy of the unscrupulous capitalists, who own and control the majority of the ordinary papers.

HOSTILITY TO COMPULSION.

We have just received [illegible] of a resolution carried at a conference of the Scottish Federation of the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and Clerks at Dunfermline on January 1. The delegates present represented 14,500 members. Mr. Morgan, of Dundee, in a very earnest and strong speech, moved the following composite resolution from the Midlands and Glasgow District Councils:

> That this Conference, believing that compulsory service is vitally opposed to the true interests of the workers, emphatically protests against the means being used to influence the Government in favour of Conscription, and calls upon the Executive Committee to declare a policy of active hostility. It further calls upon the Committee to declare that it will assist financially all our members who oppose Conscription.

It was seconded by Mr. Hugh Gemmell, of Glasgow, and supported by other speakers, married members declaring their determination to stand with the single young men in the fight. The resolution was carried without a single dissenting voice, and a telegram announcing the decision was immediately dispatched to the Prime Minister. A resolution from Musselburgh condemning Conscription and calling for the national ownership of land and the industrial resources of the country was also carried unanimously.

ANOTHER DONATION FROM "J.O."

We have received 10s. from "J.O.," which he asks us to devote to assisting Forward, "or whatever you think will be most useful and most needed at the moment." We have forwarded it to Forward.

The Nation 15/1/16

Sir Alfred Mond suggested the Free Trade doctrine that Germany's pre-war commercial successes were due less to her tariffs than her technical and financial skill, and advised that we should reform our deficiencies and conservatism in both these great activities. Mr. Runciman adopted and illustrated this view, but he also seemed to lean to some unspecified policy of commercial war, under which Germany would recover her lost prosperity last of all the great European nations. But when the war is over, can there be impoverishment in any part of Europe in which we shall not share? This is rather elementary doctrine.

* * *

Mr. Pringle moved the adjournment of the House to call attention to the suppression of "Forward" at the instance of the Ministry of Munitions, which was presumably attacked by it in a too truthful report of Mr. Lloyd George's speech at Glasgow and its reception. Mr. George is said not to have been personally responsible for the seizure of the paper. His defence of it revealed no crime in the offending issue (which contained a defence of the war) beyond the candid report. Against earlier issues Mr. George alleged attacks on the King, complaints of the low wages of soldiers (not different in substance from Mr. George's famous pleas for agricultural laborers), and other disrespectful but not seditious utterances. On the worst interpretation of them—i.e., that they were designed to stop the output of munitions—these issues might have been seized; on the best, the Government were wise in taking no notice of them. But neither course excused the suppression of the candid friendship which inspired the impounded number.

* * *

For sheer impudence it would be hard to beat the Austrian demand for safe conduct of their citizens from India to Europe, coupled with a demand for a kind of most-favored-nation treatment. The Austrian Government required that the wives and children of Austrian subjects about to be repatriated from India should be specially protected against the piracy which Germany and Austria-Hungary have instituted. A host of comforts and attentions were demanded, the Austro-Hungarian Government holding us responsible for the lives and welfare of these passengers, "the majority of whom are better-class people." This gave Sir Edward Grey his opening, and his reply showed the touch of a master. "I am at a loss to know," he said, "why 'better-class people' should be thought more entitled to protection from submarine attack than any other non-combatants; but, however that may be, the only danger of the character indicated which threatens any of the passengers of the 'Golconda' is one for which the Austro-Hungarian and German Governments are alone responsible." It was almost superfluous to suggest that if Austria wants to save her subjects from being murdered at sea, she should not murder them.

* * *

From a financial point of view—if pure finance can be separated from questions of expenditure and debt—the war is just now proceeding very satisfactorily. The weather-gauge by which the credit of the belligerents can best be judged is the rate of exchange. Before the war, the bill on London was everything. It provided a sort of international currency. London banked for the world, and the governing rates of exchange were the London rates. The war has altered all this. If London had been neutral, as it was in the wars of 1859, 1866, and 1870, it would have remained the exchange centre, and its foreign banking business would have been greater than ever. As it is, all our financial ties with Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey have been severed, and nearly all the other exchange[illegible] been more or less disturbed by the fact that it is i[illegible]sible to export enough gold to rectify the unfavora[illegible] balance of trade.

* * *

The result is that, instead of being one great exchange centre, with a sort of monopoly, the City of London has had to part with a great deal of its business. Thus Amsterdam and Copenhagen are in a highly favorable position to mediate between German and neutral money. Geneva likewise does a good deal of exchange business for France and Italy, as well as for Germany and Austria. Then, again, the enormous profits made by New York bankers and the companies associated with them who manufacture for the Allies (greatly assisted, of course, by the recent reform of American banking and currency laws) have enabled New York to claim quite a new position as a banking and exchange rival of London, especially as regards the eastern trade with Japan and China, the South American trade, and the Scandinavian trade. When the war began, the United States was heavily indebted to Great Britain. Every month alters this, for month by month the United States is lending money to us and buying back American securities.

* * *

For the purposes of the war we are concerned mainly with the relative credit of London and Berlin. The London exchanges mark the value and purchasing power of the paper sovereign in foreign countries, the Berlin exchanges mark the value and purchasing power of the paper mark in foreign countries. We say the paper sovereign, because (as has been pointed out) it is impossible to export week by week and month by month the amount of gold necessary to balance the decline of British exports as compared with the enormous volume of imports. For the first six months of the war, when our average daily expenditure was, perhaps, about one-third of what it is now, British currency maintained itself wonderfully well, while the paper mark depreciated about 14 per cent. Then came the Orders in Council and the food blockade of Germany, which gave the German Government an excuse to adopt the bread ticket system and to impose compulsory economy on the whole nation. Then for six months the German exchange remained fairly steady, and the strain of increasing expenditure began to make itself felt upon Allied finance.

* * *

The most serious feature was the decline in the purchasing power of the paper sovereign in New York, which at last fell in the autumn from a normal $4.86 to $4.60. To meet the situation, Mr. McKenna raised an Anglo-French exchange loan in New York, which loan has since been assisted by further banking credits. The result has been, so far, extremely satisfactory, and on Wednesday our exchange rate rose to $4.77, the best that has been recorded for six months. This is very nearly "gold point," allowing for the present excessively high rate of freight and insurance. On the other hand, since the adoption of a more scientific system of blockade and since the opening up of communications with Turkey and Bulgaria, which of course causes a further drain on Germany, the position of the mark has rapidly deteriorated. In peace time, four German marks will buy rather less than a dollar, namely 95¼ cents, in New York. During the last few days they have been worth less than three-quarters of a dollar, say from 73 to 74 cents—a depreciation of about 22 per cent. Meanwhile the Austrian kroner has fallen 35 per cent. in New York. In Switzerland the mark has fallen about 25 per cent., and in Holland, where Germany has heavy debts to pay, the depreciation was recently no less than 38 per cent.

679/33

679/33

Politics and Affairs.

THE REAL NATIONAL QUESTION.

NEITHER the Prime Minister nor any other member of the Government will, we think, measure the real hostility to the Conscription Bill by the size of the vote against the second reading. Submission is one thing; "consent" another. The House of Commons is indeed an essentially dependent, even a will-less, body. It cannot stand up against the Executive, which while depriving it of knowledge and withdrawing its national leaders into its arms, saps its control of the war or of the national destinies by appeals either to its patriotism, or its fears, or its merely selfish will to live on through the period of the war. Under a war conducted by a Coalition, ruling a House subject to payment of members, there can be no independent Parliament, and the nation need not look for it. Nevertheless, we believe that its mental attitude to the Conscription Bill remains essentially unchanged. The Liberal, Labor, and Irish National Parties dislike and fear it; the Conservative and Ulster combination applaud it, and wish for more of it. Every means suggested by the perils of the hour has been taken to suppress the first feeling and to exalt the second, but the House makes its approach to Committee as profoundly divided in mind and conscience as when the project was first launched. A Government which works without reason, but leans ever more heavily to an autocratic conduct of the war, must expect no more than the mechanical response it asks for. To enthusiasm and ideas it makes no further appeal, and the moral unity of the nation it has thrown away. Willing sacrifice, yielded on an unprecedented scale of generosity, is now replaced by forced service; and as the nation braces itself for a further effort in its gigantic enterprise, it will nurse a growing grievance against its governors. If statesmanship be the art of maintaining the full resources of the people at their highest pitch of efficiency, and of keeping classes together as the promise and symbol of that national power, the Ministry has failed in that primary duty, and its failure is the measure of the ensuing shrinkage of the real force of England.

For what is it that this Bill accomplishes? It is full enough of the spirit of militarism. Mr. Asquith still proposes the narrow conception of it as a bare redemption of his pledge to certain categories of married men. Its scope is far wider than this. From a given moment of the day or night it places under the shadow and forms of military law for an indefinite period, not merely the single class of civilians at whom it aims, but workmen of the "starred," the "indispensable," or the "reserved" classes. Its agents may sweep in retired soldiers (including officers), volunteers who had offered themselves for service before last August, or men having no special capacity for soldiering, who have during the past months put their special knowledge at their country's disposal and been repelled by its officials. It changes without warning the terms of enlistment for thousands of Territorials, officers and privates, who may be competent only for home service, but may now be held liable to despatch to any of the foreign theatres of war. It sets up military tribunals for the decision of questions of conscience, and enables them to bar out a final appeal against their findings. All over the country perfectly patriotic men may, without realising it, find themselves liable to the pains and penalties of deserters. Here, indeed, are great disturbances of our life, proposed in the dark as to the facts, without a statement of war policy, and with no more reason given than the vague plea of military necessity. Are the material results commensurate? The plan of the Bill gathers in old soldiers far past the best military age, which is not beyond thirty, and rejects young ones in their prime. It works on a theory of the existence of a poor-spirited and therefore an unmilitary class, the mere leavings of the tremendous rally of our public spirit, and creates new obstacles to the training and efficiency of the units to which these "slackers" are to be attached. It must gravely unsettle men doing national work by threatening them with the periodical withdrawal of their certificates of exemption from soldiering. It is thus an almost worthless improvization of a system which cannot be grafted on to free service, and which, if it is to be used at all, should be developed in months and years of organization on a definite plan. It is quite undemocratic, for the new conscripts will form no part of a national levy, and will have nothing in common with Cromwell's levies, who are quoted in excuse for this strange act of irrational discrimination. Hand-to-mouth politics are in it; and politics will destroy it. "Married slackers next" is already a newspaper cry; and the only defence of Conscription in which a scrap of logic or fine feeling resides appears in the speeches of Sir Edward Carson and Mr. Ellis Griffith, who are whole-hearted Conscriptionists. Yet this scheme, the botched issue of a mere Cabinet difficulty, must pass into law, and in the act will carry away with it the right of criticism or even of defence of the great liberty that has disappeared in the hour of its signal vindication. We have already established the practice of secret trial under the Defence of the Realm Act, varied by the practice of "interning" men and women without formal trial at all. It is hard to say how much of England will now be under military law, but we can well imagine how little the rest of England will know about it. Let the Liberal and Labor Parties at least use the coming week to see to it that the great German war does not end, as the great French war ended, amid a general proscription of liberty. A new society, badly organized, ill at ease or at war with itself, seething with fresh ideas, but possessing only an obscure vision of its industrial and economic life and social duties, is not a body into which can safely be thrown a mixed scheme of military and industrial compulsion, unaccompanied by any preparation of the mind and will, any such thrilling call of belief and passion as filled the national armies of the early French Republic.

The danger of a great extension of the Bill, and therefore of military law, appears in one significant ge of the debate and in one omission from the Prime Minister's speech. As we have said, Mr. Asquith treated it in the main as a redemption of his pledge to the married men who put themselves into Lord Derby's hands, but he said nothing as to a future extension to the younger married men. The Minister of Education, however, said, or suggested, a good deal. Mr. Henderson repeated in a less direct form his reference at the Labor Congress to the covering authority of Lord Kitchener for a demand for a million and a half of men before the end of 1916. It is not the business of a Minister, least of all of a representative of Labor, to shield himself behind an uncritical acceptance of a military dictum of this sort. The soldier, of course, asks for all he can get, and more than he thinks he can get. It does not follow that he ought to have them. The Government has to examine the competing demands of the Navy, industry, and finance. But the point is that this number of men cannot be obtained under the Derby scheme, with its annexe of limited compulsion. It is doubtful whether even a million can be so raised. But a call for an extra half-million is the prelude to a new measure of conscription.

The Nation 15/1/16 6F9/34

Is it possible that the Cabinet are committed to this extension, that they have before them, as the military correspondent of the "Times" suggests, the skeleton of an army which requires to be clothed with this amount of new flesh and blood? If so, not only is the Conscription Bill a blind, but we shall withdraw from our industries half a million more men than, in the view of the President of the Board of Trade, they can afford to yield or the nation can afford to pay for. If Mr. Runciman is right, this fact, stated in plain terms of the obligations of this war, spells bankruptcy of men and money. Do the Government realize it? Have they decided to risk it? If so, the Conscription Bill is the prolific parent of many children in a shaken household. On what plan are we conducting this war? We are thinking in numbers and in soldiers only. We are an island, and we are not thinking of the Navy. The roots of our power in peace and in war are financial, and we are not thinking of expenditure. We are industrials, and we are letting industry be throttled. How can we go on in this total lack of prevision? The Northcliffe press counsels compulsory thrift. We are not averse, but there must be some thrift in soldiering, too, or the country, bleeding at every pore, will exhaust its vitality in the moment of the most urgent call upon it.

INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION.

It requires no microscopic study of the "Military Service Bill" to discover that there is a Bill within the Bill. It purports to be an emergency measure of military conscription. It is from that standpoint the gravest departure from our traditions of personal liberty which this country has known for a century. But it may be urged with some plausibility that the number of persons whose liberties it directly threatens in this war is not large. Its advocates do not estimate them at more han two or three hundred thousand. We question ourselves if they even reach one hundred thousand. They fall into two classes, and if the conscientious objector were really exempted, as he certainly is not, the victim class would consist solely of the genuine "slackers," a type of person whom we take to be negligible in numbers, and useless as a military factor; too mean alike for sympathy or compulsion.

If the Bill were this and nothing more than this, the motive behind it would be barely intelligible. It would commend itself only to those who wish to compel for the pleasure of compelling. We are as a nation a somewhat realistic people, and the fanaticism which counts it a triumph to impose the principle of compulsion is neither widely spread nor deeply seated. The Bill has a more intelligible and a more realistic effect than any abstract wish to assert a principle. Far broader, and far more extensive than any direct effect which it can have in compelling a few thousands of unwilling and unworthy single men to enter the ranks of the Army, will be its indirect but immediate result on the vast numbers of single men who will be exempted. This class is incomparably larger than the other, and it deserves, not merely in right, but in sentiment, the respect which every good citizen may claim. It consists, not merely of those who are physically disqualified for military service, but of those who are held to have a prior duty to their dependents, and also of all the "indispensable" workers, the men in "reserved" occupations, and the "starred" munition workers, if they chance to be unmarried and under forty. The change which the Bill makes in the status of this class is as large and as menacing as the change which it makes in the status of the single "slacker" who can plead no valid claim to exemption. He, indeed, becomes, when he is called up, a soldier. The man who is left behind remains (unless he is physically unfit) always liable to the call to arms, and his exemption depends entirely on his being permitted to perform the "reserved" or "starred" or "indispensable" functions in which he is engaged. That in nine cases out of ten depends in its turn on the good-will of an employer.

Let us see how this arrangement works in practice. A single man is, let us say, a "shop-steward" in a Clyde munition-works. For some offence of word or deed which brings him under suspicion by the foreman he becomes a marked man. At present he may be dismissed from his employment, and if the Munitions Court backs his employer, he will be refused a "leaving certificate," with the result that he cannot hope to obtain similar work while the war lasts. If this Bill becomes law as it stands, a much more serious consequence follows. His certificate of exemption was given to him on certain conditions—that he continued to work at his "starred" trade. He is now required by Clause 3 (2) to give notice that the conditions under which his certificate was granted have changed, under a penalty of a fine which may reach £50, and so soon as his certificate lapses, he becomes automatically a recruit "enlisted and transferred to the Reserve." The case of such a man when he did eventually reach his battalion would not be enviable, if he happened to find himself under a Captain Campbell, already itching to hang him up by his thumbs. The effect of this provision is not, however, to be measured by the fate of men who may actually be discharged from their present tasks and handed over to the Army. It is a threat levied at all who remain, a weapon of discipline placed in the hands of every employer and every foreman. Every demand for better conditions or higher wages, every protest against a lowering of conditions, every complaint of harsh or unfair usage, may, and in bad "shops" will, be met with the answer, "Say that again, and I'll send you to the trenches." In its bearing on the munitions worker this doubtless was the effect which the Minister of Munitions produced. This is, at last, the industrial compulsion with which he threatened the men in his Lancashire speeches. There are provisions in the Bill which will enable any director of the Munitions Department to apply the screw with a nice gradation of pressure. "Any Government Department" may issue its certificate of exemption to "men or classes or bodies of men" at its pleasure, and these certificates may be "conditional" or "temporary." It would be in order, we suppose, to make them conditional on "good conduct," and renewable every month. By this ingenious scheme the exempted single man who is to-day a civilian, will be to-morrow a conscript on ticket-of-leave. The effect of this industrial conscription is, however, much wider than this. It will apply to the rebellious munition-makers on the Clyde, but it will also apply to every "indispensable" clerk in a City office, to every agricultural laborer or miner or textile worker who is exempted as a worker in a reserved trade. Let the banker dismiss his clerk, the farmer his dairyman, or the coal company its miner, and he loses at one stroke his status as a civilian. Every private employer of a single man under forty has under this Bill the effective power to send him to the trenches, and with it the right to conduct his business with this weapon of control in his hand. Is he minded to increase working-hours or reduce wages? He has only to point out to the single men whom he employs that the alternatives are submission or the barracks. This is a system not so much of compulsory military service, as of industrial serfdom imposed with the military service as the modern substitute for old-world galley or plantation.

The Nation 15/1/16 OFFIS4

Easy-going people may reply that the "objectionable features" of this Bill can readily be removed in Committee. That is the view of the Prime Minister, and we shall look with close scrutiny to his proposals for eliminating them. But these objectionable features, on our reading of events, are the core and essence of the Bill. There is only one sure way of preventing the use of the threat of conscription as an employer's weapon. It is to strike out bodily the provision for "conditional" and "temporary" exemptions. The courts must make up their minds once for all, in each individual case, whether a man is "indispensable," or "reserved," or "starred," and once exempted, a man's exemption must hold for the duration of the war. That plan might not be altogether logical, but in practice it can cause no appreciable loss to the necessary or military services. The demand for workers will increase as the war goes on, and the supply will diminish. There is no real probability that even a few hundred men, who to-morrow are certified to be doing necessary work, will be unemployed or unproductively employed before the war ends. The risk of a little leakage is as nothing to the certainty that the expedients for stopping it will sweep away the industrial liberties of a whole class.

OUR NEW MILITARY MODEL.

It does not seem to be realized that voluntary and enforced enlistment cannot be conducted upon the same terms. While men freely offered themselves in their millions to the military authorities, they did so presumably with their eyes open to the use that would be made of them. They knew, or they should have known, whether they were being used to the best advantage. It was open to them to remain at home if they were dissatisfied with the use which was being made of soldiers. If they felt that the general idea of recruiting such large armies was detrimental to the best interests of the Allies, or if they felt that men were being wasted by bad leadership, or upon unprofitable ventures, they were under no compulsion to hazard their own lives. But now that a measure of compulsion is before the country, it must be pointed out that the Government cannot have impressed recruits on the same terms as voluntary recruits. They become at once sole trustees for the lives they venture, and we, who are left, the accountants with the duty of exacting the strictest account not only of the way these lives are to be used, but of the great voluntary armies into which this enfeebling element is thrown.

There is an odd feeling abroad that life does not matter. Under the normal rhythm of a democracy the individual life is a paramount concern of the community. The first and greatest victory of Germany so far is that the incidence has been moved, and now men—almost all beyond military age or else already in the army—speak in the same way of sacrificing the lives of others to the nebulous god whom they call "to-morrow," as the ordinary Prussian speaks of sacrificing them to the State. It seems to be completely forgotten that we have the right over one life only—our own. Our right over even that is subject to certain limitations. We have no right whatever over the lives of others, except in so far as it is committed to us by those who are most concerned. If we are to assume the right to expose them to the last risk, then we must be sure that they are not exposed unnecessarily or uselessly. It is a solemn duty, an inevitable correlative of the power we are assuming.

It is a strange thing that no one has been inspired to inquire into the falling off in recruiting during the early summer. It is, of course, quite clear that the recruiting must fall off as the last free and available strata were reached. This seems to be a fact which has been insufficiently realized; but it is none the less true. Clearly there must come a time when, under any conditions, thousands must sink to hundreds and hundreds to tens. But apart from this it is fairly obvious that the circulation of men from the front had something to do with it. Even in the South African War, photograp were frequently destroyed as being detrimental to recruiting. It does not seem to be realized that men have heard tales—now commonplaces—which certainly do not inspire a rush to the colors. In the first days of the war, apart from the inevitable risks, the men were used with a certain parsimonious care. Those were the times when an army corps represented a considerable reinforcement. Even units were useful, and required a certain hoarding. It was under that wise and prudent régime that the bulk of the voluntary armies enlisted. But when the numbers began to be available, the generals at once began to plunge a little. Neuve Chapelle was the first of these battles in which success became our greatest danger. They seem to follow a well-marked scheme, a carefully thought-out plan, an almost pedantically accurate and successful beginning, then a middle portion, in which the whole thing went to pieces, and finally a withdrawal from the bulk or the most important of the ground won, with heavy loss.

The Nation 15/1/16 671/35

What does this mean? Surely, anyone asked to report upon it would reply with the one word, incompetence. There is no question about the value of the units we can furnish. They have been and are splendid as raw material. They supply an abundance of the crude mass of force, but they do not achieve its effect, because they lack the essential constituent of direction. We are not concerned now with the constant failure which our attacks represent so much as with this one most pertinent fact, that each of these abortive successes means the frittering away of numbers of lives, and it is those who have thus bungled in the past who are now asking for greater, indeed, unlimited numbers. To the plea of necessity which they allege, we might answer by pointing out that nothing could be more necessary than to secure first-rate leaders. Can anyone doubt that with really first-rate leaders, Neuve Chapelle, the May advance, and the Loos advance would all have meant an immeasurably greater gain and a far smaller loss? It is a fact frequently pointed out in German newspapers that whereas it is usual to suffer most casualties in the first advance, we suffer most afterwards. Those who are in command of our destinies at present seem to have definitely abandoned the idea of winning except by numbers.

It seems to be generally admitted that those who are recruited now are to be used as drafts, and not to create new units. This is the reply that is made to those who suggest that there are no officers for the new armies. It is a momentous conclusion to have reached, for that is what confronts the poor handful of "slackers" and the married men whom they will purchase. They will have none of the corporate spirit that new units gather. They will be trained rapidly and sent out to make up the wastage in other battalions. They will thus swell the corporate chance of victory at an enhanced personal risk; for men who have as little training as they will be comparatively helpless as soon as the immediate control of the officers is removed. Moreover, it is a question which has even been in dispute how far such "raw" material can be assimilated without detriment to the value of the unit. There are officers who tell of units so reformed that the men do not know each other, or their officers, and the officers do not know [illegible] system is open to that objection, and it is one w[illegible] already been operative. And how much greater influ[illegible] will it have as the last few shrinking individuals a[illegible] incorporated against their will.

And this decision for an unlimited recruitment is to be taken when a dispatch has just been issued which emphasizes every fault of direction, and shows the peril of entrusting numbers to the bulk of our leaders. It contains stories of men going far ahead of their companions and being cut off, of whole brigades allowed to remain supine while the enemy was being reinforced and regunned, and of the breakdown in the supply of such necessities as water. And there are again stories behind of unpardonable blundering, of men suffering from dysentery fed upon bread and jam because all other things were lacking, and so on. We seem to know of no other sort of victory than this through the defeat which we encourage by our blundering. We are told that we have made promises in certain quarters. But if the Government is planning to win in spite of this blundering, it means that the force we recruit will only be worth about half its face value. Would it not then be far better to concentrate upon the quality of our troops rather than upon the quantity? We should, in the end, achieve the same effect, but at a smaller price, and the French would probably prefer half-a-million well-trained and really well-led troops to the amateur-led million we are now sending.

In any case, the Government must realize that it will be held strictly to account for the use it makes of its new levies. Unless hand in hand there goes with this unlimited recruitment the greatest care in the training of leaders and staff, so that lives be not jeopardized unnecessarily, those who are associated with this final dealing with the glorious manhood of our nation will live to rue it.

The Nation 15/1/16 679/35

! and his frank reflections upon a number of others whose names are not always given, the dispatch is a much more damning account of his own part in the fighting than of others. For what is the function of a commander if it is not to command? Sir Ian's indictment of his generals in the last resort amounts to this—that he could not keep them in hand. He could as little order them as inspire or persuade them. When the crucial moment came he saw the inertia which he blames; he saw the gravity of its bearing upon the whole situation. But he had no gifts to blow life into the smouldering embers; and the opportunity was lost.

It is but fair to admit that a great deal of the discredit which must ever attach to the conduct of this campaign can and must be referred to others. The problem of forcing the Dardanelles by means of an army labored under the almost immeasurable handicap of being scheduled in advance. Like the courteous and somewhat stupid duellists of romance, we gave the Turks ample notice of our intention. To the Dardanelles problem, a sufficiently stimulating problem in any case, we gratuitously added the problem of countervailing our own errors. There can be little doubt that this was a far more formidable thing than the taking of the Narrows. Sir Ian's conduct of the campaign must receive a handsome discount upon this account. His was a rather extraordinary problem, and he had never more than a small force to cope with it. The responsibility for that state of affairs must rest on other shoulders. Where was the General Staff? Where was the War Staff which should have regulated these mixed operations? Who was responsible for the dimensions of the force? The French, we have reason to believe, disapproved, and thought the force should be increased. There can be no refuge for those responsible in the suggestion that we had not the numbers. A military project cannot be conceived apart from numbers, and is to be undertaken only if suitable numbers are available.

Taking the campaign as one inevitably to be Oglu Tepe, was a turning movement which would inevitably weaken the Turkish defence. Given the numbers, time was the essential factor in the situation. Clearly, the day could not be won against the whole Turkish force: the point was that the blows should fall so quickly that the advantages of surprise could be gained. The blow from Anzac went home. Reinforcements were landed secretly, and concealed three days. On August 6th the men were loosed. They attacked on the extreme right of the Anzac position as a diversion. The object was gained, for the fighting continued at this point for days afterwards. Meanwhile, the main Anzac movement had been launched against the Chunuk Bair ridge. Major-General Godley directed here, and, when dawn broke on the 7th, his men had penetrated to within a quarter of a mile of Chunuk Bair. Early the next morning, they even seized the position; and on the following day the Gurkhas and 6th South Lancashires looked down upon the silver thread of the Hellespont, which, dividing Europe from Asia, has so ancient a history. So much for the frontal attack, in which the New Army won laurels.

Meanwhile the Suvla expedition was writing another and not less familiar page of our history. The operations here were under the charge of Lieutenant-General Stopford. He had to make his way against but small forces and no wire. His force was more than adequate; it was ample. General Stopford seems to have blundered at the outset by suggesting a change in the landing plans, which afterwards proved a disadvantage. But why did Sir Ian agree to it? The landing was more difficult, and this was a matter of fact, and not of judgment—certainly not an Army officer's judgment, at any rate. And there were Turkish pickets awaiting the invaders. This was a matter of preliminary reconnaissance. The other two landings took place without opposition. But when the dawn of the 7th came and the footing had been made good, there was no control of the two brigades. What happened is difficult to understand; but battalion commanders seem to have played their own hand. The Irish Division added the only touch of life to the situation. The water supply broke down. The troops became spread out, so that the chief advantage of their preponderant numbers was lost. The divisional commanders represented the tired state of their troops when belatedly urged to advance. And the commander of the operations again acquiesced. More, he directly gave them every excuse for their indecision. So were frittered away the precious hours when the troops from Anzac were striving to hold, against a concentrated enemy, the ridge which commanded the Narrows.

It is clear that General Stopford was to blame. On the story of this dispatch he is condemned as a leader beyond all redemption. As to the divisional commanders, it is hard to determine how far their inertia was spontaneous, and how far derived from an intuitive sympathy with their chief's point of view. But where was the Commander-in-Chief? He brushes away, in his dispatch, every shred of cover for his subordinate. But why did he not infuse life into the critical wing of the advance? At last he determined to do something. He went to the spot, and, reaching over the heads of corps and divisional commanders, on the evening of the 8th moved a pawn—

679/36

MAKE THE COUNTRY OURS!

By R. L. OUTHWAITE, M.P.

The most fundamental contention urged by the Conscriptionists in the recent debates did not, to my mind, receive the refutation it demanded. Conscription, they contended, is only compelling a man to surrender liberty to his State in order to save him from losing his liberty by conquest. The Tories loudly cheered a statement that Conscription was necessary to prevent invasion. The reply is to be found in the speech made by Mr. Balfour on the first reading, where he said:

> Is there any man who now listens to me who would have believed, if he had been told in July, 1914, that when some seventeen or eighteen months had passed, over 6,000,000 men would have been raised for a cause, which is, indeed, nearest to our dearest and most permanent interests, but which does not involve invasion, or even the serious danger of invasion, of our hearth and home?

This is a statement of a fact that brings the Conscriptionist argument to the ground. Our forefathers for this very reason maintained personal liberty. In the House of Lords, Lord Crewe stated that Conscription had become necessary because of the campaign in the East. This was initiated at the Dardanelles at the request of Russia to secure Constantinople for her. So we see that Conscription is to be imposed for a cause far remote from the safeguarding of liberty, endangered by invasion.

But granted that the need had arisen for the State to over-ride individual rights, the process should have been as follows: First, the State should have demanded the surrender of the communal property that has been appropriated by individuals, i.e., the land: next, the property that can be ascribed to individual effort, namely, the wealth of the community: only in the last resort should the State seize the body of the citizen.

But Conscription is to be enforced by a reverse process. The body of the citizen is forfeit: wealth has been borrowed, not conscripted, and interest paid at a rate to make the lender richer than before, even when increase of taxation is taken into account. Land has been treated as sacrosanct and not touched at all. The Junkers and the plutocrats have forged Conscription to their liking.

The way to defeat the Conscription of men is to demand a just process. First, to the last penny, the communal value of land should be taken by taxation till the State becomes the sole landlord in trust for the people. Then, if needs be wealth must be conscripted till the whole community is on the subsistence level. There will be no need then for the Conscription of men.

Consequently, I am glad to see that at the Labour Conference the I.L.P. is to propose "a special tax on land values" in a resolution on finance. The landowners should be called upon to provide the valuation, and the tax could be imposed forthwith. The Land Valuation Department could check the valuations. This is the method adopted by the Commonwealth Labour Party after it came to office on the issue. To destroy land monopoly, root and branch, is now more than ever essential. Monopoly must be called upon to finance the war. Only by securing Labour access to land can employment be found for the armies when disbanded and the production of wealth proceed.

During the Napoleonic War, the landlord class stole the common lands which were the basis of the workers' independence. This time they hope by Conscription to break down the barrier of Trade Unionism, set up by the dispossessed. Whilst their brothers are fighting for France and Belgium, and to destroy Prussian junkerism (landlordism), let those who remain at home work to rescue the land of Britain from our Junkers, for themselves and those who may return. Their demand should be "no Conscription until the land is ours to fight for."

The proposal of the I.L.P. for a special tax on land values is a true economic corrollary of the Party's splendid fight for individual liberty, and on these lines many Radicals will join with them who feel that Liberal leaders have betrayed the cause of liberty.

TRADE UNION NOTES.

The declaration by the Government that no more demands in wages must be granted is simply scandalous. For this amazing rescript they put forward the plea of national economy. But even in the British House of Commons (and we question if any other legislative body in the world shows itself more ignorant of the conditions of the workers of the country), the Government would scarcely dare to pretend that the repression of advances in wages is either the most obvious or the most advantageous economy. The high earnings prevailing in some trades—usually through heavy overtime—are being spent in articles of household furniture, in various small comforts, and in better feeding of the workers and their families. On the other hand, we have perceived no startling reduction in the number of luxuries enjoyed by the wealthy class. Besides this, the high earnings in certain trades are easily counterbalanced by the increased cost of living in trades that have received no advances—such as building, clothing, clerical work, and domestic service. Once for all, let it be clearly stated that until Britain is treated as a belaguered garrison, until our resources are pooled and shared equally, no Government has the right to demand further sacrifices from that one class whose whole standard of living is a perpetual sacrifice to the exigencies of the workers and owners.

2d. per day advance to surface workers, which was settled upon last May. A threat of a strike last week helped the management to recognise its obligations, and the workers have now been paid the advanced rates, and the arrears that had accrued.

* * *

A curious point has arisen before the Bristol Munitions Tribunal. A turner's term of apprenticeship had expired in September. On his desiring to leave the firm his employers refused him a leaving certificate, and contended that they had reasonable grounds for so doing. Their grounds were that as the young man was doing for 25s. a week operations for which other men were being paid 42s., it was important to them to have the case settled by a Court of Law, and so be able, if the decision was favourable, to gain 17s. a week on each man who had just completed his apprenticeship.

* * *

The case was decided against them. It may be noted that unskilled men were being paid 32s. a week, whereas there was an attempt, based on the custom of "improving," and on the Munitions Act, to get this skilled man for 7s. less. It is important that Trade Unions should endeavour to get this question of "improving" settled once and for all. The thing should be swept away. Once a worker reaches a journeyman's skill he should be paid a journeyman's wage, whatever his years. Unfortunately, follows upon "improver's

BE IN TIME TO GET FREE

a copy of Mr. RAMSAY MACDONALD'S important book

Socialism & Government

Handsomely bound in Cloth. You can do this by at once taking advantage of the following offer

WHICH WILL SHORTLY BE WITHDRAWN

What you have to do.

Select 12 Volumes from the Essential Library list given herewith, enter the numbers of these volumes in the order form, also your name and address, and send the order form, together with 1s. postal order, to us and the Library of 12 Volumes together with the Gift Book will be sent to you carriage paid. You will then remit ten further payments of 1s. 6d. per month, and a final payment of 2s. will complete the purchase. No extra charge is made for this convenient method of payment.

We would draw special attention to the Manager's guarantee that the deposit which accompanies the order will be promptly refunded to any reader who is not thoroughly satisfied.

The Essential Library

1 Spectator Essays
2 Arnold, Poems
3 Bacon, Essays
4 The Ingoldsby Legends
5 Johnson's Table Talks
6 E. B. Browning, Poems
7 R. Browning, Poems
8 Burns, Poems
9 Byron, Poems
10 Calverley, Verses and Translations
11 Carleton, Stories
12 Carlyle, Essays
13 Coleridge, Poems
14 Cowper, Poems
15 De Quincey, Opium Eater
16 De Quincey, Essays
17 Emerson, Essays
18 Hazlitt, Essays
19 Herbert, Poems
20 Herrick, Poems
21 Holmes, Autocrat Breakfast Table
22 Holmes, Professor Breakfast Table
23 Hood, Poems
24 Hunt, Imagination and Fancy
25 Ingelow, Poems
26 Keats, Poems
27 Keble, The Christian Year
32 Longfellow, Poems
33 Russell Lowell, Poems
34 Milton, Poems
35 More, Utopia
36 Rossetti, Poems
37 Ruskin, Sesame and Lilies
38 Shelley, Poems
39 Tennyson, Poems
40 Tennyson, In Memoriam
41 Thackeray, Roundabout Papers
42 Thackeray, The Four Georges
43 Thoreau, Walden
44 Vaughan, Silex Scintillans
45 Whittier, Poems
46 Wordsworth, Poems
47 A Sixteenth Century Anthology
48 A Seventeenth Century Anthology
49 An Eighteenth Century Anthology
50 A Book of Parodies
51 Goldsmith, Plays and Poems
53 Marcus Aurelius' Meditations
54 William Blake, Poems
55 Dryden, Poems
56 A. E. Kinglake, "Eothen"
57 Sir William Temple, Essays
58 Religio Medici Sir Thomas Browne

Is there any man who now listens to [illegible] who would have believed, if he had been told in July, 1914, that when some seventeen or eighteen months had passed, over 6,000,000 men would have been raised for a cause, which is, indeed, nearest to our dearest and most permanent interests, but which does not involve invasion, or even the serious danger of invasion, of our hearth and home?

This is a statement of a fact that brings the Conscriptionist argument to the ground. Our forefathers for this very reason maintained personal liberty. In the House of Lords, Lord Crewe stated that Conscription had become necessary because of the campaign in the East. This was initiated at the Dardanelles at the request of Russia to secure Constantinople for her. So we see that Conscription is to be imposed for a cause far remote from the safeguarding of liberty, endangered by invasion.

But granted that the need had arisen for the State to over-ride individual rights, the process should have been as follows: First, the State should have demanded the surrender of the communal property that has been appropriated by individuals, i.e., the land: next, the property that can be ascribed to individual effort, namely, the wealth of the community: only in the last resort should the State seize the body of the citizen.

But Conscription is to be enforced by a reverse process. The body of the citizen is forfeit: wealth has been borrowed, not conscripted, and interest paid at a rate to make the lender richer than before, even when in-

[illegible] the Labour Conference the I.L.P. is to propose "a special tax on land values" in a resolution on finance. The landowners should be called upon to provide the valuation, and the tax could be imposed forthwith. The Land Valuation Department could check the valuations. This is the method adopted by the Commonwealth Labour Party after it came to office on the issue. To destroy land monopoly, root and branch, is now more than ever essential. Monopoly must be called upon to finance the war. Only by securing Labour access to land can employment be found for the armies when disbanded and the production of wealth proceed.

During the Napoleonic War, the landlord class stole the common lands which were the basis of the workers' independence. This time they hope by Conscription to break down the barrier of Trade Unionism, set up by the dispossessed. Whilst their brothers are fighting for France and Belgium, and to destroy Prussian junkerism (landlordism), let those who remain at home work to rescue the land of Britain from our Junkers, for themselves and those who may return. Their demand should be "no Conscription until the land is ours to fight for."

The proposal of the I.L.P. for a special tax on land values is a true economic corrollary of the Party's splendid fight for individual liberty, and on these lines many Radicals will join with them who feel that Liberal leaders have betrayed the cause of liberty.

TRADE UNION NOTES.

The declaration by the Government that no more demands in wages must be granted is simply scandalous. For this amazing rescript they put forward the plea of national economy. But even in the British House of Commons (and we question if any other legislative body in the world shows itself more ignorant of the conditions of the workers of the country), the Government would scarcely dare to pretend that the repression of advances in wages is either the most obvious or the most advantageous economy. The high earnings prevailing in some trades—usually through heavy overtime—are being spent in articles of household furniture, in various small comforts, and in better feeding of the workers and their families. On the other hand, we have perceived no startling reduction in the number of luxuries enjoyed by the wealthy class. Besides this, the high earnings in certain trades are easily counterbalanced by the increased cost of living in trades that have received no advances—such as building, clothing, clerical work, and domestic service. Once for all, let it be clearly stated that until Britain is treated as a beleaguered garrison, until our resources are pooled and shared equally, no Government has the right to demand further sacrifices from that one class whose whole standard of living is a continual sacrifice to the cupidity of its masters and owners.

* * *

Talk of solidarity of the working class is all very well. For a change we are glad to note the prospect of something being done to promote that solidarity. The miners at the Burnley pits, which supply coal to the Harle Syke Mills, are in favour of assisting the weavers on strike there by refusing to dig any more coal for these mills. As our readers will remember, this strike has dragged on from last August. The Harle Syke price lists were so far below the other lists of the Weavers' Amalgamation that it was decided to bring them up to the scratch. When the owners proved obdurate the operatives came out on strike. So far, they have no success; the blackleg element has proved too strong. Now that the miners have expressed a desire to come to the rescue we may expect to have the business speedily settled. It is only by a stern determination to have nothing to do with tainted goods, either by supplying them or working on them, that the Trade Union world will free itself from the menace of blackleg labour.

* * *

It is never safe to trust an employer unless you have sufficient economic power to help him to keep his promise. In Allhallows Colliery, in Cumberland, the management kept back the 2d. per day advance to surface workers, which was settled upon last May. A threat of a strike last week helped the management to recognise its obligations, and the workers have now been paid the advanced rates, and the arrears that had accrued.

* * *

A curious point has arisen before the Bristol Munitions Tribunal. A turner's term of apprenticeship had expired in September. On his desiring to leave the firm his employers refused him a leaving certificate, and contended that they had reasonable grounds for so doing. Their grounds were that as the young man was doing for 25s. a week operations for which other men were being paid 42s., it was important to them to have the case settled by a Court of Law, and so be able, if the decision was favourable, to gain 17s. a week on each man who had just completed his apprenticeship.

* * *

The case was decided against them. It may be noted that unskilled men were being paid 32s. a week, whereas there was an attempt, based on the custom of "improving," and on the Munitions Act, to get this skilled man for 7s. less. It is important that Trade Unions should endeavour to get this question of "improving" settled once and for all. The thing should be swept away. Once a worker reaches a journeyman's skill he should be paid a journeyman's wage, whatever his years. Undercutting follows upon "improver's wages" as night follows day.

* * *

A particularly bad state of affairs exists amongst the Furnishing Trade Unions. In munitions localities, owing to continuous labour, heavy overtime, and Sunday work, actual earnings are very high among munition workers. One result of this is that, perhaps for the first time since the great depression of 1908 and 1909, the workers are beginning to stock their houses with household goods. They are beginning to buy furniture. As a result of this widespread demand it is well known that certain furnishing firms are having the time of their lives. In spite of this the employers stubbornly refuse to give a 5 per cent. increase in wages. This is true for Bristol, for Birmingham, and for Scotland. Not only are employers making such profits as they never made before, but they have increased their own prices by 30 per cent. The workers' cost of living has gone up in some of these towns by over 40 per cent., and yet they are refused any rise in the cost of their labour.

JACK CADE.

We have received from "J. O." a contribution of 10s. towards the funds of the Union of Democratic Control.

Socialism & Government

Handsomely bound in Cloth. You can do this by at once taking advantage of the following offer

WHICH WILL SHORTLY BE WITHDRAWN

What you have to do.

Select 12 Volumes from the Essential Library list given herewith, enter the numbers of these volumes in the order form, also your name and address, and send the order form, together with 1s. postal order, to us and the Library of 12 Volumes together with the Gift Book will be sent to you carriage paid. You will then remit ten further payments of 1s. 6d. per month, and a final payment of 2s. will complete the purchase. No extra charge is made for this convenient method of payment.

We would draw special attention to the Manager's guarantee that the deposit which accompanies the order will be promptly refunded to any reader who is not thoroughly satisfied.

The Essential Library

1 Spectator Essays
2 Arnold, Poems
3 Bacon, Essays
4 The Ingoldsby Legends
5 Johnson's Table Talks
6 E. B. Browning, Poems
7 R. Browning, Poems
8 Burns, Poems
9 Byron, Poems
10 Calverley, Verses and Translations
11 Carleton, Stories
12 Carlyle, Essays
13 Coleridge, Poems
14 Cowper, Poems
15 De Quincey, Opium Eater
16 De Quincey, Essays
17 Emerson, Essays
18 Hazlitt, Essays
19 Herbert, Poems
20 Herrick, Poems
21 Holmes, Autocrat Breakfast Table
22 Holmes, Professor Breakfast Table
23 Hood, Poems
24 Hunt, Imagination and Fancy
25 Ingelow, Poems
26 Keats, Poems
27 Keble, The Christian Year
28 Keble, The Psalter in English Verse
29 Lamb, Essays of Elia
30 Lamb, Last Essays of Elia
31 Landor, Imaginary Conversations
32 Longfellow, Poems
33 Russell Lowell, Poems
34 Milton, Poems
35 More, Utopia
36 Rossetti, Poems
37 Ruskin, Sesame and Lilies
38 Shelley, Poems
39 Tennyson, Poems
40 Tennyson, In Memoriam
41 Thackeray, Roundabout Papers
42 Thackeray, The Four Georges
43 Thoreau, Walden
44 Vaughan, Silex Scintillans
45 Whittier, Poems
46 Wordsworth, Poems
47 A Sixteenth Century Anthology
48 A Seventeenth Century Anthology
49 An Eighteenth Century Anthology
50 A Book of Parodies
51 Goldsmith, Plays and Poems
53 Marcus Aurelius' Meditations
54 William Blake, Poems
55 Dryden, Poems
56 A. E. Kinglake, "Eothen"
57 Sir William Temple, Essays
58 Religio Medici Sir Thomas Browne
59 Montaigne, Essays
60 Flowers of St. Francis
61 Sheridan, Plays
62 The Imitation of Christ
63 Confessions of St. Augustine
64 Pope, Poems

I guarantee that the deposit will be promptly refunded by the Publishers to any reader who is not thoroughly satisfied.

E. Whiteley

Any reader who desires to purchase two Libraries of 12 Volumes each from the List will be presented with two Gift Books. In such cases a double deposit will be sent and the monthly payments will be doubled.

Subscriber's Opinion

Mr. I. Sanderson, of Birkdale, says:— 20/1/16

"The books are marvels at the price and a delight to read and handle. They are a credit to your firm, and I wish other firms were like minded."

CUT OUT HERE—SEND TO-DAY.

To the National Labour Press, Limited, 30, Blackfriars Street, Manchester.

Please send me volumes numbered ..... of the "LABOUR LEADER Essential Library" and special Gift Book, "Socialism and Government." I enclose 1s., and agree to send to whom you may depute 1s. 6d. per month for ten months and a final payment of 2s. to complete the purchase.

Name .....

Address .....

Foreign customers to send 6s. with order.

679/37

TREMENDOUS AGITATION IN THE GREAT DEMONSTRATIONS OF PROTEST.

... THE NATIONAL COUNCIL.

We announced last week the formation of the National Council Against Conscription to act as the centre of the great body of opposition which is being rapidly and effectively organised in the country. Mr. Robert Smillie has become the President, and Mr. B. N. Langdon-Davies is the Secretary. Mr. F. W. Pethick Lawrence has accepted the position of Hon. Treasurer, and the other members of the Executive Committee are Clifford Allen, C. G. Ammon, Margaret Bondfield, Dr. Clifford, Alexander Gossip, Dr. Hodgkin, George Lansbury, Catherine Marshall, H. W. Massingham, James Mylles, Robert Williams.

The General Council to-date is composed of 116 representative and well-known men and women. New names are being added daily to the list. Our readers will be interested to note the following names:

R. Applegarth, Councillor Margaret Ashton, Councillor W. H. Ayles, George Barker, Mrs. Barton, T. D. Benson, Fred Bramley, A. Fenner Brockway, Dr. Vipont Brown, Barrow Cadbury, J.P., A. G. Cameron, Edward Carpenter, G. D. H. Cole, Councillor R. J. Davies, Miss Llewellyn Davies, Mrs. Despard, Councillor P. J. Dollan, Rev. F. Lewis Donaldson, Rev. Herbert Dunnico, Miss Marian Ellis, J. H. Elvin, E. C. Fairchild, Miss I. O. Ford, J. Bruce Glasier, Principal J. W. Graham, Edward Grubb, M.A., J. Rendel Harris, Carl Heath, Right Rev. Bishop Herford, J. A. Hobson, Dr. R. F. Horton, J. H. Hudson, M.A., Fred Hughes, Councillor J. W. Kneeshaw, Miss Mary Macarthur, Sam Marsh, Rev. W. E. Moll, C. H. Norman, Rev. Dr. Orchard, Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, Rev. Leyton Richards, Richard Roberts, Hon. Bertrand Russell, Rev. G. T. Sadler, Dr. Alfred Salter, Olive Schreiner, Evelyn Sharp, Rev. F. R. Swan, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, John Turner, Brougham Villiers, Councillor Egerton P. Wake, R. C. Wallhead, J. Winstone, Rev. Dr. Walter Walsh.

The Council has issued nine effective leaflets dealing with the controversy from all points of view, particularly the industrial, and speakers are being sent to meetings all over the country. The Council is being bombarded with requests for leaflets and speakers, all of which, so far, it has been able to meet. Affiliation is invited from any local groups or organisations of any kind opposed to Conscription at this moment.

AN INDICATION.

The Literature Department of the No-Conscription Fellowship has dispatched up to date over 1,500,000 leaflets, and the distribution is being continued at the rate of 250,000 per day. Requests for leaflets have been received from the far North of Scotland, and from as far West as St. Just (a few miles from Land's End). This may be taken as some indication of the strength of the opposition in the country.

THE CLYDE RESOLUTE.

While it is obvious that the Government intends to rush through the Military Service Bill, it is equally obvious to those who know the feeling in Glasgow that the resistance offered will make it impossible for the authorities to put the measure into operation on the Clyde. There are 250,000 munition workers in the Clyde area who will not tolerate further Acts of compulsion.

Already mass meetings have been held at the yards and resolutions carried in favour of a demonstration, by action, against the Bill. These meetings have been organised spontaneously by the men themselves; at one of the most important factories in the Kingdom it was unanimously decided to "down tools" if the Bill becomes law. Similar meetings are being held everywhere in the Clyde area, and what may happen in consequence no one can foresee, this thing is certain: trouble is meneed by a distribution of 5,000 leaflets outside churches, chapels, brotherhoods, P.S.A.'s, and similar institutions. Then a big simultaneous distribution of 94,000 leaflets was organised, and in 48 hours the whole 94,000 were in the hands of Bristolians. Distributors were placed outside every factory, at the entrances to the docks, on every bridge, outside the theatres, and in every working-class district. A demonstration was organised at four days' notice by the L.R.C. and Trades Council in the Kingsley Hall, and all who came, though they were packed as close as possible, could not get in. When the resolution against the Government Bill was put, only four hands were held up against it. The dockers held a big meeting in the Palace Theatre on Sunday morning, and passed a strong resolution unanimously pledging themselves to fight Conscription. A special I.L.P. branch meeting called for Sunday night was the largest ever held in the history of the I.L.P., and the N.A.C. opposition to the Bill was heartily endorsed. On Sunday a further distribution of leaflets against Conscription was organised, bringing the number given out during the week to over 100,000.

VIGOROUS ACTION IN S.E. LONDON.

A vigorous campaign against Conscription is being conducted in Dulwich and Camberwell and surrounding districts. An anti-Conscription Council has been formed comprising the Dulwich, Camberwell, and Lewisham branches of the I.L.P., the Camberwell B.S.P., Camberwell Trades Council, Society of Friends, Fellowship of Reconciliation, Lambeth Labour Party, the Social and Political Vigilance Committee, the Dulwich Branch of the N.-C.F., and various Trade Union branches. Under the auspices of the Council a demonstration was held on Peckham Rye on Sunday, and a resolution was passed, with only six dissentients. Four other public meetings are to be held during this week. The membership of the Dulwich No-Conscription Fellowship is increasing, making this one of the largest branches in London. Twelve thousand of the National Council leaflets have been distributed throughout the district, and on Sunday 58 churches had leaflets given to members leaving the church. All the local clergy are receiving communications, and a deputation of 10 of the Council waited upon four local M.P.'s. A public indoor meeting of the Dulwich I.L.P. condemned the Bill. The columns of the local newspapers are filled with protests against the Bill.

LIVERPOOL JOINT ACTION.

The Liverpool Trades Council and the Workers' Industrial Vigilance Committee have decided to take joint action to express the antagonism of the Transport Workers to the Military Service Bill. They have issued a strong manifesto representing the views of the affiliated organisations, including the Labour Representation Committee, the Building Trades' Committee, the Transport Workers' Federation, and the Shipbuilding and Engineering Federation.

OPINION IN HUDDERSFIELD.

The Huddersfield Trades Council, and the local I.L.P., B.S.P., and N.-C.F., have formed a joint committee to oppose the Bill, and besides organising meetings, have distributed thousands of leaflets throughout the town. Opinion in the Labour movement is very strong against the Bill.

CREWE RAILWAYMEN'S PROTEST.

At a large and crowded public meeting on Sunday the Crewe railwaymen passed by an overwhelming majority a resolution condemning the present Conscription Bill before compiled and sifted the Bill ought not to have been introduced.

Mr. Bellamy said during the life-and-death struggle of the last eighteen months Great Britain has raised an army of eligible men representing a greater percentage of the population than conscript countries have done, and he pointed out that if once a principle of this kind is established, it becomes very easy for legislators to extend it. Once get the thin end of the wedge in, they will drive it home in the long run. A form of industrial Compulsion never tolerated before in this country is introduced in the Bill. If a railway company wanted to reduce the wages of the railwaymen and the men refused to take the reduction and decided to take a holiday that day, assuming the Bill to be in operation, they would become soldiers. Mr. Bellamy demanded, amid loud cheers, that wealth should be taken before flesh and blood, and he said if they valued their Trade Unionism and freedom, and wanted to keep Great Britain a free country, they must oppose this Bill. "Don't let us beat Germany and find we have Germanised Britain."

Before the resolution was put, a man mounted the platform to move an amendment. He was allowed to make a short speech, but was told he could not move his amendment; he could vote against the resolution. The resolution, as stated, was carried by an overwhelming majority.

TO VOTE AGAINST COMPULSION.

The Leigh Division Labour Party, representing over 10,000 Trade Unionists, at its annual meeting on Friday, by a two to one vote, instructed its delegate to the Bristol Conference to vote against the Government's policy of Conscription.

WORKING HEARTILY.

A joint meeting of the Monmouthshire Branches of the No-Conscription Fellowship on Saturday was addressed by Councillor W. H. Ayles, of Bristol. The members are getting to work heartily. In the evening Mr. Ayles spoke at a public Anti-Conscription meeting in the I.L.P. Institute. It was largely attended, and the audience was very appreciative.

MANCHESTER'S DEMONSTRATION.

The Manchester and Salford No-Compulsion Committee has held a series of open-air meetings outside the work-gates during the week, which, despite occasional hooliganism, have been very successful.

On Sunday it was intended to hold a meeting in a large picture palace (the use of the Free Trade Hall having been refused), but at the last moment the proprietor refused use of the hall, and the demonstration had to be held in Stevenson Square. There was a very large crowd, which was overwhelmingly against Compulsion, and the attempts of a rowdy minority to stop the proceedings failed. The speakers were Mr. R. L. Outhwaite, M.P., Miss Margaret Bondfield, Miss Margaret Ashton, and Councillor R. J. Davies.

A resolution demanding the withdrawal of the Military Service Bill was carried by an enormous majority.

EDINBURGH OPPOSITION.

A highly successful anti-Conscription meeting was held on Sunday night under the auspices of the Edinburgh District Federation of the I.L.P. Mr. J. W. Muir, delegate from the Clyde Workers' Committee, spoke first, and he was followed by Councillor Taylor (Glasgow) and Mr. Tom Gibb, Labour candidate for South Lanark. Each speaker was enthusiastically applauded. A resolution demanding the withdrawal of the Bill and warning the Government against any attempt at industrial Conscription was carried with only one man and one woman voting against. The receipts from literature sales reached £1 15s.

ated his powerful speech. Every individual in the audience was handed literature on the question, and the attitude of the meeting was magnificent.

The Rev. R. Powell, of the English Baptist Chapel, moved a resolution against Conscription on Sunday evening from the pulpit. It was carried, and copies have been sent to the Prime Minister and others.

SHEFFIELD SPEAKS OUT.

Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., was the principal speaker at a meeting in Sheffield on Sunday evening, under the auspices of the I.L.P. to protest against the Military Service Bill. The chair was taken by Mr. Richard Hawkin, and the large hall was crowded by an appreciative and enthusiastic audience. Immediately after the opening of the meeting it was evident that a little group of men in a corner of the gallery, known locally as the "Gastank Gang," intended to prevent any of the speakers from being heard. For an hour the audience waited patiently to hear the speakers. Then the police appeared on the scene, and the "Gastankers" slunk out one by one. The meeting proceeded until half-past ten, and until its close most orderly and attentive behaviour was shown by the audience.

The chairman submitted a resolution to the meeting, which declared that if the Bill becomes law it will mean the victory of German ideas over England, and pledged the meeting to use every legitimate means to secure its final withdrawal and defeat.

Mr. Anderson, speaking of the menace to industrial freedom contained in the Bill, said there would be big industrial fights after the war, and men would be greatly handicapped if they had to carry the shackles of military Conscription. He urged them to stand together in defence of their common liberties. In answer to a question, Mr. Anderson said there was not a word in the Bill to indicate that its operations would be confined to the period of the war only.

Councillor A. Barton and Mr. G. E. Chandler, secretary of the National Union of Railway Clerks, also addressed the meeting, and the resolution was carried by a tremendous majority, only 15 people voting against it.

A BUSY WEEK-END.

Mr. Fenner Brockway had a busy week-end in connection with the anti-Conscription campaign. On Saturday afternoon he addressed a large and enthusiastic meeting of members of the Birmingham No-Conscription Fellowship. In the evening he addressed a crowded gathering at Queen's College, Birmingham, under the auspices of the I.L.P. On Sunday morning he spoke at an anti-Conscription meeting at West Bromwich, and in the evening he lectured on "The Conscriptionist Conspiracy" at the Kettering Labour Church, consulting with the members of the local N.-C.F. branch after the meeting. At each place he found a wonderful spirit of determination and unprecedented activity.

A UNANIMOUS REJECTION.

On Thursday evening a well-attended public meeting, under the auspices of the Rossendale I.L.P., was unanimous in its opposition to the Compulsion Bill. A local minister, the Rev. Mr. Turner, moved a resolution pledging all present, individually and collectively, to resist the measure, and Mr. Clement J. Bundock spoke in support of it. He submitted the Government proposals to a searching criticism, and the resolution was carried without a single dissentient voice. On Sunday evening Mr. Bundock attacked the Bill at a crowded meeting under the auspices of the Edge Hill (Liverpool) I.L.P.

FOUR TO ONE IN YORK.

Alexander Gossip, Dr. Hodgkin, George Lansbury, Catherine Marshall, H. W. Massingham, James Mylles, Robert Williams.

The General Council to-date is composed of 116 representative and well-known men and women. New names are being added daily to the list. Our readers will be interested to note the following names:

R. Applegarth, Councillor Margaret Ashton, Councillor W. H. Ayles, George Barker, Mrs. Barton, T. D. Benson, Fred Bramley, A. Fenner Brockway, Dr. Vipont Brown, Barrow Cadbury, J.P., A. G. Cameron, Edward Carpenter, G. D. H. Cole, Councillor R. J. Davies, Miss Llewellyn Davies, Mrs. Despard, Councillor P. J. Dollan, Rev. F. Lewis Donaldson, Rev. Herbert Dunnico, Miss Marian Ellis, J. H. Elvin, E. C. Fairchild, Miss I. O. Ford, J. Bruce Glasier, Principal J. W. Graham, Edward Grubb, M.A., J. Rendel Harris, Carl Heath, Right Rev. Bishop Herford, J. A. Hobson, Dr. R. F. Horton, J. H. Hudson, M.A., Fred Hughes, Councillor J. W. Kneeshaw, Miss Mary Macarthur, Sam Marsh, Rev. W. E. Moll, C. H. Norman, Rev. Dr. Orchard, Miss Sylvia Pankhurst, Rev. Leyton Richards, Richard Roberts, Hon. Bertrand Russell, Rev. G. T. Sadler, Dr. Alfred Salter, Olive Schreiner, Evelyn Sharp, Rev. F. R. Swan, Mrs. H. M. Swanwick, John Turner, Brougham Villiers, Councillor Egerton P. Wake, R. C. Wallhead, J. Winstone, Rev. Dr. Walter Walsh.

The Council has issued nine effective leaflets dealing with the controversy from all points of view, particularly the industrial, and speakers are being sent to meetings all over the country. The Council is being bombarded with requests for leaflets and speakers, all of which, so far, it has been able to meet. Affiliation is invited from any local groups or organisations of any kind opposed to Conscription at this moment.

AN INDICATION.

The Literature Department of the No-Conscription Fellowship has dispatched up to date over 1,500,000 leaflets, and the distribution is being continued at the rate of 250,000 per day. Requests for leaflets have been received from the far North of Scotland, and from as far West as St. Just (a few miles from Land's End). This may be taken as some indication of the strength of the opposition in the country.

THE CLYDE RESOLUTE.

While it is obvious that the Government intends to rush through the Military Service Bill, it is equally obvious to those who know the feeling in Glasgow that the resistance offered will make it impossible for the authorities to put the measure into operation on the Clyde. There are 250,000 munition workers in the Clyde area who will not tolerate further Acts of compulsion.

Already mass meetings have been held at the yards and resolutions carried in favour of a demonstration, by action, against the Bill. These meetings have been organised spontaneously by the men themselves; at one of the most important factories in the Kingdom it was unanimously decided to "down tools" if the Bill becomes law. Similar meetings are being held everywhere in the Clyde area, and what may happen in consequence no one can foresee. One thing is certain: trouble is brewing, and if it comes the Government will have itself to blame.

THEY FEAR SMILLIE.

The pro-compulsionists in Scotland are supremely afraid of one man—Mr. Robert Smillie. The Glasgow Herald is already suggesting that the Government should take notice of his expressed intention to make the Bill ineffective if enacted. It says:

> If Mr. Smillie had been a German subject—and we should be well pleased to make a gift of him to Prussianism, which is clearly his intellectual home—this apology would have been considered by the State in due course, namely, towards the end of ten years' penal servitude, or most probably after a brief interval with a firing party.

The effect of this suggestion that Mr. Smillie should be dealt with by the Government has been to increase the enthusiasm of the Scottish workers for him. If Mr. Smillie goes to prison it can be taken as certain that the Clyde workers will go to play!

BRISTOL'S TREMENDOUS ACTIVITY.

During the past week a record has been created for Bristol. The week was com- [illegible] all who came, though they were packed as close as possible, could not get in. When the resolution against the Government Bill was put, only four hands were held up against it. The dockers held a big meeting in the Palace Theatre on Sunday morning, and passed a strong resolution unanimously pledging themselves to fight Conscription. A special I.L.P. branch meeting called for Sunday night was the largest ever held in the history of the I.L.P., and the N.A.C. opposition to the Bill was heartily endorsed. On Sunday a further distribution of leaflets against Conscription was organised, bringing the number given out during the week to over 100,000.

VIGOROUS ACTION IN S.E. LONDON.

A vigorous campaign against Conscription is being conducted in Dulwich and Camberwell and surrounding districts. An anti-Conscription Council has been formed comprising the Dulwich, Camberwell, and Lewisham branches of the I.L.P., the Camberwell B.S.P., Camberwell Trades Council, Society of Friends, Fellowship of Reconciliation, Lambeth Labour Party, the Social and Political Vigilance Committee, the Dulwich Branch of the N.-C.F., and various Trade Union branches. Under the auspices of the Council a demonstration was held on Peckham Rye on Sunday, and a resolution was passed, with only six dissentients. Four other public meetings are to be held during this week. The membership of the Dulwich No-Conscription Fellowship is increasing, making this one of the largest branches in London. Twelve thousand of the National Council leaflets have been distributed throughout the district, and on Sunday 58 churches had leaflets given to members leaving the church. All the local clergy are receiving communications, and a deputation of 10 of the Council waited upon four local M.P.'s. A public indoor meeting of the Dulwich I.L.P. condemned the Bill. The columns of the local newspapers are filled with protests against the Bill.

LIVERPOOL JOINT ACTION.

The Liverpool Trades Council and the Workers' Industrial Vigilance Committee have decided to take joint action to express the antagonism of the Transport Workers to the Military Service Bill. They have issued a strong manifesto representing the views of the affiliated organisations, including the Labour Representation Committee, the Building Trades' Committee, the Transport Workers' Federation, and the Shipbuilding and Engineering Federation.

OPINION IN HUDDERSFIELD.

The Huddersfield Trades Council, and the local I.L.P., B.S.P., and N.-C.F., have formed a joint committee to oppose the Bill, and besides organising meetings, have distributed thousands of leaflets throughout the town. Opinion in the Labour movement is very strong against the Bill.

CREWE RAILWAYMEN'S PROTEST.

At a large and crowded public meeting on Sunday the Crewe railwaymen passed by an overwhelming majority a resolution condemning the present Conscription Bill before Parliament, and demanding, if it be passed into law, Conscription of wealth. The principal speakers at the meeting were Mr. G. J. Wardle, M.P., and Mr. Bellamy, President of the N.U.R.

While the chairman, Councillor Yates, was speaking it was apparent that there was a noisy opposition present, but when the resolution was put to the meeting it was also evident that they were in a distinct minority. During the meeting they succeeded in creating considerable uproar. After this meeting there can be no mistaking the attitude of the Crewe railwaymen to Conscription. It will be one of determined opposition.

Mr. Wardle, referring to the famous pledge, which he said had caused all the trouble, remarked that it was given in the middle of the Derby scheme without the consideration it ought to have received. It was given without the knowledge of the Labour Committees who were co-operating with Lord Derby in his scheme. And, he said, the pledge that Asquith gave is not being carried out by the Bill before Parliament, but only part of the pledge. Until the figures had been properly [illegible] never tolerated before in this country is introduced in the Bill. If a railway company wanted to reduce the wages of the railwaymen and the men refused to take the reduction and decided to take a holiday that day, assuming the Bill to be in operation, they would become soldiers. Mr. Bellamy demanded, amid loud cheers, that wealth should be taken before flesh and blood, and he said if they valued their Trade Unionism and freedom, and wanted to keep Great Britain a free country, they must oppose this Bill. "Don't let us beat Germany and find we have Germanised Britain."

Before the resolution was put, a man mounted the platform to move an amendment. He was allowed to make a short speech, but was told he could not move his amendment; he could vote against the resolution. The resolution, as stated, was carried by an overwhelming majority.

TO VOTE AGAINST COMPULSION.

The Leigh Division Labour Party, representing over 10,000 Trade Unionists, at its annual meeting on Friday, by a two to one vote, instructed its delegate to the Bristol Conference to vote against the Government's policy of Conscription.

WORKING HEARTILY.

A joint meeting of the Monmouthshire Branches of the No-Conscription Fellowship on Saturday was addressed by Councillor W. H. Ayles, of Bristol. The members are getting to work heartily. In the evening Mr. Ayles spoke at a public Anti-Conscription meeting in the I.L.P. Institute. It was largely attended, and the audience was very appreciative.

MANCHESTER'S DEMONSTRATION.

The Manchester and Salford No-Compulsion Committee has held a series of open-air meetings outside the work-gates during the week, which, despite occasional hooliganism, have been very successful.

On Sunday it was intended to hold a meeting in a large picture palace (the use of the Free Trade Hall having been refused), but at the last moment the proprietor refused use of the hall, and the demonstration had to be held in Stevenson Square. There was a very large crowd, which was overwhelmingly against Compulsion, and the attempts of a rowdy minority to stop the proceedings failed. The speakers were Mr. R. L. Outhwaite, M.P., Miss Margaret Bondfield, Miss Margaret Ashton, and Councillor R. J. Davies.

A resolution demanding the withdrawal of the Military Service Bill was carried by an enormous majority.

EDINBURGH OPPOSITION.

A highly successful anti-Conscription meeting was held on Sunday night under the auspices of the Edinburgh District Federation of the I.L.P. Mr. J. W. Muir, delegate from the Clyde Workers' Committee, spoke first, and he was followed by Councillor Taylor (Glasgow) and Mr. Tom Gibb, Labour candidate for South Lanark. Each speaker was enthusiastically applauded. A resolution demanding the withdrawal of the Bill and warning the Government against any attempt at industrial Conscription was carried with only one man and one woman voting against. The receipts from literature sales reached £1 13s., and included in the sales were nine dozen copies of the LABOUR LEADER, and 250 copies of the Worker, the official organ of the Clyde Workers' Committee.

WELSH ENTHUSIASM.

Under the auspices of the Briton Ferry Trades and Labour Council an anti-Conscription meeting was held in the Public Hall, Briton Ferry, on Sunday evening. The platform was filled with the Labour Councillors and the branch officers of the various unions. The chairman of the Trades Council, Councillor E. C. Hutchinson, presided, and made an eloquent appeal to an audience numbering over 1,000 of the townsfolk. Councillor George Davies, of the British Steel Smelters, moved a resolution calling for the withdrawal of the Bill, and urging the Labour members and Mr. J. H. Edwards, M.P., to vote against the third reading, and to do all in their power to prevent it becoming law. Councillor J. Branch, Dockers' Union, seconded the resolution, and Mr. R. C. Wallhead spoke in support. Mr. Wallhead was interrupted only by the exclamations of approval which punctu-

Mr. W. C. Anderson, M.P., was the principal speaker at a meeting in Sheffield on Sunday evening, under the auspices of the I.L.P. to protest against the Military Service Bill. The chair was taken by Mr. Richard Hawkin, and the large hall was crowded by an appreciative and enthusiastic audience. Immediately after the opening of the meeting it was evident that a little group of men in a corner of the gallery, known locally as the "Gastank Gang," intended to prevent any of the speakers from being heard. For an hour the audience waited patiently to hear the speakers. Then the police appeared on the scene, and the "Gastankers" slunk out one by one. The meeting proceeded until half-past ten, and until its close most orderly and attentive behaviour was shown by the audience.

The chairman submitted a resolution to the meeting, which declared that if the Bill becomes law it will mean the victory of German ideas over England, and pledged the meeting to use every legitimate means to secure its final withdrawal and defeat.

Mr. Anderson, speaking of the menace to industrial freedom contained in the Bill, said there would be big industrial fights after the war, and men would be greatly handicapped if they had to carry the shackles of military Conscription. He urged them to stand together in defence of their common liberties. In answer to a question, Mr. Anderson said there was not a word in the Bill to indicate that its operations would be confined to the period of the war only.

Councillor A. Barton and Mr. G. E. Chandler, secretary of the National Union of Railway Clerks, also addressed the meeting, and the resolution was carried by a tremendous majority, only 15 people voting against it.

A BUSY WEEK-END.

Mr. Fenner Brockway had a busy week-end in connection with the anti-Conscription campaign. On Saturday afternoon he addressed a large and enthusiastic meeting of members of the Birmingham No-Conscription Fellowship. In the evening he addressed a crowded gathering at Queen's College, Birmingham, under the auspices of the I.L.P. On Sunday morning he spoke at an anti-Conscription meeting at West Bromwich, and in the evening he lectured on "The Conscriptionist Conspiracy" at the Kettering Labour Church, consulting with the members of the local N.-C.F. branch after the meeting. At each place he found a wonderful spirit of determination and unprecedented activity.

A UNANIMOUS REJECTION.

On Thursday evening a well-attended public meeting, under the auspices of the Rossendale I.L.P., was unanimous in its opposition to the Compulsion Bill. A local minister, the Rev. Mr. Turner, moved a resolution pledging all present, individually and collectively, to resist the measure, and Mr. Clement J. Bundock spoke in support of it. He submitted the Government proposals to a searching criticism, and the resolution was carried without a single dissentient voice. On Sunday evening Mr. Bundock attacked the Bill at a crowded meeting under the auspices of the Edge Hill (Liverpool) I.L.P.

FOUR TO ONE IN YORK.

The opponents of the Compulsion Bill in York called a public meeting of protest last week. The speeches delivered were subjected to some interruption which, says the Yorkshire Gazette, emanated principally from three ladies. A letter from Mr. Seebohm Rowntree was read giving his reasons for believing that "those who are protesting against the introduction of Conscription are performing a patriotic duty." Mr. S. H. Davies presided, and Mr. O. G. Willey moved a resolution calling for the withdrawal of the Bill. This was seconded by Mr. E. Hodgkin (Darlington), and supported by Mr. F. T. Beney, representing Labour. The resolution was carried by a majority of four to one.

INDUSTRIAL ACTION CONTEMPLATED.

One of the most enthusiastic meetings ever held in Glasgow took place in the Camlachie Institute on Monday evening under the auspices of the local I.L.P. The meeting was called as an "Anti-Conscription" demonstration, and hundreds were unable to secure admission. Mr. David Kirkwood, convener of the shop stewards in Parkhead Forge, presided, and said this was a time for action and and not for words. Rousing speeches were delivered by the Rev. J. Bell Henderson, Councillors John Wheatley and P. J. Dollan, and Mr. James Maxton, M.A. A resolution against Conscription was carried with one dissentient.

COUNTRY AGAINST COMPULSION

SCOTTISH WORKERS RESOLUTE AGAINST THE BILL.

The Chairman, in bringing the meeting to a close, declared he was in favour of industrial action if necessary to prevent Conscription, and the great audience rose en masse and cheered repeatedly. As those present are mainly employed in the munitions industry in the East End of Glasgow, their action will count for something when the critical hour arrives.

A SOLDIER SPEAKS.

The Kensington and Paddington Labour Council has formed an Anti-Conscription Committee, which is doing good work. On Saturday a very successful meeting was addressed by a soldier from the front who has lost one leg. His speech made a remarkable impression on the audience. Messrs. H. Roberts (organiser), Vacher (N.-C.F.), Holder, Collier, Lecerf, and Miss G. Neal also addressed the meeting, and the audience was overwhelmingly against Compulsion. A strong resolution against Conscription, moved by the soldier, was carried. Other meetings are being arranged in conjunction with the N.-C.F., and the I.L.P. is well represented in the campaign.

MR TREVELYAN AT KEIGHLEY.

Mr. C. P. Trevelyan, M.P., was the principal speaker at a demonstration held in Keighley on Sunday night under the auspices of the I.L.P. and the N.-C.F. He said the small number of 39 who voted against the second reading did not in the least represent the anger, distress, and sullen resentment of enormous masses of the people of this country. Perhaps this was the turning point in the history of liberty. It was true German militarism was the worst in Europe, but there was no particular magic about the nature of Britons which would make British militarism, if they got it, a milder militarism than German militarism.

If the Conscriptionists got this Bill through they would soon want the whole Conscription system in operation. "I say," Mr. Trevelyan added, "that it is cant, hypocrisy, and sham to say the Bill was introduced merely for the purpose of winning the war. It is being introduced for the period after the war for fastening the chains upon you." The Bill, however much amended, would give additional power to enslave men industrially.

A resolution protesting emphatically against the introduction of the Bill and the violation of the liberties of the people was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Trevelyan had arranged to address a meeting for the Haworth I.L.P. in the afternoon, but the proprietors of the hall withdrew their consent.

MANCHESTER QUAKERS AND THE BILL

The Friends' Meeting House, Manchester, was crowded on Sunday evening, when Principal J. W. Graham and the Rev. Leyton Richards spoke on freedom of conscience in relation to compulsory military service.

Mr. Graham, whilst recognising the good intentions of the Government in inserting what it believed to be a conscience clause, said it would not suffice for most of them, since they could do no auxiliary work as part of an organisation of fighting men.

Mr. Richards said conscientious objection did not rest upon the refusal to bear arms, but upon the refusal to take any part in a [illegible] nent mounted the platform and asked the audience to give a vote in favour of closing the meeting. Half a dozen hands were held up in response, and after this defeat of the meeting-smashers the audience settled down for an orderly meeting. Alderman Morley, of Halifax, delivered a powerful address against Compulsion, and was accorded a most attentive hearing.

DERISIVE HOWLS AT PRINCIPLE.

On Sunday afternoon Mr. R. L. Outhwaite, M.P., addressed an anti-Conscription demonstration at Oldham. The Rev. M. P. Davies presided, and Mr. Hill, the assistant secretary of the anti-Conscription group in Oldham, explained that the group was composed of the I.L.P., the Free Churches, and the No-Conscription Fellowship. Mr. Outhwaite remarked that in the House of Commons at present the mention of principle was greeted with howls of derision. But if we forfeit our principles, he said, we shall sink to the level of the Prussian conscripts who have surrendered their liberties to the State. A resolution declaring unalterable opposition to any form of compulsory military service was carried by an overwhelming majority.

TICKET-OF-LEAVE MEN.

In the Milton Hall, Manchester, on Saturday, a meeting representative of the National Industrial and Professional Women's Suffrage Society, the Lancashire and Cheshire Women's Textile and other Workers Representation Committee, and the Manchester and Salford Women's Trades and Labour Council, was called to protest against compulsory military service. The resolution declared that the abolition of personal liberty and of industrial freedom was involved, and that citizens were deprived of the right to be judged by the civil courts. Miss Gore Booth, in moving the resolution, said the unmarried men workers would become virtually ticket-of-leave men.

PRISON OR DEATH FIRST.

A meeting to protest against the introduction of the Compulsion Bill was held in Nelson under the auspices of the I.L.P., No-Conscription Fellowship, and the Fellowship of Reconciliation. It was stated that the local Bill-Posting Company had refused their hoardings, and also that the Salem School had been refused. The Rev. E. Barson, a local Baptist Minister, said if the alternative was going to mean imprisonment or death, he was going to prison or he was going to death along with dozens more who believed as he did.

IRISH WOMEN'S VIEW.

The Provisional Committee of the Irish women's International League has issued a statement declaring its belief that any "form of military or industrial compulsory service in Great Britain and Ireland would seriously menace liberty and social progress, because it involves the domination of might rather than right, the crushing of democracy, and the persistence of injustice towards women."

SUPPORT FOR MR. HARVEY.

Mr. A. G. C. Harvey, M.P., has voted against both readings of the Military Service Bill, and the Rochdale Trades Council, the Labour Party, and the Rochdale branch of the U.D.C. have sent resolutions of congratulation to him. The Rochdale branch of the No-Conscription Fellowship has sent a similar message and hopes he will maintain his opposition. Each member of the Fellowship has agreed to send Mr. Harvey a letter stating the objection on conscientious grounds to military service.

PHILIP MORRELL, M.P., EXPLAINS.

Mr. P. Morrell, M.P., voted against the N.-C.F. AND EXEMPTION.

The branches of the No-Conscription Fellowship are unanimously endorsing the action of the National Committee in rejecting the proposal that conscientious objectors should be employed on non-combatant military duties. Among the branches from whom we have received resolutions to this effect are: London County, Manchester, Birmingham, Wood Green and Tottenham, and Liverpool.

YOUNG SCOTS' OPPOSITION.

The National Council of the Young Scots' Society expresses its satisfaction at the success of the Derby Scheme as a signal triumph of the voluntary system, and protests against the hasty introduction of compulsion on the basis of hypothetical figures.

MANY RESOLUTIONS.

Additional resolutions of strong protest against the Military Service Bill now before Parliament reach us from:

Conference of the Lancashire and Cheshire Division of the I.L.P.
Executive Committee of the B.S.P.
Meeting of Trade Unionists and others in Wisbech (one dissentient).
Rossendale I.L.P. (public meeting: unanimous).
Bristol L.R.C. and Trades Council (public meeting: four dissentients).
Bristol I.L.P.
Edinburgh District I.L.P. Federation (public meeting: two dissentients).
London Trades Council.
Rochdale Trades Council.
York public meeting (4 to 1 majority).
Peckham Rye public meeting (6 dissentients).
Sheffield I.L.P. (public meeting: 15 dissentients).
Briton Ferry Trades and Labour Council (public meeting).
Briton Ferry, English Baptist Chapel (minister, Rev. R. Powell).
Kensington and Paddington Anti-Conscription Committee.
Croydon I.L.P.
Ilkeston Trades and Labour Council.
Altrincham Trades and Labour Council.
Bradford City Joint Committee of the N.U.R.
Bristol Dockers' Union.
Bristol Branch of the National Union of Clerks.
Executive Council of the London Society of Machine Rulers.
Kingston I.L.P.
Dundee I.L.P., N.-C.F., Trades Council, and L.R.C. (public meeting).
Walthamstow Adult School.
Women's Union for Peace Committee.
Walsall I.L.P.
Willow Walk Branch of the Railway Clerks' Association.
Delegate meeting representative of Wimbledon Trades and Labour Council, Wandsworth I.L.P., Wandsworth and Wimbledon N.-C.F., Wimbledon Adult School, Wimbledon Fellowship of Reconciliation.
Dundee Labour Party.
North Staffordshire Trades and Labour Council.
Burton-on-Trent Labour Party.
Camlachie I.L.P. (Public meeting: one dissentient).
Dumbarton I.L.P.
Altrincham I.L.P.
Carlton and Netherfield I.L.P. (Public meeting).
City of London I.L.P.
Stoney Stanton I.L.P.
Committee of Bristol Branch of the Women's International League.
Carlisle and District Vigilance Committee of the N.U.R. (representing 3,000 railwaymen).
Norwich Trades Council and Labour Party.
Half yearly Conference of the Lancashire and Cheshire Division of the I.L.P.
Conference of Branches of the National Union of Shop Assistants in the East Midlands.
Metal, Engineering, and Shipbuilding Amalgamation Committee, London.
Crewe I.L.P.

That this Conference expresses its emphatic condemnation of the Government's Military Service No. 2 Bill, and demands that (even at this late hour) it should be withdrawn.

Further, that the Conference warns the Government against any attempt to bring about Industrial Compulsion in this country.

The resolution was moved by Mr. R. Smillie, president of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain, who described the Military Service Bill as an insult to the people of this country. In his opinion there was no need for Conscription, as Lord Kitchener had secured the number of men he required as well as the necessary materials. Even if the voluntary system had produced ten million men the Conscriptionists would not have been satisfied and would have insisted on Conscription all the same. He was opposed on principle to the Conscription of young men who had no voice in the affairs of the nation, and he denied the right of any nation to conscript men who were refused the franchise because they were not householders. Although there were plenty of men and a scarcity of money, the Government had not yet thought of conscripting money. If there were Conscription of wealth there would be no need for Conscription of men.

Mr. Smillie, speaking in grave tones, continued:

The Conference Committee, in submitting the resolution, did not think it would be wise to lay down the lines that the workers ought to take in the event of the Bill becoming an Act of Parliament. The probability was that it would become law, but he believed there would be more difficulty in carrying it out when it became law than in passing it. No one knew to what extent the opposition to this compulsory service bill if it became law would go. He remembered the statement made by a one-time eminent statesman that a bad law was more honoured in the breach than the observance, and to him this bill, when it became law, would be a bad law, and he personally would feel he was justified in doing all in his power to make it ineffective. He did not throw that out as a threat in any way, but he was sure there would be considerable opposition to it, and in more than one direction.

Mr. Smillie's statement that he would do all in his power to make the Bill "ineffective" if passed into law roused the conference to great enthusiasm, and it was apparent his declaration of resistance was the lead the delegates were waiting for. They cheered Smillie time and again.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Neil Beaton, of the Shop Assistants' Union, who said that Conscription was meant for the workshop as well as for the army.

An amendment in favour of the Bill was moved by Mr. Peter McLuskie, secretary of the Glasgow Bottlemakers' Union, a small local organisation containing a few hundred members.

Mr. McLuskie's main argument was that as the workers used compulsion in the Trade Unions they ought not to oppose Compulsion for the army. He was afraid that if the Government took up their challenge on this point they would wipe out the Labour Party in a General Election. He asked them who they were to trust in this matter: Smillie or Kitchener? And from the delegates came the almost unanimous reply: "We trust Smillie." Subsequently, when Mr. McLuskie made reference to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, there was a great outburst of cheering, while the mention of a Labour member of the Cabinet was hailed with hisses.

After some appealing, the chairman, Mr. David Gibson, got a seconder for the amendment in the person of Mr. McLean, Boot and Shoe Operatives' Union, which numerically is a [illegible] organisation in Scotland.

The Chairman, in bringing [illegible] a close, declared he was in favour of industrial action if necessary to prevent Conscription, and the great audience rose en masse and cheered repeatedly. As those present are mainly employed in the munitions industry in the East End of Glasgow, their action will count for something when the critical hour arrives.

A SOLDIER SPEAKS.

The Kensington and Paddington Labour Council has formed an Anti-Conscription Committee, which is doing good work. On Saturday a very successful meeting was addressed by a soldier from the front who has lost one leg. His speech made a remarkable impression on the audience. Messrs. H. Roberts (organiser), Vacher (N.-C.F.), Holder, Collier, Lecerf, and Miss G. Neal also addressed the meeting, and the audience was overwhelmingly against Compulsion. A strong resolution against Conscription, moved by the soldier, was carried. Other meetings are being arranged in conjunction with the N.-C.F., and the I.L.P. is well represented in the campaign.

MR TREVELYAN AT KEIGHLEY.

Mr. C. P. Trevelyan, M.P., was the principal speaker at a demonstration held in Keighley on Sunday night under the auspices of the I.L.P. and the N.-C.F. He said the small number of 39 who voted against the second reading did not in the least represent the anger, distress, and sullen resentment of enormous masses of the people of this country. Perhaps this was the turning point in the history of liberty. It was true German militarism was the worst in Europe, but there was no particular magic about the nature of Britons which would make British militarism, if they got it, a milder militarism than German militarism.

If the Conscriptionists got this Bill through they would soon want the whole Conscription system in operation. "I say," Mr. Trevelyan added, "that it is cant, hypocrisy, and sham to say the Bill was introduced merely for the purpose of winning the war. It is being introduced for the period after the war for fastening the chains upon you." The Bill, however much amended, would give additional power to enslave men industrially.

A resolution protesting emphatically against the introduction of the Bill and the violation of the liberties of the people was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Trevelyan had arranged to address a meeting for the Haworth I.L.P. in the afternoon, but the proprietors of the hall withdrew their consent.

MANCHESTER QUAKERS AND THE BILL

The Friends' Meeting House, Manchester, was crowded on Sunday evening, when Principal J. W. Graham and the Rev. Leyton Richards spoke on freedom of conscience in relation to compulsory military service.

Mr. Graham, whilst recognising the good intentions of the Government in inserting what it believed to be a conscience clause, said it would not suffice for most of them, since they could do no auxiliary work as part of an organisation of fighting men.

Mr. Richards said conscientious objection did not rest upon the refusal to bear arms, but upon the refusal to take any part in a service which would assist the prosecution of the war. Hundreds of persons would gladly undertake the duty of mine-sweeping if it was under civil control, did not involve any military oath, actual or implied, and if British as well as German mines were swept up.

A TRIAL IN ENDURANCE.

On Sunday afternoon an endurance contest between the Trades Council and the meeting-smashers in Hebden Bridge ended in a win for the Trades Council. An anti-Conscription meeting had been announced, and in some quarters it had been intimated that there would be no meeting. As soon as the doors were opened the recruiting officer—who was in uniform—and his "comrades" rushed into the hall and mounted the platform. The Trades Council speakers walked on to the platform when the time for commencement arrived, and by this time the hall was packed. When the chairman (Mr. J. W. Crowther) began to speak the noise of the hooligans drowned every word. Mr. Arthur Dawson (of Huddersfield) was announced, and for an hour he paraded the platform good-humouredly, making repeated efforts to get a hearing. Then he got in some good hits concerning British freedom, and finished his speech. An opposite[illegible] attentive hearing.

DERISIVE HOWLS AT PRINCIPLE.

On Sunday afternoon Mr. R. L. Outhwaite, M.P., addressed an anti-Conscription demonstration at Oldham. The Rev. M. P. Davies presided, and Mr. Hill, the assistant secretary of the anti-Conscription group in Oldham, explained that the group was composed of the I.L.P., the Free Churches, and the No-Conscription Fellowship. Mr. Outhwaite remarked that in the House of Commons at present the mention of principle was greeted with howls of derision. But if we forfeit our principles, he said, we shall sink to the level of the Prussian conscripts who have surrendered their liberties to the State. A resolution declaring unalterable opposition to any form of compulsory military service was carried by an overwhelming majority.

TICKET-OF-LEAVE MEN.

In the Milton Hall, Manchester, on Saturday, a meeting representative of the National Industrial and Professional Women's Suffrage Society, the Lancashire and Cheshire Women's Textile and other Workers Representation Committee, and the Manchester and Salford Women's Trades and Labour Council, was called to protest against compulsory military service. The resolution declared that the abolition of personal liberty and of industrial freedom was involved, and that citizens were deprived of the right to be judged by the civil courts. Miss Gore Booth, in moving the resolution, said the unmarried men workers would become virtually ticket-of-leave men.

PRISON OR DEATH FIRST.

A meeting to protest against the introduction of the Compulsion Bill was held in Nelson under the auspices of the I.L.P., No-Conscription Fellowship, and the Fellowship of Reconciliation. It was stated that the local Bill-Posting Company had refused their hoardings, and also that the Salem School had been refused. The Rev. E. Barson, a local Baptist Minister, said if the alternative was going to mean imprisonment or death, he was going to prison or he was going to death along with dozens more who believed as he did.

IRISH WOMEN'S VIEW.

The Provisional Committee of the Irish women's International League has issued a statement declaring its belief that any "form of military or industrial compulsory service in Great Britain and Ireland would seriously menace liberty and social progress, because it involves the domination of might rather than right, the crushing of democracy, and the persistence of injustice towards women."

SUPPORT FOR MR. HARVEY.

Mr. A. G. C. Harvey, M.P., has voted against both readings of the Military Service Bill, and the Rochdale Trades Council, the Labour Party, and the Rochdale branch of the U.D.C. have sent resolutions of congratulation to him. The Rochdale branch of the No-Conscription Fellowship has sent a similar message and hopes he will maintain his opposition. Each member of the Fellowship has agreed to send Mr. Harvey a letter stating the objection on conscientious grounds to military service.

PHILIP MORRELL, M.P., EXPLAINS.

Mr. P. Morrell, M.P., voted against the Conscription Bill, and in a letter explaining his attitude he says he believes Conscription to be an utterly bad system which, wherever it has been tried, has the effect of depressing labour, lowering wages, and hindering all true progress. "For the first time in our later history men will be taken by force, whether they wish it or not, and sent out to fight on foreign soil. That is in itself a tremendous change in our national ideas, and the greater number of those who supported the Bill in Parliament made no secret whatever of the fact that it was to them but a first instalment of the system of general compulsory service which they hope to see established. The present scheme, indeed, is in many ways so capricious and unjust that it is difficult to see how it can be long allowed to stand. It must, I believe, in common fairness be modified or extended. I cannot help regarding it as a deplorable thing," Mr. Morrell concludes, "that now, when the tide of war seems at last about to turn, when Germany, in spite of her great efforts, is evidently hard pressed, we should abandon a system that has given us splendid results and enter on a method of Compulsion that is opposed to all the traditions and temper of our race."

Green and Tottenham, and Liverpool.

YOUNG SCOTS' OPPOSITION.

The National Council of the Young Scots' Society expresses its satisfaction at the success of the Derby Scheme as a signal triumph of the voluntary system, and protests against the hasty introduction of compulsion on the basis of hypothetical figures.

MANY RESOLUTIONS.

Additional resolutions of strong protest against the Military Service Bill now before Parliament reach us from:

Conference of the Lancashire and Cheshire Division of the I.L.P.
Executive Committee of the B.S.P.
Meeting of Trade Unionists and others in Wisbech (one dissentient).
Rossendale I.L.P. (public meeting: unanimous).
Bristol L.R.C. and Trades Council (public meeting: four dissentients).
Bristol I.L.P.
Edinburgh District I.L.P. Federation (public meeting: two dissentients).
London Trades Council.
Rochdale Trades Council.
York public meeting (4 to 1 majority).
Peckham Rye public meeting (6 dissentients).
Sheffield I.L.P. (public meeting: 15 dissentients).
Briton Ferry Trades and Labour Council (public meeting).
Briton Ferry, English Baptist Chapel (minister, Rev. R. Powell).
Kensington and Paddington Anti-Conscription Committee.
Croydon I.L.P.
Ilkeston Trades and Labour Council.
Altrincham Trades and Labour Council.
Bradford City Joint Committee of the N.U.R.
Bristol Dockers' Union.
Bristol Branch of the National Union of Clerks.
Executive Council of the London Society of Machine Rulers.
Kingston I.L.P.
Dundee I.L.P., N.-C.F., Trades Council, and L.R.C. (public meeting).
Walthamstow Adult School.
Women's Union for Peace Committee.
Walsall I.L.P.
Willow Walk Branch of the Railway Clerks' Association.
Delegate meeting representative of Wimbledon Trades and Labour Council, Wandsworth I.L.P., Wandsworth and Wimbledon N.-C.F., Wimbledon Adult School, Wimbledon Fellowship of Reconciliation.
Dundee Labour Party.
North Staffordshire Trades and Labour Council.
Burton-on-Trent Labour Party.
Camlachie I.L.P. (Public meeting: one dissentient).
Dumbarton I.L.P.
Altrincham I.L.P.
Carlton and Netherfield I.L.P. (Public meeting).
City of London I.L.P.
Stoney Stanton I.L.P.
Committee of Bristol Branch of the Women's International League.
Carlisle and District Vigilance Committee of the N.U.R. (representing 3,000 railwaymen).
Norwich Trades Council and Labour Party.
Half-yearly Conference of the Lancashire and Cheshire Division of the I.L.P.
Conference of Branches of the National Union of Shop Assistants in the East Midlands.
Metal, Engineering, and Shipbuilding Amalgamation Committee, London.
Crewe I.L.P.
Crewe Public Meeting.

The Executive Committee of the United Patternmakers' Association considers that it is necessary in the interests of Organised Labour, that a Conference of the Executives of the Trade Unions concerned in the Treasury Agreement, together with the Miners' Federation, meet on or before January 22.

SCOTLAND STANDS FIRM.

Organised Labour in Scotland has declared its opposition to the Military Service Bill even more emphatically than the National Labour Congress did two weeks ago.

The declaration was made on Saturday at a conference held in Glasgow under the joint auspices of the Scottish Trades Union Congress and the Scottish Advisory Council of the Labour Party, which was attended by over 300 delegates who had come instructed by their organisations to vote for or against the Bill. Out of this large and instructed delegation, which represented every influential organisation in Scotland, including the National Union of Mineworkers, only three delegates voted in favour of the Bill. The official resolution, in the following terms, was therefore carried with practical unanimity:

Britain, wh[illegible] Bill as an insult to the people of this country. In his opinion there was no need for Conscription, as Lord Kitchener had secured the number of men he required as well as the necessary materials. Even if the voluntary system had produced ten million men the Conscriptionists would not have been satisfied and would have insisted on Conscription all the same. He was opposed on principle to the Conscription of young men who had no voice in the affairs of the nation, and he denied the right of any nation to conscript men who were refused the franchise because they were not householders. Although there were plenty of men and a scarcity of money, the Government had not yet thought of conscripting money. If there were Conscription of wealth there would be no need for Conscription of men.

Mr. Smillie, speaking in grave tones, continued:

The Conference Committee, in submitting the resolution, did not think it would be wise to lay down the lines that the workers ought to take in the event of the Bill becoming an Act of Parliament. The probability was that it would become law, but he believed there would be more difficulty in carrying it out when it became law than in passing it. No one knew to what extent the opposition to this compulsory service bill if it became law would go. He remembered the statement made by a one-time eminent statesman that a bad law was more honoured in the breach than the observance, and to him this bill, when it became law, would be a bad law, and he personally would feel he was justified in doing all in his power to make it ineffective. He did not throw that out as a threat in any way, but he was sure there would be considerable opposition to it, and in more than one direction.

Mr. Smillie's statement that he would do all in his power to make the Bill "ineffective" if passed into law roused the conference to great enthusiasm, and it was apparent his declaration of resistance was the lead the delegates were waiting for. They cheered Smillie time and again.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Neil Beaton, of the Shop Assistants' Union, who said that Conscription was meant for the workshop as well as for the army.

An amendment in favour of the Bill was moved by Mr. Peter McLuskie, secretary of the Glasgow Bottlemakers' Union, a small local organisation containing a few hundred members.

Mr. McLuskie's main argument was that as the workers used compulsion in the Trade Unions they ought not to oppose Compulsion for the army. He was afraid that if the Government took up their challenge on this point they would wipe out the Labour Party in a General Election. He asked them who they were to trust in this matter: Smillie or Kitchener? And from the delegates came the almost unanimous reply: "We trust Smillie." Subsequently, when Mr. McLuskie made reference to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, there was a great outburst of cheering, while the mention of a Labour member of the Cabinet was hailed with hisses.

After some appealing, the chairman, Mr. David Gilmour, got a seconder for the amendment in the person of Mr. McLean, Boot and Shoe Operatives' Union, which numerically is not a strong organisation in Scotland.

The vote resulted:

For the Amendment	3
For the Resolution	300
MAJORITY AGAINST	297

The votes cast for the resolution represent about 250,000 organised workers, and those for the amendment about 1,500 workers.

The delegates knew that three men on the platform—Mr. David Gilmour, the Chairman, Mr. Maxwell Palmer, Aberdeen, and Mr. Robert Allan Edinburgh—were in favour of Conscription, and were surprised that neither Mr. Palmer or Mr. Allan had voted for the amendment moved by Mr. McLuskie. However, they had another card to play in the form of an amendment in favour of a ballot.

In the division, the original resolution was again carried by 300 votes to 6. In this unmistakable manner organised Labour in Scotland pledged itself to resist Conscription.

A Conference of North of England conscientious objectors to military service will be held in Manchester on Saturday afternoon. Tickets may be had from Mr. Lloyd, 41, Oxford Street, Manchester.

679/51

TOWARDS A NEW EUROPE.

By E. D.
(Author of "Ten Years [illegible] acy")

[It is due to Mr. Morel to say that the following article has been in our hands since the end of last month, and that it was written before Mr. Runciman delivered his recent speech in the House of Commons. We were reluctantly compelled to hold it over owing to the great pressure on our space.]

An arrangement for the internationalisation of commercial activity in the extra-European dependencies* of the Colonial Powers and for the neutralisation of the dependencies themselves would remove three-fifths, possibly four-fifths, of the cause of potential conflicts between States. It would be a self-denying ordinance on the part of the Governments, but the peoples would be the material gainers thereby, apart altogether from the immense gain derivable by them from the elimination of the chief irritant in international relations. And if the European Governments could be induced to go thus far, it would be comparatively easy to extend the principle to China, Persia, and other parts of Asia and Africa ruled over by indigenous governments free from direct European tutelage, but necessarily accessible to and swayed by European influence. In other words, if agreement were possible in regard to the dependencies, there could be agreement to refrain from pursuing exclusive commercial or political advantages (which are usually the cloak to cover the former) in independent Asiatic and African territories. There is nothing Utopian or visionary in these suggestions. They are eminently practicable. Their execution would involve no diminution of commercial activity and business enterprise on the part of the nationals of any European State. But all would compete on equal terms. Acumen, applicability to local conditions, up-to-date methods, hard work—these would be the criterions of success.

I mean by the expression "internationalisation of commercial activities" the dependencies of the Powers. That the nationals of all European States shall compete on an equal footing in the colonial dependencies of each, whether in commerce, industry, banking, mining, shipping, or any other form of legitimate enterprise. I mean that a Frenchman, an Italian, a Russian, a Dutchman, a German, a Belgian, an Englishman shall carry on his business on equal terms in a French, British, German, Italian, Russian, Dutch, or Belgian dependency as the case may be. I mean that representatives of all nationalities that care to do so shall have equal rights of tendering for the construction of public works, and a share, if they desire it, in enterprises necessitating large capital outlay, in the dependencies of the various Powers. I do not mean that the local administration of a dependency should not impose taxes on European enterprises in order to raise revenue, but that such taxes, whatever form they take, should be imposed without differentiation. Neither do I suggest that the administration itself should be internationalised, although the creation of International Boards for the discussion and adjustment of local difficulties, upon which commercial representatives of the nations interested would sit, might suggest itself as a feasible development in course of time.

The subject has another side to it, superficially irrelevant, but to those who look beneath the surface indissolubly connected, viz., the treatment of the native races. If economic rivalry between the colonising Powers in the undeveloped or partly developed areas of the world's surface could be done away with, the rights and the wrongs of the native races would receive closer and more sympathetic consideration by the Governments. At present the native races are callously sacrificed to rivalries between the Governments—perfectly futile rivalries for the most part; and the Governments have not yet realised that the perpetration of, or the acquiescence in, moral wrongs inflicted upon the natives react in the most detrimental fashion [illegible]

By the "neutralisation" of the dependencies themselves, the writer means the removal of these over-sea areas from the operations of European war. This was intended by the Berlin and Brussels Acts to apply to a considerable part of the African Continent. But that provision, like everything else, has gone by the board. What chance, then, the sceptic will exclaim, of extending that principle on a vaster and, indeed, universal scale after the war, or by the terms of Settlement? Every chance, if public opinion will but apply itself to the problem in the meantime; and, intrinsically, a very good chance, for a multiplicity of reasons. The Berlin and Brussels Acts laying down the neutralisation of the Congo Basin had been so frequently violated both in the letter and spirit before the war, that it may have been said to have been a dead letter from the start. The war itself has produced many weighty arguments in favour of the neutralisation of African and Asiatic dependencies. When passions have cooled down and a sense of perspective reasserts itself, I do not suppose the British or French Governments will feel particularly proud, or particularly easy in their minds as to the ultimate effects of their action—at having imported Asiatics* and Africans to fight their battles upon the plains of Europe. Experience will suggest to them the doubtful wisdom of consecrating that policy.

It would be idle to deny that the neutralisation of the European dependencies over-seas would entail a sacrifice on Britain's part; while, on the other hand, the internationalisation of commercial activities within them would be to her advantage, because of her commercial experience. For it is evident, of course, that in time of war the dependencies of every European State are at the mercy, virtually speaking, of the Power which commands the seas. Their neutralisation would, therefore, involve on the part of Britain the loss of an advantage which her sea power gives to her. Let us face the fact frankly. But let us also ask ourselves, with an equal desire to deal honestly with ourselves, whether the voluntary surrender of that advantage would really injure the vital interests of the British people; and, too, whether, in the long run, the Powers of Europe can be expected to acquiesce in a situation which makes all their over-seas enterprise subject to British sufferance in time of war. To-day, no doubt, this is a German grievance. But yesterday it was a French grievance. To-morrow it may be a grievance collectively urged. The way to envisage the problem is not in terms of the grievance of this or that particular State at a particular moment; but in terms of the future of Europe, humanity, and of Britain herself. Continental Powers can never be expected to disarm on land even approximately, still less to abandon the idea of challenging us on the seas, so long as their policy over-seas is carried out subject to our good will and pleasure. The safety of an island-Empire whose nerve-centres depend upon sustenance from abroad can never be jeopardised without a radical elimination of the causes which might place that safety in jeopardy. But neither can an island-Empire in a future world of man's increasing mastery over air arrogate with safety to itself the right to maintain a perpetual mortgage over the extra-European activities—the Imperial policy—of Europe. But that has been, and is, the attitude of British statesmanship. We say, in effect, to the Powers of Europe: "You can have an over-seas policy if you wish. You can acquire dependencies, spend money on them, build up a big trade with them. But if you are so foolish as to fall foul of us, understand that we shall promptly seize them." Most Englishmen believe to-day that this war was caused by the German Government's desire to dictate to Europe, in Europe. Assuredly some Germans have put forward views which, logically interpreted, mean nothing else. But in our own case we quite deliberately, and as the most natural thing in the world, claim to dictate, by virtue [illegible] cies, on the lines here laid down, the word rests primarily with France, which, after Britain, possesses the largest over-seas Empire and treats it as a protectionist reserve. But Germany, too, would have to consent to make sacrifices, for there must be a German quid pro quo. The internationalisation of "colonial" trade would be the first step towards undermining the tariff in Europe itself. Both in her over-seas policy and in her home policy Europe must gravitate towards freedom of trade, or continue to nurse within her bosom the asp of international strife. At present her ruling classes, pushed forward by vested interests and at their wits' ends to conciliate the most superficially powerful elements in their public opinion for the horrors and losses of the war, would seem to be busily preparing for renewed economic conflicts, rendered the more bitter by pumping into them the passions of the time; and hence preparing for fresh political conflicts and increased armaments. For let this incontestable truth sink into the minds of all the peoples. If, when the cannons cease to boom, the blight of the tariff war ensues, the hopes of humanity, which centre in this frightful catastrophe being the last of its kind, are blasted. Were European frontiers remodelled, as the result of this war, upon the most approved lines of national boundaries and political consciousness, and the tariff and the colonial monopoly not only remained in being but were aggravated by a further strengthening of the artificial barriers between peoples, the most fundamental of all causes of international friction would subsist. When one reads about this plotting and counter-plotting on the part of the British, German, French, Austrian, Russian, and Italian Governments to hamper Britons, Germans, Frenchmen, Austrians, Russians, and Italians in the exchange of commodities, one is tempted to ask whether statesmanship has not become utterly bankrupt in ideas. While its spokesmen declare that a durable peace is their one end and aim, they are deliberately engineering war under the spur of a spurious patriotism. They are arranging to plunge Europe back into the morass.

Imagine a draught of pure, wholesome air sweeping through the musty atmosphere of the Chancelleries, and you might picture to yourself these men, appalled at the consequences of their own past incompetence, concocting no more poisonous brews, but some healing balsam to cure the wounds they have inflicted. You might perceive a germ of common-sense expanding into some such constructive set of proposals as these. For a period of, say, twenty-five years—no agreement should be unlimited in time—the British Government would pledge itself to the continued maintenance of the open-door throughout the British dependencies. It would surrender for that period the preference granted by the Dominions. The French Government would initiate the policy of the open-door throughout the French dependencies, and would undertake to maintain it for that period. The German Government would pledge itself to maintain the policy of the open-door throughout the dependencies remaining to Germany as the outcome of the general settlement; and would further take the first stride towards European free trade by lowering its home tariff towards all countries alike—a measure which would benefit the Allies primarily, since it is the Allies which do the greatest volume of business with her. Substantially the British Government would say to the German:

"We guarantee to you a continuance of that equality of commercial treatment in the United Kingdom and in the British dependencies which you have always enjoyed. For a quarter of a century you would thus be freed from the fear of a tariff wall round the British Empire. As a proof of the sincerity of our intentions, we are even willing to forego the preference accorded to us by our self-governing Dominions. In return we ask for reciprocity both in your dependencies and in your home market. So far as your home market [illegible] existing Protection [illegible] prevails, of making the first s[illegible] to ensure the ultimate economic [illegible] of the nations. Which alternative [illegible] most to humanity? Which is the wisest [illegible]

What of France? What advantages would she derive from the establishment of commercial freedom in her African and Asiatic Empire? What disadvantage would she suffer? "France" would suffer no disadvantage. "France" would gain priceless advantages. A few specific French interests would be affected. A certain pestilent type of politician, journalist, and financier who has been the curse of the Third Republic and who thrives on colonial jobberies, would find his occupation gone, to the lasting benefit of political purity at home and administrative decency in the French dependencies. On the other hand, it is a fact that nearly all the great exporting French firms are in favour of "colonial" free trade, and many of the most experienced French colonial administrators also. Notably is this the case in French West Africa, where the most considerable colonial effort of France has been exercised, and where the greatest volume of French colonial trade has been attained. The French West African merchants are dead against Protection, and always resist an increase in differential taxation. The French dependencies themselves would grow richer and more prosperous with the disappearance of the differential tariff. Their trade would increase by leaps and bounds, and as the natural result there would be more revenue to spend on public works, sanitation, agricultural development, and native affairs. The whole character of French over-seas activity would be affected for the good.

What of Germany? As I stated in my last article, Germany, like ourselves and Holland, has kept the open door in her dependencies. But what of the quid pro quo in the shape of a lowering of the home tariff? Observe, first of all, the justice of the standpoint. A British open-door policy throughout the Empire is of enormous value to Germany. Granted that we have not kept the open door all these years from altruistic motives The fact remains that our action in so doing has benefited Germany in the measure of her commercial ability; and as her commercial ability is very considerable, the advantage has been very considerable. Why should she not begin to reciprocate in her home market? She is surrounded by Protectionist Powers. True. But a very little actual experience would show her rulers that the German people as a whole would benefit if the German tariff were lowered to all comers. And if Germany once took this step, reciprocity would undoubtedly eventuate. The mass of the German people would be unquestionably favourable to such a course of action, and were Britain to put forward a policy such as this, instead of indulging in tall talk about crushing, dismembering, overthrowing, and so forth, the peace and anti-militarist party in Germany would be enormously strengthened. The vested interests, the agrarians, the "Junkers" would be up in arms. But it would be a square fight between them and the German masses. Who can doubt the ultimate result? Here is a true democratic policy for Britain to follow, a policy which would automatically and inevitably cut away the props which sustain Continental militarism.

Will the British people think it out for themselves? Will the leaders of British Labour look ahead, or continue dully to acquiesce in being swept away by a torrent of loose thought, faulty economics, and sterile passions? Is it possible that at least the North of England and Scotland does not even now contain sufficient elements impregnated with Cobden's teaching to evolve a counter-programme to that tariff war which the Government in power, the Northcliffe Press, which is its insolent master, and the selfish interests represented by Leagues and combines, are undoubtedly hatching? If so, these various forces in our national life must rouse themselves to action before it is too late.

tween States. It would be a self-denying ordinance on the part of the Governments, but the peoples would be the material gainers thereby, apart altogether from the immense gain derivable by them from the elimination of the chief irritant in international relations. And if the European Governments could be induced to go thus far, it would be comparatively easy to extend the principle to China, Persia, and other parts of Asia and Africa ruled over by indigenous governments free from direct European tutelage, but necessarily accessible to and swayed by European influence. In other words, if agreement were possible in regard to the dependencies, there could be agreement to refrain from pursuing exclusive commercial or political advantages (which are usually the cloak to cover the former) in independent Asiatic and African territories. There is nothing Utopian or visionary in these suggestions. They are eminently practicable. Their execution would involve no diminution of commercial activity and business enterprise on the part of the nationals of any European State. But all would compete on equal terms. Acumen, applicability to local conditions, up-to-date methods, hard work—these would be the criterions of success.

I mean by the expression "internationalisation of commercial activities" the dependencies of the Powers. That the nationals of all European States shall compete on an equal footing in the colonial dependencies of each, whether in commerce, industry, banking, mining, shipping, or any other form of legitimate enterprise. I mean that a Frenchman, an Italian, a Russian, a Dutchman, a German, a Belgian, an Englishman shall carry on his business on equal terms in a French, British, German, Italian, Russian, Dutch, or Belgian dependency as the case may be. I mean that representatives of all nationalities that care to do so shall have equal rights of tendering for the construction of public works, and a share, if they desire it, in enterprises necessitating large capital outlay, in the dependencies of the various Powers. I do not mean that the local administration of a dependency should not impose taxes on European enterprises in order to raise revenue, but that such taxes, whatever form they take, should be imposed without differentiation. Neither do I suggest that the administration itself should be internationalised, although the creation of international Boards for the discussion and adjustment of local difficulties, upon which commercial representatives of the nations interested would sit, might suggest itself as a feasible development in course of time.

The subject has another side to it, superficially irrelevant, but to those who look beneath the surface indissolubly connected, viz., the treatment of the native races. If economic rivalry between the colonising Powers in the undeveloped or partly developed areas of the world's surface could be done away with, the rights and the wrongs of the native races would receive closer and more sympathetic consideration by the Governments. At present the native races are callously sacrificed to rivalries between the Governments—perfectly futile rivalries for the most part; and the Governments have not yet realised that the perpetration of, or the acquiescence in, moral wrongs inflicted upon the natives affect in the most detrimental fashion those very economic interests for which these Governments intrigue and agitate. So long as the European Governments look upon these vast African and Asiatic territories as areas for the pursuit of privileges and monopolies, carried on behind closed doors, in favour of a microscopic fraction of their respective nationals, so long will these territories continue to be one of the prime causes of European unrest and European armaments, and so long will their inhabitants be sacrificed—and sacrificed not only immorally but stupidly, without the slightest advantage to the European peoples, and for the sake of purely ephemeral and exclusively selfish interests.

* In using the term "Dependencies," instead of "Colonies," I desire to avoid that confusion in ideas which leads to so much muddled thinking on this subject. The term "Colony" is not applicable to the vast tropical and sub-tropical areas which have been drawn into the vortex of European political ambitions owing to Europe's economic need for the raw material these areas produce. They are not COLONISABLE by White peoples. At the present time these non-colonisable areas and the self-governing Dominions of the British Empire are all lumped together as "Colonies."

plicity of reasons. The [illegible] Acts laying down the neutralisation of the Congo Basin had been so frequently violated both in the letter and spirit before the war, that it may have been said to have been a dead letter from the start. The war itself has produced many weighty arguments in favour of the neutralisation of African and Asiatic dependencies. When passions have cooled down and a sense of perspective reasserts itself, I do not suppose the British or French Governments will feel particularly proud, or particularly easy in their minds as to the ultimate effects of their action—at having imported Asiatics* and Africans to fight their battles upon the plains of Europe. Experience will suggest to them the doubtful wisdom of consecrating that policy.

It would be idle to deny that the neutralisation of the European dependencies over-seas would entail a sacrifice on Britain's part; while, on the other hand, the internationalisation of commercial activities within them would be to her advantage, because of her commercial experience. For it is evident, of course, that in time of war the dependencies of every European State are at the mercy, virtually speaking, of the Power which commands the seas. Their neutralisation would, therefore, involve on the part of Britain the loss of an advantage which her sea power gives to her. Let us face the fact frankly. But let us also ask ourselves, with an equal desire to deal honestly with ourselves, whether the voluntary surrender of that advantage would really injure the vital interests of the British people; and, too, whether, in the long run, the Powers of Europe can be expected to acquiesce in a situation which makes all their over-seas enterprise subject to British sufferance in time of war. To-day, no doubt, this is a German grievance. But yesterday it was a French grievance. To-morrow it may be a grievance collectively urged. The way to envisage the problem is not in terms of the grievance of this or that particular State at a particular moment; but in terms of the future of Europe, humanity, and of Britain herself. Continental Powers can never be expected to disarm on land even approximately, still less to abandon the idea of challenging us on the seas, so long as their policy over-seas is carried out subject to our good will and pleasure. The safety of an island-Empire whose nerve-centres depend upon sustenance from abroad can never be jeopardised without a radical elimination of the causes which might place that safety in jeopardy. But neither can an island-Empire in a future world of man's increasing mastery over air arrogate with safety to itself the right to maintain a perpetual mortgage over the extra-European activities—the Imperial policy—of Europe. But that has been, and is, the attitude of British statesmanship. We say, in effect, to the Powers of Europe: "You can have an over-seas policy if you wish. You can acquire dependencies, spend money on them, build up a big trade with them. But if you are so foolish as to fall foul of us, understand that we shall promptly seize them." Most Englishmen believe to-day that this war was caused by the German Government's desire to dictate to Europe, in Europe. Assuredly some Germans have put forward views which, logically interpreted, mean nothing else. But in our own case we quite deliberately, and as the most natural thing in the world, claim to dictate, by virtue of our overwhelming sea power, the policy of European Powers outside Europe. To me it appears utterly impossible, either that a better Europe can arise from the ashes of the old while that claim remains the bed-rock of our foreign policy, or that we can continue indefinitely to exercise it with safety to our own country or Empire. The neutralisation of the over-seas dependencies of all Powers offers a just and feasible way of escape from the accumulation of fresh hatreds and of fresh rivalries; and from a position which, ultimately, must in the very nature of things become impracticable to sustain.

Britain is in a position to take the lead in the matter of the neutralisation of the dependencies; quite obviously this great reform could not be consummated without her consent. In the matter of the internationalisation of commercial activities in the dependen-their wits' ends to conciliate the most superficially powerful elements in their public opinion for the horrors and losses of the war, would seem to be busily preparing for renewed economic conflicts, rendered the more bitter by pumping into them the passions of the time; and hence preparing for fresh political conflicts and increased armaments. For let this incontestable truth sink into the minds of all the peoples. If, when the cannons cease to boom, the blight of the tariff war ensues, the hopes of humanity, which centre in this frightful catastrophe being the last of its kind, are blasted. Were European frontiers remodelled, as the result of this war, upon the most approved lines of national boundaries and political consciousness, and the tariff and the colonial monopoly not only remained in being but were aggravated by a further strengthening of the artificial barriers between peoples, the most fundamental of all causes of international friction would subsist. When one reads about this plotting and counter-plotting on the part of the British, German, French, Austrian, Russian, and Italian Governments to hamper Britons, Germans, Frenchmen, Austrians, Russians, and Italians in the exchange of commodities, one is tempted to ask whether statesmanship has not become utterly bankrupt in ideas. While its spokesmen declare that a durable peace is their one end and aim, they are deliberately engineering war under the spur of a spurious patriotism. They are arranging to plunge Europe back into the morass.

* The tribute to the general character of our Indian administration involved in the generous support Indian potentates have given us is gratifying and deserved. It is the wisdom of having profited by it that is doubtful.

Imagine a draught of pure, wholesome air sweeping through the musty atmosphere of the Chancelleries, and you might picture to yourself these men, appalled at the consequences of their own past incompetence, concocting no more poisonous brews, but some healing balsam to cure the wounds they have inflicted. You might perceive a germ of common-sense expanding into some such constructive set of proposals as these. For a period of, say, twenty-five years—no agreement should be unlimited in time—the British Government would pledge itself to the continued maintenance of the open-door throughout the British dependencies. It would surrender for that period the preference granted by the Dominions. The French Government would initiate the policy of the open-door throughout the French dependencies, and would undertake to maintain it for that period. The German Government would pledge itself to maintain the policy of the open-door throughout the dependencies remaining to Germany as the outcome of the general settlement; and would further take the first stride towards European free trade by lowering its home tariff towards all countries alike—a measure which would benefit the Allies primarily, since it is the Allies which do the greatest volume of business with her. Substantially the British Government would say to the German:

"We guarantee to you a continuance of that equality of commercial treatment in the United Kingdom and in the British dependencies which you have always enjoyed. For a quarter of a century you would thus be freed from the fear of a tariff wall round the British Empire. As a proof of the sincerity of our intentions, we are even willing to forego the preference accorded to us by our self-governing Dominions. In return we ask for reciprocity both in your dependencies and in your home market. So far as your home market is concerned, we recognise that you cannot immediately abolish your tariff, but it should be substantially lowered. In stipulating this we are demanding from you considerably less than we have ourselves always accorded you, and what we are prepared, under these conditions, to go on according you. But we realise the economic problem you have to face, and we feel that the British people and the British Empire are sufficiently great and powerful to give this earnest of their desire to eliminate future international friction." In so acting the British Government would be laying the foundations of international concord, saving its own people from the disabilities and restrictions inherent to Protection; receiving in return a substantial concession from Germany. Instead of maturing further impediments to human intercourse, elaborating further schemes for the manufacture of human bitterness—the prospect of consolidating an existent freedom of human intercourse where such freedom prevails, of undermining the ramparts of occupation gone, to the lasting benefit of political purity at home and administrative decency in the French dependencies. On the other hand, it is a fact that nearly all the great exporting French firms are in favour of "colonial" free trade, and many of the most experienced French colonial administrators also. Notably is this the case in French West Africa, where the most considerable colonial effort of France has been exercised, and where the greatest volume of French colonial trade has been attained. The French West African merchants are dead against Protection, and always resist an increase in differential taxation. The French dependencies themselves would grow richer and more prosperous with the disappearance of the differential tariff. Their trade would increase by leaps and bounds, and as the natural result there would be more revenue to spend on public works, sanitation, agricultural development, and native affairs. The whole character of French over-seas activity would be affected for the good.

What of Germany? As I stated in my last article, Germany, like ourselves and Holland, has kept the open door in her dependencies. But what of the quid pro quo in the shape of a lowering of the home tariff? Observe, first of all, the justice of the standpoint. A British open-door policy throughout the Empire is of enormous value to Germany. Granted that we have not kept the open door all these years from altruistic motives The fact remains that our action in so doing has benefited Germany in the measure of her commercial ability; and as her commercial ability is very considerable, the advantage has been very considerable. Why should she not begin to reciprocate in her home market? She is surrounded by Protectionist Powers. True. But a very little actual experience would show her rulers that the German people as a whole would benefit if the German tariff were lowered to all comers. And if Germany once took this step, reciprocity would undoubtedly eventuate. The mass of the German people would be unquestionably favourable to such a course of action, and were Britain to put forward a policy such as this, instead of indulging in tall talk about crushing, dismembering, overthrowing, and so forth, the peace and anti-militarist party in Germany would be enormously strengthened. The vested interests, the agrarians, the "Junkers" would be up in arms. But it would be a square fight between them and the German masses. Who can doubt the ultimate result? Here is a true democratic policy for Britain to follow, a policy which would automatically and inevitably cut away the props which sustain Continental militarism.

Will the British people think it out for themselves? Will the leaders of British Labour look ahead, or continue dully to acquiesce in being swept away by a torrent of loose thought, faulty economics, and sterile passions? Is it possible that at least the North of England and Scotland does not even now contain sufficient elements impregnated with Cobden's teaching to evolve a counter-programme to that tariff war which the Government in power, the Northcliffe Press, which is its insolent master, and the selfish interests represented by Leagues and combines, are undoubtedly hatching? If so, these various forces in our national life must rouse themselves to action before it is too late.

* * *

And so I bring these articles to a close. They have been widely discussed here and abroad. Many precious letters and some abusive ones have reached me in connection with them. In certain quarters they have been malignantly misrepresented. That was a matter of course. The motive which has inspired me in writing them has been to state the truth as I saw it. I cannot believe that national interests can be adversely affected by the contemplation of the truth, even though it may not always be palatable. We have reached a crisis in the destinies of our race. A man who at such a time and because many of the views he holds are for the moment unpopular, chooses the easy course of standing aside when he thinks that certain things ought to be frankly and boldly stated in the national interest, betrays his conscience. For the rest, magna est veritas et praevalebit. Great is truth, and it will prevail—despite all efforts to obscure and suppress it.

Cotton Factory Times 579/40 6

PUTTING HIS HEAD IN THE NOOSE.

THE WORKER AND CONSCRIPT SERVICE.

MEN BUT NOT MONEY.

BY ADA NIELD CHEW.

According to all available evidence, there exists a substantial number of British working men (outside Ireland) who, though protesting that they hate war, are in reality so enamoured of it that they consider the sacrifices of the very liberties they affect to be fighting to protect, cheap at the price. To such the thin end of the conscription wedge, as applied to "single men first" (but not last!) will actually be welcomed. A man who believes that he and his get something substantial from war, cannot logically object to the price asked; he who does not object to the forcing of men to fight simply because they happen to be unmarried is worse than stupid if he objects to the next logical step—the conscripting of his own and other men's labour. If the British working man is determined to bind himself with the shackles of the conscript slave he will do so, but it would at least be wise to pause and ask himself what he is doing. Almost every home has by this time given a soldier to the war. In every country at the first beat of the drum they ran to fight. The prevalence of a narrow, personal view, due to causes deep-laid in the century-old experience of humankind, being general and more than ever prevalent under present circumstances, has made it easy, even in Britain, to establish a conscription.

A Childish Attitude.

"My boy has gone to the war," is the cry, "let 'em make his lad go, too." It reminds one of the squabbles of children. "Mother, our John Henry won't do such and such a thing; make him do it as well as me!" But that nearly everybody is blinded by a narrow, unthinking, personal vision, it might be possible to see, and to avoid, what lies ahead. Those who have determined to seize this war as an opportunity to get the British workman well under the control of his "betters" know well what lies behind their conscription dodge. Once the principle of compulsion is conceded their battle—of money against labour—is won. If you admit that a man may be made to fight simply because he is single you cannot stop there, and in future—how near a future we may guess—it will be only the next most logical step automatically to make married men soldiers, too. And if you can compel them to fight you can of course compel them to work—on your terms. The next cry only needs to be that the trade of the country cannot be carried on under the present exorbitant price of labour. Moral, lower the price. If the workman objects—why then, of course, the sovereign remedy of "compulsion"—so necessary to win the war—can be readily introduced. The working man is told that "we" must win the war. Nothing is more certain than that if it is won—that is, if the combined weight of the Allies at last wears out the German resources; nearly everybody now having given up the vainglorious hope of marching triumphantly along Unter Den Linden within a given time—the working men will win it. But if they have allowed their persons to be forcibly seized, will it not be rather vain to protest against the forcing of their labour, too?

Slave Souls.

Some are prepared for anything—to the slave soul freedom is valueless, except as a war cry, and he is incapable of realising his degradation. But others are hoping to safeguard themselves by means of a stipulation for "the duration of this war." It is becoming plainer every day that the constant and rapid growth of militarism is making the parrot cry of "this is the last war" more and more ridiculous. At the end of this war the working man will be told that he must prepare for the next, and one of the most obvious and necessary preparations will be national military service—conscript soldiers. A clergyman preached the other day to the effect that one of the most obvious means of paying for the war would be to economise in social reform, and he warned the working classes that they had better realise at once that there was no hope in that direction after the war. The condition of things at that time will be: a depleted, more or less crippled, manhood of conscript soulless slaves, an underpaid, docile womanhood, having highly specialised slave tendencies, and without any political power, overrunning the labour market; and a ruling class having greatly increased power and unimpaired wealth. Is this prospect (not a fancy one, if once we admit conscription) really worth all the sacrifices labour is making to-day? Is it merely the person and the labour of working men which is necessary to "save England?" Is it only working men who have any duty towards England? The "pledge to the married man" is the most patent dodge which ever hoodwinked a deluded, war-mad worker; munitions are only hindered from production by the constant necessity of adaptation to the profit making of private individuals. But capital is very much not at the service of the war, and there is no talk of conscripting it. Why? Because it belongs to somebody other than the worker. It is he whose person is most numerous and therefore handiest to have under military control; it is he who is the munition maker, and can therefore safely be dealt with by a vindictive Munitions Act; but in the money drama his is only a minor part. Money is as necessary to the war as men and guns, yet it is proposed to drag men from their homes and to force them to fight for "our country," whilst "our equally necessary money" is wooed and enticed by offers of unimpaired return after use with large additions in the shape of interest. Whilst working men become cheap conscript soldiers, capital is allowed to take advantage of the war, and to raise its price to the State which defends it, charging a high rate of interest and getting absolute security for the sums it lends (not gives). The working man has no guarantee, if he escapes with his life, that the "freedom" for which he fights will be that which he enjoyed before he fought — and which, indeed, it cannot be if he becomes a conscript. But the MONEY required by the State from the only people who have it, comes under another category. It is so much more valuable and useful than the common lives and common labour of common working men! That view is entirely comprehensible as that of a Government and rulers made up of moneyed men. But what, oh, what can we think of working men who adopt it, too?

Trade and the Flag.

There has been a little fruitless talk about "mobilising" our American credit. Vast sums of British money are invested abroad, in itself a species of treachery. Capital invested abroad raises interest at home, and needs the protection of the Army and Navy more than that kept in our own country. "Our" investments in other countries are a national commitment, though only private persons benefit from them. The old saw about "trade following the flag," which some fatuous "economists" trot out even now in face of the stoppage of trade where the flag has gone, is as silly as many other theories of a political economy based entirely on self-interest; the truth being that the flag follows trade. Our Army and Navy are protecting private interests in many quarters of the globe, and in all conscience, in view of this, it would seem that capital invested abroad ought to suffer compulsion before the person of any working man, married or single, is seized. Amongst those who apply compulsion there is a good deal of tenderness towards capital, however, and none towards the person and labour of workers. If the latter have no tenderness and respect for themselves it is indeed a hopeless case.

Is this only a poor man's war, then? It has been well drilled into our ears during the past 18 months that the Allies' is a just cause, worthy even of the rending of the heart of motherhood, the desolating of homes, of ruining the fair hopes of girlhood, and the wholesale orphaning of children—worthy even of adopting the very methods of Prussianism which we set out to abolish. If that is so, why will the rich, from the Prime Minister, who flouts the idea of reducing his own income, downwards not risk a penny of their capital? Is "honour" and "liberty" (!) not worth anything in coin of the realm? The Government has invited the deposit with itself, on purchase or loan, of all American securities. An "invitation," in ignorance even of how much there is to obtain, is the method adapted to moneybags. But not to the working man! The latter has sadly missed his way, in the glamour and excitement of war. But is there really no limit to his servility? Can it be that he will suffer the last degradation, and become a conscript soldier, without even insisting on being counted at least equal to money? Are his life and labour and his children's future really nothing, weighed against money? If that be really so, then in the name of common sense what is he giving his life for? To save "his" country? For whom? For those whose MONEY is too sacred to be placed at the country's disposal alongside his life?

21-1-16 579/21

CONSCRIPTION AND COMPROMISE.

By A. W. HUMPHREY.

The Conscriptionists think very little of the Military Service Bill as such. Sir Edward Carson voiced their opinion of it when he described it as "anæmic." In Conscriptionist eyes the measure is a feeble thing indeed—it even proposes to recognise that there is such a thing as conscience. But, in one respect, the Bill is very valuable; it admits the principle of compulsion: it gets the thin edge of the wedge firmly in. To get the principle admitted the Conscriptionists may even be willing to make the measure more anæmic still, and perhaps it will have been watered down by the time these lines meet the eyes of the reader. It is in that that the danger lies. If the principle of compulsion remains, concessions on matters of detail will constitute almost a barren victory, the poor fruits of which are not likely to be enjoyed for long.

Not Compensation.

A guarantee that there shall be no industrial compulsion—should such a guarantee be forthcoming—would be no reason for accepting military compulsion. Military compulsion alone would admit the principle which the Conscriptionists are anxious to see adopted. The Bill as originally drafted is a measure for industrial as well as military compulsion, and is an indication of how far the Government would be prepared to go if given a free hand. Whatever changes may be made in committee it is difficult to see how the Bill would not still leave the way open for industrial conscription. There is, for example, a clause in the measure which allows regulations for the local tribunals to be made by Orders in Council. What is to prevent the Government, through the medium of such an order, giving tribunals power to withdraw exemption certificates, and so automatically turn men into soldiers? Certainly, Orders in Council may supplement law to an equal degree. Take, for instance, the case of the right of imprisonment under the Munitions Act. Under pressure, Mr. Lloyd George abolished the right in the amending bill, and at the same time obtained an Order in Council which gave him similar powers! No: a clause in that Bill purporting to obviate the possibility of industrial conscription would very possibly not be worth its face value, and even if it were would not compensate for the imposition of military conscription, which, unlike all other forms of compulsion, compels the person, and reduces men to the level of chattels. And this would especially be the case with Britain now, since it is proposed to commandeer men to serve, not in defence of the homeland (except, perhaps, in a very remote sense), but in any part of the world, to carry out a policy about which not the least information is forthcoming. Members of Parliament may vote men, and vote money, and vote for the conscription of men, but they may not ask questions, or at any rate must not expect answers containing information.

The Conscription of Wealth.

There is not much fear that the Commons will agree to the "conscription of wealth," but it may be as well to point out that conscription of wealth would be no adequate compensation for the conscription of life. Conscription of wealth (so far as I understand this recently-coined phrase) only means that those best able to bear the financial burden of the war should have it placed upon their shoulders; that those who have exploited the country most in time of peace, and who will exploit it again when peace returns, should place their gains at the disposal of the State, which is now concerned (so it is said) with the defence of what, in a very literal sense, is the country of the exploiters. So far the rich have borne comparatively little of the financial burden. They have yielded very little in taxation, and there is no sacrifice in making safe investments at 4½ or 5 per cent. Conscription of wealth would be in line with the social ideas of our time, which aim at the more equal distribution of wealth and the breakdown of monopoly and privilege, and the freer life for the equality which is so terrible a feature of our society.

Vanishing Freedom.

Many recent events are not such as to encourage support for any measure to increase the power of the military authorities. The country is now parcelled out into districts under the control of what is called the "competent military authority" and this authority seems to do pretty much as it likes. Every day it is becoming more dangerous to speak, write, or print anything, not only in opposition to the Government, but which may "offend the competent military authority." First there was the raid on the "Labour Leader" offices and the destruction of pamphlets. Following that came the suppression of "Forward," and of the little news-sheet "The Vanguard." Now the printers of the "Herald," who have printed it for four years through its many vicissitudes, and when it was often "up against" authority, suddenly refuse to print it any more. One does not need to be a Sherlock Holmes to fathom the reason. Secret trials have been introduced, and it is unsafe to talk freely even in a railway carriage, lest, like the Blackpool commercial traveller, somebody concludes that your ideas "prejudice recruiting," and you are forthwith haled before the bench, and after a secret hearing heavily fined. Then there was the suppression of so harmless a thing as the Liverpool concert, organised on behalf of the funds of the Russian Political Prisoners and Exiles Relief Committee, and, later still, the raid on the lodgings of the committee's secretary, and on the offices of the Russian Seamen's Union. By means of the censorship the authorities endeavour to keep all knowledge of such proceedings from the public. British trade unionists might have sympathised with the Seamen's Union, and so, when arrangements were made to bring the facts to their notice, the police raided the home of Mrs. Bridges Adams, and confiscated copies of the statement which was to have been distributed to the delegates at the Joint Labour Congress. Publicity cannot now even be assured through the medium of the House of Commons, as the questions of members are censored. The attitude of mind of the Conscriptionists to all discussion and questioning was well illustrated by Lord Derby at the Guildhall, London, in July last, when he suggested that it would have a "salutary effect" to occasionally take a questioner from the floor of the House of Commons and have him shot in Palace Yard.

Not Parliamentary Government.

It is influences responsible for this growing tyranny to which conscription would give ascendancy and similar influences have been responsible for the present bill. The threats of miners to take action to resist the bill should it become law have been much deprecated by certain newspapers on the ground that to do so would be a refusal to acknowledge the authority of Parliamentary Government, which is the instrument of democracy. Now Parliamentary Government is too precious a thing to be played fast and loose with, and if the passing into law of the present Bill could be held to be the result of Parliamentary Government the attitude of the newspapers referred to would be quite correct. But what does Parliamentary Government imply? It implies that the Government shall have a mandate from the electorate for the legislation it brings forward, and that such legislation shall have the fullest discussion in Parliament and in the country. Now, in connection with the present Bill these conditions are lacking. Not only has the Government no mandate to introduce conscription (doubtless that was why Mr. Asquith said "general assent" would be necessary), but the Government itself came into existence, not as the result of popular election, but owing to circumstances of which the general public know nothing. The late Government gave up the ghost within a few days of the Prime Ministry stating, in effect, that it would do no such thing. Then as well as military compulsion, and is an indication of how far the Government would be prepared to go if given a free hand. Whatever changes may be made in committee it is difficult to see how the Bill would not still leave the way open for industrial conscription. There is, for example, a clause in the measure which allows regulations for the local tribunals to be made by Orders in Council. What is to prevent the Government, through the medium of such an order, giving tribunals power to withdraw exemption certificates, and so automatically turn men into soldiers? Certainly, Orders in Council may supplement law to an equal degree. Take, for instance, the case of the right of imprisonment under the Munitions Act. Under pressure, Mr. Lloyd George abolished the right in the amending bill, and at the same time obtained an Order in Council which gave him similar powers! No: a clause in that Bill purporting to obviate the possibility of industrial conscription would very possibly not be worth its face value, and even if it were would not compensate for the imposition of military conscription, which, unlike all other forms of compulsion, compels the person, and reduces men to the level of chattels. And this would especially be the case with Britain now, since it is proposed to commandeer men to serve, not in defence of the homeland (except, perhaps, in a very remote sense), but in any part of the world, to carry out a policy about which not the least information is forthcoming. Members of Parliament may vote men, and vote money, and vote for the conscription of men, but they may not ask questions, or at any rate must not expect answers containing information.

The Conscription of Wealth.

There is not much fear that the Commons will agree to the "conscription of wealth," but it may be as well to point out that conscription of wealth would be no adequate compensation for the conscription of life. Conscription of wealth (so far as I understand this recently-coined phrase) only means that those best able to bear the financial burden of the war should have it placed upon their shoulders; that those who have exploited the country most in time of peace, and who will exploit it again when peace returns, should place their gains at the disposal of the State, which is now concerned (so it is said) with the defence of what, in a very literal sense, is the country of the exploiters. So far the rich have borne comparatively little of the financial burden. They have yielded very little in taxation, and there is no sacrifice in making safe investments at 4½ or 5 per cent. Conscription of wealth would be in line with the social ideas of our time, which aim at the more equal distribution of wealth and the breakdown of monopoly, whereas conscription of life, far from being in line with those ideas, is a step backward. To obtain precedents and endeavour to show that compulsory military service is consistent with our traditions the apologists of compulsion have to go a long way back. The Prime Minister quotes from a ballad of Henry V.'s time; an Oxford professor writes of Cromwell's "New Model" army. But the fact remains that we have had no compulsion in Britain since the operation of the Militia Ballot Act (under which William Lovett, the Chartist, refused to serve), and all our tradition is against the setting up of a great military institution such as that with which we shall be gravely threatened if the first instalment now before Parliament is accepted. The annual renewal of the Army Act is an expression of our traditional aversion to great armies and militarism. Conscription of wealth would not only very materially aid the prosecution of the war, it would also relieve the burden on the poor; whereas conscription of life has not been shown to be necessary for the prosecution of the war, its effects would not be felt with equal severity by the masses and the classes, and as a permanent institution it could be used, and would be used, to perpetuate class dominance, and the social and economic in-forthwith haled before the bench, and after a secret hearing heavily fined. Then there was the suppression of so harmless a thing as the Liverpool concert, organised on behalf of the funds of the Russian Political Prisoners and Exiles Relief Committee, and, later still, the raid on the lodgings of the committee's secretary, and on the offices of the Russian Seamen's Union. By means of the censorship the authorities endeavour to keep all knowledge of such proceedings from the public. British trade unionists might have sympathised with the Seamen's Union, and so, when arrangements were made to bring the facts to their notice, the police raided the home of Mrs. Bridges Adams, and confiscated copies of the statement which was to have been distributed to the delegates at the Joint Labour Congress. Publicity cannot now even be assured through the medium of the House of Commons, as the questions of members are censored. The attitude of mind of the Conscriptionists to all discussion and questioning was well illustrated by Lord Derby at the Guildhall, London, in July last, when he suggested that it would have a "salutary effect" to occasionally take a questioner from the floor of the House of Commons and have him shot in Palace Yard.

Not Parliamentary Government.

It is influences responsible for this growing tyranny to which conscription would give ascendancy and similar influences have been responsible for the present bill. The threats of miners to take action to resist the bill should it become law have been much deprecated by certain newspapers on the ground that to do so would be a refusal to acknowledge the authority of Parliamentary Government, which is the instrument of democracy. Now Parliamentary Government is too precious a thing to be played fast and loose with, and if the passing into law of the present Bill could be held to be the result of Parliamentary Government the attitude of the newspapers referred to would be quite correct. But what does Parliamentary Government imply? It implies that the Government shall have a mandate from the electorate for the legislation it brings forward, and that such legislation shall have the fullest discussion in Parliament and in the country. Now, in connection with the present Bill these conditions are lacking. Not only has the Government no mandate to introduce conscription (doubtless that was why Mr. Asquith said "general assent" would be necessary), but the Government itself came into existence, not as the result of popular election, but owing to circumstances of which the general public know nothing. The late Government gave up the ghost within a few days of the Prime Minister stating, in effect, that it would do no such thing. Thus the Bill itself has been brought forward in circumstances which, to say the least, are suspicious. The Derby report, although in possession of the Cabinet, was held back to within 24 hours of the introduction of the Bill, so that there was no time for public discussion of the figures. For this haste military necessity cannot be pleaded as there were available for calling up the whole of the single groups. In addition, discussion in the country is restricted. "Forward," an anti-conscriptionist paper is suppressed, and the "Herald," which is on the same side is hampered. In neither Manchester nor Glasgow can the anti-Conscriptionist forces hold meetings in the public halls, and the proprietors of private halls cancel the lettings at the last minute. In view of all these circumstances, the Bill, if it becomes an Act, will not be the production of Parliamentary Government in any real sense. Parliamentary Government means government by discussion, and in this case the anti-Conscriptionist forces have been, and are, labouring under artificial restrictions. The circumstances attaching to the birth and passage of the Bill are such as would weaken its moral authority as a legislative enactment. Such conditions are not those of Parliamentary Government, properly understood, but are a mockery of it. They are a travesty of democracy.

The Cooperative News. 22-1-16. 67/42 679.

WOMEN AND CONSCRIPTION.

Let Us Not Lose Our Soul.

Nought shall make us rue: If England to itself do rest but true.

THERE is no arguing whatever about compulsory soldiering when once you accept clearly the thought that for a man to be forced to commit what he believes to be murder is the destruction of his soul, and, therefore, a thing to be resisted to the uttermost.

Let us see to it that we stick firmly to this central point of view, and not be carried away by side issues.

For instance, there is the very plausible argument in favour of compulsory military service: "It would do our lads so much good physically. Look at Tom Brown, who used to slouch about at the street corners; see how manly and upright he has grown." Yes, the drill and regular habits and good food and outdoor life have certainly been the making of Tom Brown's outer and visible manhood. But better food in the homes, and better social conditions of work and play could achieve the same results, as the fine physique of our public-school boys can prove. Compulsory physical training is quite a different thing from compulsory military training.

Then there are the people who say: "The discipline is so good for our lads." But the queer flaw in that argument is that people don't admit that the discipline (carried to its logical conclusions, mind you) has been good for German lads! On the contrary, they tell you that we fight them because we want to destroy militarism. Surely, indeed, if this war has proved anything beyond dispute, it has proved that nothing destroys the finer soul of a nation more surely than military discipline. Many of those who drop bombs on sleeping babies, or torpedo harmless vessels, are no doubt quite admirable sons, husbands, and fathers when they are at home. But blind obedience and unreasoning discipline have choked their sense of right and wrong, and led them on from one outrage to another. The same moral perversion might easily happen to ourselves if we are not on our guard.

WOMEN'S CORNER.

Those who are keen advocates of iron discipline are apt to forget what happens when the lesson of conformity has been learned, and the prop is afterwards withdrawn from the weakened will. There is only too often a reaction of pitiable weakness, inability to stand alone, lack of initiative; sometimes even a reaction of utter moral collapse. And no wonder; for when the outer command has been taken for everything, and the inner command of conscience and healthy impulse is persistently stifled and set aside, the result is a character which fears, above all things, to stand alone. It is not the over-disciplined soldier that is to be trusted in a conquered city; we know too well how liable he is to a reaction of cruelty and lust. It is not the over-repressed child that you can trust to behave well when your back is turned; he will instinctively try to deceive you, if he thinks you will not find him out. Nor can you dare to leave such a child to do a thing for himself, or to stand alone without a prop.

To stand alone! Is not that the supreme test of moral courage? Is not daring to stand alone, facing ridicule or persecution, the great need in all kinds of public service? The town councillor, the co-operative committee-man, will be seldom called upon to show physical courage; but he may at any moment of his career have to be indifferent to unpopularity, slander, scoffing, and abuse. The habit of unreasoning obedience, whether in school or camp, is the worst possible preparation for a useful citizen's career. It is the drill-habit carried to its logical conclusions, which has left the German people like sheep in the iron hands of their rulers. We cannot too often repeat an old Greek saying: "THE WICKED RULE BECAUSE OF THE LACK OF COURAGE IN THE RULED." The sin of Germany in this war is not so much ambition as obedience.

Even if the moral issues of compulsory killing did not appeal to us, mere expediency should urge us to resist with all our might any attempt to coerce the moral courage of the nation. Every progressive movement knows how sorely we need more workers who will stick grimly to their principles through thick and thin. We should have more, many more, of such workers to-day but for the deadening influence of too many backward elementary schools which substitute discipline for self-development. We shall have fewer, far fewer heroic spirits to repair the broken damage of war if the moral spirit of the nation should be forcibly broken by compulsory military service.

Last of all, there will be some who will say to us: "But what if we cannot win this war without compulsion?"

Well, in the first place, it has not yet been satisfactorily shown that such is the case. Amid the clash of contradictions which you read in every newspaper, it is extremely difficult (perhaps it is meant to be difficult) for the average reader to get at anything like the truth.

Morning Post
26-1-16.

WOMEN'S LABOUR LEAGUE.

FEAR OF INDUSTRIAL COMPULSION.

The annual conference of the Women's Labour League was held in the Kingsley Hall, fifty-four delegates being in attendance. Miss MARION PHILLIPS, who presided, said that in 1914, when they met at Glasgow, they were passionate pacifists. They were that still, but they were pacifists with a difference. From the moment of the invasion of Belgium by the German Army, passionate pacifists as Labour women might be, there was little to do but to bury the dead hopes of neutrality and to throw their utmost strength into the task of preserving this country from the horrors of lawless militarist aggression, whether inflicted by the enemy from without or by wickedness and weakness from within. Their position was best defined in the resolution adopted by the extraordinary conference of Labour and Socialist women held at Berne in March, 1915. Yet their desire for peace was not the desire to see Germany victorious—the militarist Germany, with which, and not the Social Democrats, peace would have to be made. It could not be said that there were no militarist elements in our own country, but they were not the dominant and controlling interests in the British commonwealth. We were to have conscription and safeguards and limits. She thought there could be limits and safeguards if the Government chose to keep them.

MR. LLOYD GEORGE'S POLITICAL FUTURE.

The extent of conscription actually brought about by the Bill might be small, but conscription was there, and industrial compulsion might follow. But Mr. Asquith was weaker than formerly; so, luckily, was Mr. Lloyd George, whose visit to the Clyde had darkened his political future with a sinister cloud of falsehood and cowardice. (Cheers.) But who would come after Mr. Asquith, and how long would it be before military necessity was made the plea of a further pledge to Lord Northcliffe and a further betrayal of a pledge to the people? If the Labour Party Conference this week stood firm they could not see how the policy of conscription was going to prove of assistance in this war. The industrial position of women after the war was a subject of paramount importance, and the reinstatement in industry of more than two million men would mean a terrible dislocation of employment. Clearly the position of women would be one of the greatest delicacy and urgency. It would have to be considered how far the presence of female labour would mean the lowering of the whole standard of life for the working people. It was not a problem that could be safely left to middle-class women. It had to be solved by organised industrial women.

OPPOSITION TO THE MILITARY SERVICE BILL.

A resolution brought up by the executive declaring continued opposition to the Military Service Bill was moved by Miss PHILLIPS and seconded by Mrs. KNEESHAW (Handsworth). Mrs. PAUL (Central London) considered that the resolution needed more backbone, and, in order to strengthen it, suggested certain verbal additions. The amendment, which was seconded by Mrs. PARRY (Douglas Water), was referred to the executive, and eventually, after further discussion, the resolution in the following amended form was unanimously adopted: "This conference declares that the Women's Labour League will continue its opposition to the Military Service Bill, and in the event of its becoming law will agitate for its repeal. It reminds the people that Ministerial pledges are valueless if not expressed in the Bill, and further declares that the protection for the conscientious objector and the safeguards against industrial compulsion are illusory, and calls upon women workers to do what they can to prevent victimisation in individual cases by refusing to take the place of starred men who are unfairly discharged."

A DEMAND FOR PEACE.

A resolution demanding that the Government should take action calculated to bring the war to a conclusion and that it should state the terms of peace was moved by Mrs. TOWNLEY on behalf of the Bristol Branch, and Mrs. HIGGINS (Bristol), in seconding, said it would be far better to have race suicide than children born slaves. Women had it in their power to "frustrate the knavish tricks" of ambitious militarists. The resolution was carried.

Motions sent in by Rotherhithe and Bermondsey were also carried. These declared for an international force of men and women organised on the basis of their common welfare, and for the establishment of an International Arbitration Court. A few delegates abstained from voting.

Mrs. SIMM (Aberdeen) moved a resolution in connection with women's employment, demanding equal pay for equal work and a minimum wage. Mrs. WILLIAMS (Swansea) strongly complained of the prevailing conditions in South Wales, and other speakers found fault with what they described as an illegality—the employment of women on night shifts. The resolution was unanimously adopted. The conference further urged the executive to do all in its power to get women engaged on war work into the existing Trade Union for the particular trade to which they belong.

The Birmingham Dly Post
26-1-16

WOMEN'S OPPOSITION TO CONSCRIPTION.

LABOUR LEAGUE AND THE VALUE OF PLEDGES.

CALL FOR STATEMENT OF PEACE TERMS.

The annual conference of the National Women's Labour League, which is affiliated with the Labour Party, was held yesterday at Bristol. Miss Marion Phillips, D.Sc., London, presided.

Miss Phillips, in her presidential address, said they were pledged to strive their utmost to build up that international movement of the workers which was the best safeguard of international peace. The war had shown them the policy they had adopted of the opposition to the militiarisation of this or any other country was unassailably sound. It showed that a State pre-eminently militarist, organised primarily for efficiency in military offence and defence, was essentially a lawless State. The invasion of Belgium by the German army would be for ever the greatest warning to democracy of the perils of militarism. From that time, passionate pacifists as they might be, there was little to do but to bury the dead hopes of neutrality and, faced with the full horrors of the meaning of militarist government, throw their utmost strength into preserving their own country from the horrors of lawless militarist aggression, whether inflicted by the enemy from without or by the wickedness of their own hearts from within.

A Year of Disillusionment.

The League had accepted the position that there was no ground upon which they could adopt a policy of opposition to the war. The invasion of Belgium alone had left as opponents only those who believed in the doctrine of non-resistance. After a year and half of war they hated it the more bitterly because they had learnt more of what it meant. Their hatred of war pressed them forward to seek peace which should be lasting, and to mitigate wherever they had power to do so the inevitable distress and misery that war brought with it and left after it. Yet their desire for peace was not the desire to see Germany victorious, the militarist Germany they knew to-day, with which, and not the Social Democrats, peace would have to be made. They looked forward to the downfall of militarist government which was the stronghold of a system of privately-owned and controlled capital, the very key of the domination of money over lives. They could not say there were not militarist elements in their own country. But they were not the dominant and controlling interests in the British Commonwealth. The victory of Germany, the world's great example in militarist reaction, would not only push back the fight for further freedom, but would draw within narrower limits the bounds of present freedom throughout the world.

To many of them the year had been one of dismal disillusionment in showing how low was the standard of statesmanship and public life. The Labour movement did little to invigorate their hopes until within the last few months when the struggle over conscription grew more imminent. The Labour conference on conscription had awakened a new hope. The Labour movement had failed to find the leaders it wanted. And it had begun instead to lead itself. "That tremendous and deeply sincere majority," she asserted, "which voted against the Compulsion Bill was no intransigeant mob, nor was it in any sense against the successful conduct of the war. It was democracy defending democracy, it was freedom fighting militarism. Against that spirit militarism would not prevail. It is true the position appears since then to have been compromised. We are to have conscription and safeguards and limits. I think there can be limits and safeguards if a government chooses to keep them. I think that the extent of conscription actually brought about by this bill, so long as the Cabinet upholds Mr. Asquith's present view, may be small, but it is conscription, and may be industrial compulsion. But Mr. Asquith is weaker than he was. Who will come after Mr. Asquith, and how long will it be before [illegible] the idea of a further prevail. It is true the position appears since then to have been compromised. We are to have conscription and safeguards and limits. I think there can be limits and safeguards if a government chooses to keep them. I think that the extent of conscription actually brought about by this bill, so long as the Cabinet upholds Mr. Asquith's present view, may be small, but it is conscription, and may be industrial compulsion. But Mr. Asquith is weaker than he was. Who will come after Mr. Asquith, and how long will it be before military necessity is made the plea of a further pledge and a further betrayal of a pledge to the people?"

Industrial Conscription.

The Chairman, for the Executive, proposed that

> This conference declares that the league will continue its opposition to the Military Service Bill, and in the event of its becoming law will agitate for its repeal. It further declares that the protection for the conscientious objector is illusory, and that the safeguards against industrial conscription are incomplete, and calls upon women workers to do what they can to prevent victimisation in individual cases by refusing to take the place of "starred" men unfairly discharged.

The position of the conscientious objector under the bill, she said, was unsatisfactory. As the bill stood it remained with the tribunals to decide whether a person was a conscientious objector, and the decision would vary in different parts of the country. In a way, so far as preventing the conscientious objector being dragged into the army, the bill was as bad as it could be. There would be cases of great hardship and injustice under the bill. She asserted there was nothing in the bill to prevent industrial compulsion; the clauses put off the difficulties, but did not remove them. A man who wished to maintain trade union rights after the war might be kept out of employment by a combination of employers and forced into military service. They were trying to find some way as women workers to prevent industrial compulsion taking place.

Mrs. Kneeshaw (Birmingham) seconded the resolution.

During the adjournment for luncheon the Executive met and drafted the following revised anti-conscription resolution, which was unanimously adopted:—

> This conference declares that the League will continue its opposition to the Military Service Bill, and in the event of its becoming law will agitate for its repeal. It reminds the people that Ministerial pledges are valueless if not expressed in the bill, and further declares that the protection for the conscientious objector and the safeguards against industrial compulsion are illusory, and calls upon women workers to do what they can to prevent victimisation in individual cases by refusing to take the place of starred men unfairly discharged.

Statement of Peace Terms Wanted.

Mrs. Townleke (Bristol) moved a resolution reaffirming the League's hatred of war, and demanding of the Government action calculated to bring the war to a speedy conclusion.

> To this end it demands that the Government (1) State its terms of peace, on the attainment of which it is prepared to cease warfare; (2) welcome and system of mediation by neutral Powers made with a view to bringing the belligerent Powers together.

Mrs. Higgins (Bristol), who seconded, believed the war would prove the greatest setback to labour and social reform. It was the greatest piece of devil's work ever devised in the history of the world. She urged women to say, "Unless we can have freeborn babes we will not produce military babes." Did they ever think of the important part which women could play in frustrating their knavish tricks and military ambitions?

The resolution was carried.

Mrs. Salter (Bermondsey) moved a resolution declaring—"That war to-day and always results in further oppression of the workers alike in the victorious and in the defeated countries, and urging the people to use their political power to replace the past system of armed peace by an alliance between all the workers of Europe, believing that the only guarantee against war is an international force of men and women organised on their common welfare."

Mrs. W. Jarrett (Kensington) seconded the resolution, which was carried.

Mrs. Lowe (Bermondsey) moved that this conference declares that all disputes between nations should be referred to an international council or arbitration court, and that moral, social, and economic pressure should be brought to bear upon any country that resorts to arms, instead of referring its case to arbitration or conciliation.

The resolution was carried.

Northern Daily Telegraph

26-1-16.

WOMEN AND COMPULSION.

LABOUR OPPOSITION TO THE BILL.

The Women's Labour League held its tenth annual conference at Bristol yesterday, 54 delegates being present. Miss Marion Phillips, D.Sc., occupied the chair, and Mrs Townley, on behalf of the local branch, welcomed the members.

Miss Phillips, speaking on "Working Women and the Problems of the War," said that from the moment of the invasion of Belgium by the German Army, passionate pacifists as Labour women might be, there was little to do but to bury the dead hopes of neutrality and throw their utmost strength into preserving this country from the horrors of lawless militarist aggression, whether inflicted by the enemy from without or by the wickedness and weakness of our own hearts from within. The extent of conscription actually brought about by the Military Service Bill, so long as the Cabinet upheld Mr Asquith's present view, might be small, but conscription was there, and industrial compulsion might follow. Mr Asquith was weaker than formerly; so, luckily, was Mr Lloyd George. After the war the reinstatement in industry of more than two million men would mean a terrible dislocation of employment. Clearly the position of women would be one of the greatest delicacy and urgency. It was not a problem that could be safely left to middle-class women. It had to be solved by organised industrial women.

Mrs Bruce Glasier asked that the address should be regarded as the expression of personal opinions.

Miss Mary M'Arthur, on behalf of the fraternal delegates, urged that an equal wage for equal work was the only solution.

A resolution was unanimously adopted declaring the League's intention to agitate for repeal in the event of the Military Service Bill becoming law, affirming that the protection for the conscientious objector and the safeguards against industrial compulsion are illusory; and calling upon women workers "to do what they can to prevent victimisation in individual cases by refusing to take the place of 'starred' men who are unfairly discharged."

Mr Ben Turner, representing the Labour party, said there was still a danger that military conscription would mean industrial conscription.

A resolution which demanded that the Government should take action calculated to bring the war to a conclusion, and should state the terms of peace, was adopted, as were also motions declaring for an international force of men and women organised on the basis of common welfare, and for the establishment of an International Arbitration Court.

Mrs Simm (Aberdeen) moved a composite resolution of women's employment, demanding equal pay for equal work and a minimum wage, and the resolution was adopted unanimously.

Cotton Factory Times
28-1-1916.

679/46

679

CONSCRIPTION: LABOUR AND THE ISSUE.

Yesterday (Thursday) at Bristol the Labour Party was expected to declare its attitude to the Military Service Bill, which has passed through both Houses of Parliament, and now only awaits the Royal Assent. Labour is solidly against compulsion in the abstract, and by a large majority at the National Conference the other week marked its manifest objection to the principle and purport of the Bill. Strong feeling against conscription has been showing itself for some time past in various parts of the country, but the situation is a peculiarly difficult one, for everybody desires that the war should be won, and yet the cause of the Allies would be most gravely imperilled if in one solid phalanx, or even to any substantial extent, the trade unionists of the country employed the weapons at their command to resist compulsory service. The consequences of anything in the nature of a general strike need no stating. A few stoppages here and there in vital industries might create untold mischief. Without these direful consequences a majority of votes against the Bill would bring the three Labour representatives out of the Government. As Labour, whatever else it may be, is patriotic, it is inconceivable that it would do anything to delay the hour of victory, not to speak of placing victory altogether out of reach. Parliament, which has passed the Conscription Bill, could not wriggle out of the chief responsibility for whatever happened, but unfortunately Parliament is not the people, and it is the people, the workers themselves, who matter.

It will not indicate that the end of things has come if at Bristol the resolution against conscription carries with a bumping majority; it will be a warning to the rabid gang of conscriptionists that they have already gone the length of their tether. If the majority happen to be in favour of the Bill, that party need not exactly shake hands with themselves. If the workers have been caught napping once, they are conscious of it, and it would be positively dangerous, we think, if the conscriptionists misread the situation and applied themselves lightheartedly to making compulsion general. It is hopeless now to expect anything approaching unanimity at Bristol. At the same time a substantial majority against the Bill might have a most salutary effect, and help to resolve the whole tangle; it might induce the Government to be content with the passing of the Bill, without actually promulgating it. It would be quite enough to have the measure placed on the Statute Book, without placing the stigma of conscription on a hitherto free people. And why should the Act be put in effect? We have heard a lot lately about pledges of one sort or another. There was the famous pledge to the married at the expense of the single, which ought never to have been given. There was the pledge also that recourse would not be had to compulsion for the sake of a negligible minority. Who can pretend now that the single men have not offered themselves in sufficient numbers? Where, too, is the general consent upon which the scheme of compulsion was contingent? Pledges seemingly differ in quality; there are those to be kept and those to be broken. The hope has been unctuously expressed in high quarters that the Act when passed would become "a dead letter." What has been meant by that phrase? That there would be nobody left to force into military service, or that the remnant would be so small that the Act might remain dormant? For personal reasons an improper pledge has been already so faithfully kept as really to place the married, whom it was intended to protect, in a somewhat sinister light. Whatever Labour may say, if statesmen advanced freightage rates are out of all proportion to the reduced shipping and trade. The shippers will smile with satisfaction, no doubt, at the political economists who urge that it is simply the operation of the law of supply and demand, and will go on none the less determinedly to extract fancy prices for carrying the world's goods. The wheat exports from the United States to Europe in 1915, and allowed through by our Navy, were as great as in 1913, but the freightage rates in the former year were 15s. 6d. to 16s. per quarter, as compared with about 2s in 1913. After allowing for a 50 per cent. rise in extra costs, how can we justify this tremendous increase? Prices may ascend rather than descend in the near future. Mr. Runciman is unable to stop it. The increase in freights alone is equal to 1½d. on every 4lb. loaf. From the millions of loaves daily consumed riches beyond the dreams of avarice are being drawn daily. The increase in the rates between this country and the Argentine are even worse than those from the States. They have risen from 12s. per quarter to 150s. Wheat is being held back, and an attempt is being made to get 200s. per quarter. The sea carriage of coal has risen enormously, being twice as high now as the total costs of mine labour, interest on capital, profits, rail carriage, and everything else connected with the getting of coal. The increased cost of the carriage of cotton alone is nearly half the cost per lb. of cotton of manufacturing the same. The shippers are, of course, quite willing to pay back 50 per cent. excess profits to the Treasury. Meanwhile, the cost of living to the working classes is continually going up, with no prospect of shifting the burden on to other shoulders, and it is now clear that we are at the mercy of shipping and railway rings, who charge more for the carrying of goods than the cost of production itself.

pressed in high quarters that the Act when passed would become "a dead letter." What has been meant by that phrase? That there would be nobody left to force into military service, or that the remnant would be so small that the Act might remain dormant? For personal reasons an improper pledge has been already so faithfully kept as really to place the married, whom it was intended to protect, in a somewhat sinister light. Whatever Labour may say, if statesmen are wise they will recognise that the game they have been playing has gone quite far enough, consistently with both honour and safety, and by scrapping the Bill save the country from the unmerited disgrace of both military and industrial compulsion. Is it too much to hope that the Government is sensible enough and courageous enough thus at one stroke to destroy all dissension and unite the country as one man?

A CAUSE OF THE INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

The military struggle going on in so many parts of the world obscures to the great mass of people the onslaught that is being made upon the economic resources of the world by the commercial Huns who prefer riches to patriotism, and in the getting of them appear indifferent to the possible starvation of millions of people. We talk of a British blockade upon Germany, but if we remember the enormous increases in many articles of necessity in this country since the outbreak of war it would appear as if a blockade was in existence against us. And in effect that is exactly what is taking place. It has become the fashion, of course, for anyone with anything to sell to raise the price and blame the war for it. The greatest offenders are the shippers, who have continually increased the freightage rates since the war began. They have been assisted by the requirements of the Government for shipping for war purposes, and by the British Navy in keeping clear what Americans call "the sea lanes of the world." The Government has been powerless against the self-seekers who have carried on their nefarious campaign of plunder under the excuse of shortage of ships and labour and extra dangers of the sea. The returns of the world's commerce for 1915 do not show any great falling off in the transit of goods from one country to another. In any case, the

The Daily Telegraph
4-2-16.

HIS MAJESTY'S CIVIL SERVICE.

COMPULSION BILL.

A very interesting and rather animated debate took place in the House of Commons recently regarding the clause in the Military Service Bill empowering the heads of the Government Departments to issue exemption certificates to members of their staff, independently of the tribunals set up under the Derby scheme.

Mr. Dickinson, who moved an amendment to leave out the sub-section conferring this power, said it placed the Government Departments in an absolutely unique position. He hoped that even if this clause were inserted as it stood the Ministers who were responsible for the Government Departments would try and see that those Government Departments did not become, as he thought they were at the present moment, a place in which an unnecessarily large number of young men were detained. In some of the departments he came across, he should say that a good deal of the work, which was now done by young men, could be perfectly well done by young women, and if the departments were placed under the same difficulties which the commercial firms were now under they would long ago have replaced a good deal of their male labour by female labour. He did not see why the Government departments should not go through the same mill that everybody had got to go through, namely, of proving that men they asked to be exempted were really required, and of proving it before the local tribunal which would have to deal with these subjects. It would be an immense protection for the Government departments themselves. They would not have this responsibility—a very invidious responsibility—put upon them of settling the individual men to be exempted, and he believed it would give the public confidence in these departments, which on this particular subject they did not possess at the present moment.

GOVERNMENT'S REPLY.

Mr. Samuel, who followed, would not admit that Mr. Dickinson's indictment was well founded. The utmost efforts had been made by the Ministers and by the permanent heads to spare every possible man who could be allowed to go. From the Local Government Board, for instance, practically every man of military age had gone. At the General Post Office he had sent a letter informing the whole of the porters, postmen, sorters, and several other branches of the staff that every man who could be should be spared. Out of 80,000 men, married and single, of military age in the General Post Office there were accounted for under the classes already enlisted, attested under the Derby Scheme, and rejected on the ground of being medically unfit, no fewer than 75,000. Therefore, so far as that department of the State was concerned, the indictment was not well-founded.

So it was with other departments. He was quite certain that every Minister and the permanent heads of departments were fully alive to the importance of sparing members of the staff when it was possible; but the work of the Government departments must be carried on, and Ministers could not be responsible for the efficient conduct of the affairs of State if men who were really indispensable, and who had expert knowledge on particular topics and many years' experience of dealing with administrative matter, were to be whisked away, and untried persons, like the young women suggested, put in their places, with no knowledge of the many difficult and complicated matters with which they had to deal. Nor was it possible to refer these men to the local tribunals. On matters of this kind you must accept the word of the Minister.

Mr. Butcher, who supported the amendment, said you wanted very strong grounds in order to put Government employés in a specially favoured position which was not accorded to any other members of the community. The local tribunals were considered to be good enough for every class of his Majesty's subjects with the exception of Government employés. In the case of Government departments they were to be made judges in their own cause. Every department considered that certain persons were indispensable, just as every employer thought that certain men were indispensable to their business. He urged that the Government should trust the local tribunals.

VARIOUS CRITICISMS.

Sir J. D. Rees contended that this provision was necessary in the public interest. He instanced a [illegible] were indispensable, just as every employer thought that certain men were indispensable to their business. He urged that the Government should trust the local tribunals.

VARIOUS CRITICISMS.

Sir J. D. Rees contended that this exception was necessary in the public interest. He instanced a small Government department in which there were about fifty ladies and five men. The ladies did their work admirably. The duties performed by public servants were of the most technical character.

Mr. Morrell wanted to know on what ground, for instance, the head of the Education Office should have a right to claim exemption for his staff by different methods to those open to a judge of the High Court, who might have one or two clerks whom he considered it necessary in the public interest to keep with him. Why should not the officials of the London County Council have the special privileges which it was proposed to give to the Government departments? If the local tribunal was good enough for a member of Parliament, surely it was good enough for the Education Office.

Mr. Long did not know how they would get the work done if he were disposed to accept this amendment. The Civil Service of this country showed a better record in the percentage of men who had gone to the front or had attested than any other class taken by itself. There was to be a consultation between the heads of the departments and the War Office. If there was any difference of opinion between them it would be referred to the Cabinet, which would decide the point at issue. The clause was the result of very careful consideration between them and the War Office, and they approved of it absolutely in its present form.

Mr. Rawlinson suggested that it should be possible to substitute for young men of military age older men or even young women.

It was unfortunate for the critics of the clause that the defence of it should have fallen to the two Ministers whose departments—the Post Office and the Local Government Board—can show such a remarkable record in recruiting. But other departments are not so free from criticism. Nobody, as Mr. Samuel suggested, wants any official released who is really indispensable; neither should any work be suspended which is of importance to the nation. But the point is: there are still hundreds of young men engaged on simple routine work whose places could well be taken by women or older men. As the recent correspondence in The Daily Telegraph on the "Organisation of the Country's Resources" showed, there are thousands of educated men past military age who are only too anxious to help if an opening is made for them.

INCOME-TAX APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. J. W. Sowrey and Mr. E. Clark, Superintending Inspectors of Income-tax, have been appointed Deputy Chief Inspectors.

Mr. Sowrey is, we understand, engaged on the work of the Excess Profits Duty. He has three sons in the Army, two of whom are in the Flying Corps.

Many further changes in this department are anticipated in the near future. The income-tax alterations and the imposition of the excess profits duty will impose on the department a strain which it never had to face in its history. The surveyors are engaging temporary lady clerks at about 25s a week, but, instead of going to reliable sources of supply, the officers of the department are deliberately invited to nominate their lady relatives to take the place of men wherever they can be released for military service. The head of the department is seriously bidden to assure himself (by personal interview, if necessary!) that the lady proposed is a suitable person. If an official's wife or daughter was anxious to assist, it would require some hardihood on his part to report adversely as to their suitability, and would scarcely make for domestic harmony. Surely the recommendations of the Home Office Committee (which were at once acted on, at the end of November) that local authorities should set about giving facilities for women to qualify for such work should by now have produced a reservoir of qualified women. Even in war-time it is doubtful if this open form of Civil Service patronage could be defended.

Exeter Gazette.
16/3/16.

Employment

OF WOMEN LABOUR.

CREDITON TRIBUNAL CASES.

Crediton Rural Tribunal had another long sitting yesterday, when nearly 50 claims for exemption were dealt with. Mr. W. Carter-Pedler presided, the military representative being Sir W. Ferguson-Davie.

The Chairman, at the outset, said the Tribunals were being given fresh instructions well-nigh every day. The consequence was that their proceedings lacked that unanimity which they could desire. Sometimes it appeared as if the Tribunal took a more stringent action in some cases than in others. He asked the military representative if he had read in the papers what Lord Selborne said.

The military representative said that he had not.

Mr. R. Brown was about to read a statement made by Lord Selborne, when the military representative said they could only act on their instructions.

Mr. Brown: Lord Selborne, who said he was speaking with the authority of the Government——

The Military Representative: I cannot take any newspaper report.

Mr. Brown: The statement was made by Lord Selborne. I think I can ask you to consider this as a fair report.

The Military Representative: You cannot take any notice of any newspaper report in this way.

Mr. Brown said he wished to call the Tdibunal's attention to some remarks made by Lord Selborne.

The Military Representative replied he must object to a speech being made. It was especially mentioned in the instructions that there must be no speeches. The time of the Tribunal was fully occupied, and there was no time for speeches.

Canon Boles pointed out that the statement was merely the answer to a deputation. He had read it. It was not authoritative at all. Therefore, he did not think they should take up their time with newspaper reports.

The Chairman: I must rule you out of order, Mr. Brown.

Canon Boles said it appeared that Lord Selborne was simply trying to please the audience he had got before him.

The Chairman: We have no instructions before us.

Mr Brown said Lord Selborne stated it was necessary to keep up the farms. If any man said that growing corn was not necessary, he ought to be in a lunatic asylum. That was what Lord Selborne said.

The matter then dropped.

A farmer, of Chawleigh, applied for the exemption of his man, as, without him, he would be single-handed. He had lost three men, and his farm was such that, even now, he could hardly keep it in cultivation. It was impossible to get help, owing to the great mumbar of men employed in the large sawing contract at Exeter. Exemption allowed for six months.

A farmer and miller, of Newton St. Cyres, applied for the temporary exemption of his son, who is attested, on the grounds that he had sole charge of seven cows, a large number of pigs (70 at present), and assisted in the milking. Asked if he could help, applicant, with a smile, said he did what he could, but he was 70; in fact, it was his birthday that day. He pointed out he was a very large breeder of pigs, and contended he was doing as much to provide food as were the farmers. If it were not for people like him, they would have pork costing 3d or 4d a pound more. He had had as many as 183 pigs at a time. They were all porkers. The Chairman: Dairy work and pig feeding were attended to by women some years ago, and there is no reason why it should not be done by them now. It is a question whether it is not possible for you to get female labour to help you in this matter. The applicant replied that he had tried. It was difficult to get women in any capacity. If they wanted a washerwoman they could not get one. He had a daughter, but she was kept busy with the household work. The military representative contended there would be no hardship in this case if the man went. Exemption was granted for one month, the Chairman expressing the hope that applicant would be able to get woman labour.

WHAT THE CONSCRIPT'S WIFE SHOULD KNOW OF BUSINESS.

By CATHLEYNE ESENES.

NOW that the married men are marching off, to fight for their King and country, thousands of women in all parts of Great Britain find themselves thrown utterly upon their own resources, and each day brings its own problems, each hour its perplexities.

Unfortunately, few of the women who have to bear the family burden know even the rudiments of business procedure. Their dealings, in the past, have been chiefly with the "butcher and baker and candle-stick maker." The husband, in most cases, signed the lease or agreement for the house or flat, arranged for the removal of the furniture, and attended to paying the rent, rates, income-tax, and insurance. It will be useless to expect that he will be able to attend to domestic business during his infrequent visits home on short military leave. Besides, it would be selfish to make him shoulder this burden in addition to his army duties. Then, what if the husband should not come back at all? What if his name should be included in the "Roll of Honour"? That is a contingency that, painful as it be, must be considered.

Many women—no one realises just how many—will have nothing to live upon except their husbands' military pay. Some, however, will be more fortunately placed, and will have an income assured them from interest on securities or from the business that the husband may be able to arrange to have carried on "as usual" by some trustworthy agent during his enforced absence.

The conscript will, no doubt, attend to some matters before he goes away. More than likely he will sublet the expensive house or flat, and install his family in a home that can be maintained at a comparatively small cost. It may be necessary to make a special arrangement with the landlord in order to sublet the place, for many forms of agreement contain clauses to the effect that the property may not be sublet. At a time like the present, however, most landlords will prefer to have the place sublet rather than run the risk of not receiving the rent on account of the conscript's absence on military duty.

It will be a good idea if the conscript allows his wife to attend, under his guidance, to all the business connected with subletting the old home, renting and moving into the new residence, and selling such lares and penates as will be superfluous in the smaller quarters. In this way she will gain much practical experience in business methods before her husband leaves.

If the change has to be made without the conscript's assistance, the wife should obtain a properly written book on the relations between landlord and tenant. She ought to know exactly what her obligations will be as lessee, and what she has a right to expect from the lessor. The printed forms of agreement usually employed are worded almost entirely in favour of the landlord, and she should learn what to strike out and what to insert, in order to protect her own interests.

Then there is the matter of insurance. If she has a bank account, she can ask the advice of her bankers, and they will arrange the whole matter for her. She must, in any case, select a sound, reliable concern. Insurance against war risks should also be effected. If there is no clause in the lease or agreement exempting her from payment of rent in case the house becomes uninhabitable from any cause, she should insure against that contingency—it will not cost much, and may relieve her of great anxiety in the future. She should learn just what her liabilities are for accidents to servants in her employ, and should take out insurance to cover such loss. It is wise to insure for at least one inside and one outside worker. This will cover accidents to window-cleaners, gardeners, &c., as well as to maids and charwomen. In this connection, she must make it her invariable practice to ask specifically, in each instance, in the presence of a witness, from window-cleaners, decorators, &c., whether or not they are insured and take all liability for accidents, and should refuse to hire anyone who is not so insured.

The matter of educating the children must be decided upon before the husband goes to the battlefield. If they have been attending expensive institutions, it may be necessary to send them, instead, to schools that charge smaller fees, or none at all. This is a subject of grave importance, and the future of the children should be mapped out in advance, and decisions arrived at to cover every possible contingency.

The question should be discussed as to what the wife shall do in case it becomes necessary for her to appeal for help. Her husband should tell her to whom she should apply if she urgently requires financial assistance, what she is to offer for security, how much interest she is to pay, and what steps she is to take in case she finds repayment impossible and is in danger of losing the collateral she has given. She should be warned specifically regarding those from whom she is not to borrow. The Government has very wisely provided for helping soldiers' necessitous wives; but it is well to bear in mind, in this connection, that the less obligations requiring future repayment that are entered into by the wife or the husband, the better it will be for all concerned.

The Canadian [illegible]

Conscription for Women.

While men of goodwill in all countries are looking forward to the general abolition of conscription after the war, in Germany there is quite a warm agitation in favour of its extension to women. Last year a prize was offered by a Berlin charity for the best essay on compulsory service for women, and not less than 145 writers competed. Let us hasten to explain that the service contemplated is not military service, but the establishment for women of a system analogous with that to which men are subjected. It is proposed that all women should, preferably at the age of 17, be taken and compulsorily "trained." The "training" should be either in a profession or in household duties. As might be expected, the fundamental division between rich and poor is maintained in these projects. The rich are to "serve" in special institutions. Poor girls are to be put out into private households; their employers are to give them a trifle of pocket-money and make a contribution to the State. Some critics point out the difficulty of finding sufficient suitable households for the hosts of young girls not blessed with sufficient wealth to warrant the privilege of an institution. But none of them seems to note that there is some difference between conscription which puts a man into a regiment run by and for the State and conscription which makes a girl work without wage for the profit of private individuals. The one may be called by harsh names; the other cannot with accuracy be called anything but slavery. But there is a type of mind which sees positive merit in compulsion just because it is compulsion, and in the disregard of individual liberty and tastes just because it is disregard of individual liberty and tastes. That type of mind is the most sinister danger which menaces mankind.

679/51

WHY THEY WANT CONSCRIPTION.

The danger of the gradual militarisation of Britain is not more clearly shown than in th suppression of newspapers which are striving to maintain the British traditions of freedom of utterance and criticism. The raid upon the offices of the Glasgow "Forward," a weekly paper devoted to the interests of Labour, on Monday, January 3, was followed by a protest in the House of Commons on Tuesday. Mr. W. C. Anderson, Mr. Pringle, Mr. Outhwaite, Mr. Thomas, Mr. Alden, Mr. Snowden, and Mr. Dillon addressed questions to the Ministers concerned. It was asked whether the "Forward" was suppressed because it printed a true account of the Conference on the Clyde between Mr. Lloyd George and the munition workers, giving a very different impression from that of the official report. Mr. Lloyd George said that was not the reason, and, in view of his denial, there can be no possible objection to the publication of the account of that Conference. On the other hand, a true knowledge of affairs is always in the best interests of the country. Below is a reprint of the report from "Forward."

The best paid Munitions worker in Britain, Mr. Lloyd George (almost £100 per week), visited the Clyde last week-end in search of adventure.

He got it.

His meeting with the Clyde workers was to have taken place in the St. Andrew's Halls, on the Thursday night, but to everybody's great surprise, the newspapers on Thursday morning announced that the meeting was "off" until Saturday morning. The announcement excused itself by saying that the postponement from a night meeting, when men were not all working, to a forenoon meeting, when all the men should be working, was to suit the convenience of all concerned!

Not even Mr. Sexton Blake, the eminent detective, could unravel that!

THE CONFERENCE "OFF."

After all the arrangements had been made for the Thursday meeting, Messrs. Lorimer (Blacksmiths), Bunton (A.S.E.), and Sharp (Boilermakers), had been summoned by telegram to Newcastle to meet Mr. Lloyd George. Mr. Sharp did not go, but Messrs. Lorimer and Bunton went, and were informed by Mr. Lloyd George that he had changed his mind about the Thursday meeting, that he intended first to visit the workshops, and that the meeting would be postponed to the Saturday (Xmas) morning.

The Committee of Trades Representatives, responsible for the Thursday meeting, met on Thursday evening, and after two hours' discussion, decided by 29 votes to 7 not to have anything to do with the Saturday meeting, owing to the shortness of time and their inability to secure a thoroughly representative gathering.

This resolution was again put to the meeting, and by 34 votes to 3 re-affirmed. It was then resolved unanimously that before any future meeting was arranged for the Ministry of Munitions that an aggregate meeting of Shop Stewards and Trade Union Officials be held, for the purpose of discussing and formulating a policy to be pursued at any future meeting with Mr. Lloyd George. Immediately after these decisions had been arrived at, someone had telephoned the result to Mr. Lloyd George's party, who viewed the decision so seriously that they desired to discuss the matter with the delegates at once. In a few minutes the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, M.P., and three Government officials, appeared on the scene, and the whole business was re-opened. After a statement from Mr. Henderson, questions were asked and some were answered. It was then moved by Mr. Bunton (A.S.E.), and seconded by Bailie Whitehead (Brassfinishers), that the meeting rescind the previous resolutions agreed to, but by 20 votes to 13 the meeting refused to rescind their previous decisions, and, therefore, the Saturday meeting was declared off as an Official Representative Trade Union Meeting. The hour was now 11.45 p.m., and the delegates went home, but through the night letters were delivered at their homes and offices, signed by "Murray, of Elibank," asking them to meet at the Central Station Hotel, on Friday morning at 10 o'clock, and hear an appeal from Lord Murray as to reasons why they should reconsider their decision of the

On this phase of the whole strange business, the only comments necessary are of relief that such a large proportion of Union officials refused to be jockeyed about at the sweet will of the Ministry of Munitions—where so many showed dignity and refused to be overawed by the politicians, it may be even unfair to the others to single out Councillor George Kerr, of the Workers' Union, for specially honourable mention—and a comment of surprise that a Ministry of Munitions that openly boasts of the economies it is securing, should actually have cancelled an evening meeting that cost no expenses in workers' wages or in production, and substituted therefor a forenoon meeting, which, to the extent that it was attended by munition workers, diminished production, and cost the country 6s. per head in wages—this 6s. being the sum the Unions are to pay each member attending the meeting; the Unions are to be remembered by the Ministry of Munitions. In hard cash—uselessly spent hard cash—HERE GOES ONE THOUSAND POUNDS!

THE SATURDAY MEETING

Mr. Lloyd George says Ramsay MacDonald "is one of my greatest personal friends."

But does not speak on Munitions Act.

Thanks Socialist for Appealing for hearing for him.

On Saturday morning the St. Andrew's Hall was fairly well filled. An official account of the meeting has been issued by the Censor and published in the Press. The account of Mr. Lloyd George's speech summarised very fairly the points he made, though the language has been "touched up"—at any rate, some of his graceful periods (in the Press reports) did not reach reporters in the audience.

The comments which preface the official Press report are misleading, inasmuch as they give the impression that only a small minority of the audience was hostile to the Munitions Act. The report also is unfair, in so far as it cuts out Mr. Lloyd George's loudly-cheered expression of his friendship for Ramsay MacDonald, and his thanks to the Convener of the Parkhead Shop Stewards (Mr. Kirkwood) for rising and appealing for a hearing to him, when the interruptions threatened to overwhelm him altogether.

The Censor has passed an official report of the meeting, issued by the Press Association—probably with the idea of preventing the publication of news about munitions, guns, etc., going to the enemy as might have been the case, if the ordinary newspaper reports had been permitted. We have no desire to touch the military or "preparedness" side of the speech, but the purely political side must not go misrepresented. It is simply stupid to talk about a handful of people that only an insignificant minority, and not the vast overwhelming son) suffered a running fire of interruption. In our opinion, he would have done better to have explained the admirable part he played in getting Jas. Marshall, of Parkhead, released from jail, rather than to attempt, as he did, a rather general patriotic appeal. Here is the sort of thing he suffered:—

I am delighted to have the opportunity of appearing in this hall with the Minister of Munitions—(what about the hall for the workers?)—to lay before you the great issue of the present moment so far as the war is concerned. (Ay! and profits.) You are all aware of the fact that we are engaged in probably the greatest war—(at hame)—that ever the old country has been concerned with. . . The issue that was raised in August, 1914, when the neutrality—(Oh! Heavens, how long have we to suffer this?)—of a brave and independent people was trodden upon in the most shameful way. (That's enough.)

When we began the war—(we don't want to hear that. Get to the Munitions Act)—I am endeavouring to show you the country was not prepared, and the fact that we were not prepared—(loud interruption: Cut it short! Come away wi' Davy!) . . . Mr. Lloyd George—(loud hissing and booing)—will presently address you—(more booing and hissing and some cheering)—on the importance of the dilution of labour.

The scheme of dilution that Mr. Lloyd George will recommend to you did not come from any employer. It came from a Committee—(interruption)—upon which there were seven Trade Unionists. (Traitors: Give their names: Was John Hodge one o' them?).

SAFETY OF TRADE UNIONISM.

I am quite prepared to give you their names. I do not want to hold anything back. The first name I will give you is the Chairman of the A.S.E. (Booing and hissing.) My friends may jeer at his name, but he has been elected Chairman since this scheme of dilution came up. (Dirty.) Another member of the Committee was Mr. Kaylor—re-elected to the Executive. (Away with him.) Also Mr. Duncan, who, I believe, is still connected with the A.S.E. Another member was the Secretary of the Steam Engine Makers, and another one was Miss Macarthur. (Miss Macarthur's the best man o' the lot.) I am quite disposed to agree with my friend. She certainly knows how to deal with the women workers. (Soft soap.)

What is it they ask you to do? I will be done directly. (Hear, hear!) They only ask you to enable the skill of the worker to be utilised during this crisis in the best interests of the State. (Yes, in the interests of the Capitalists.)

We must have the workers necessary to equip the vast army. (What about the unemployed army after the war?) The whole position will be restored to you after the war. (Question: Don't think!) It appears to me if the position is so safeguarded that you have everything restored to you after the war—(Why don't you put it in the Bill?) It is already in the Bill. I am afraid some people do not read Acts of Parliament. They only read the criticisms, the false criticisms people make for their own advantage.

I want to say here in the most emphatic terms that the safeguarding of the Trade Union position is already in an Act of Parliament. And I want to tell you it was put there by

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD

(Great cheering.)

I hope you all believe in freedom of speech. (What about the action of the Glasgow Magistrates?) (You've made a blooner that time, Arthur!) (Great vociferation.) Now I am going to call upon Mr. Lloyd George, and I am quite sure, however much you may differ with him, you are prepared to give him that hearing to which he rightly is entitled and about a score of hats were waved in the area, but the meeting was violently hostile. Two verses of "The Red Flag" were sung before the Minister could utter a word. Owing to the incessant interruption and the numerous altercations going on throughout the hall, it was quite impossible to catch every word of Mr. George's speech.

My first duty, he said, is to express regret to you because I could not address the meeting on Thursday. (Leave that alone.) At this stage a delegate in the area stood upon a seat and endeavoured to speak. He only got the length of saying "Mr. Lloyd George" when apparently he was pulled down. There were loud cries of "Free Speech," and someone shouted: "This is a meeting of Trade Union officials, not police officials," evidently hinting at the surprisingly large force of police in the hall. "This is the only opportunity we have," shouted another, "they on the platform will never give us the opportunity." The Chairman appealed for quietness, and again gave the order of procedure. It was only proper, he said, that they should accept the ruling.

FOR EXPLOITERS?

Mr. Lloyd George tried to resume: I have to express my regret at the alteration of the arrangement—(What about the Conference at Bristol? and loud cries of apologise.) I have addressed many meetings in Scotland and have never seen Scotsmen deny the right of free speech. The vast majority are in favour of it. Amidst the general commotion Mr. Lloyd George was understood to say that he stood with the Socialists against the South African War. He continued: I thought a small nationality was being oppressed, and I did not care whether it was being oppressed by our own people or by a foreign land. . . . Let me put this to you, friends: Whilst we are comfortable at home on a Christmas Day—(interruption: No sentiment: we're here for business!)—there are hundreds of thousands of our fellow-countrymen, some of them our sons, some of them our brothers, in the trenches facing death. (You're here to talk about the dilution of labour.) It's on their behalf and at their written request that I come here to put before the workmen of Glasgow their appeal for help.

We need a very large number of heavy guns and projectiles, and I am going to put to you a business proposition. (For the exploiters.) Do you think these men in the trenches are exploiters? (Don't hedge.) (The shipowners are doing their bit.) Do let me state the facts. (We know them.) . . . What steps have we taken? We have started great National factories; State owned and State-controlled; every timber and nail in them belonging to the State. My friends, these are great Socialist factories. (Violent interruption.) Believe me, the whole of them owned by the State, erected by the State; no profit made by any Capitalist, because they don't belong to the Capitalist.

What is the issue? Does anyone deny that these factories we are building are State factories? (A voice: Yes.) If you deny that you would deny anything.

I will ask any man representing you in the House of Commons and surely there is someone you trust. (No! and laughter.) Not even Mr. Ramsay MacDonald? Yes. Not even Mr. Ramsay MacDonald? (Yes, Donald.) Mr. MacDonald is one of my greatest personal friends, and whether he is for the war or against the war not one single word will fall from my lips against Mr. MacDonald. You get Mr. Ramsay MacDonald (what about the hall for him?) He will tell you they are National factories.

M. Thomas, one of the most distinguished members of the Socialist Party, a

The best paid Munitions worker in Britain, Mr. Lloyd George (almost £100 per week), visited the Clyde last week-end in search of adventure.

He got it.

His meeting with the Clyde workers was to have taken place in the St. Andrew's Halls, on the Thursday night, but to everybody's great surprise, the newspapers on Thursday morning announced that the meeting was "off" until Saturday morning. The announcement excused itself by saying that the postponement from a night meeting, when men were not all working, to a forenoon meeting, when all the men should be working, was to suit the convenience of all concerned!

Not even Mr. Sexton Blake, the eminent detective, could unravel that!

THE CONFERENCE "OFF."

After all the arrangements had been made for the Thursday meeting, Messrs. Lorimer (Blacksmiths), Bunton (A.S.E.), and Sharp (Boilermakers), had been summoned by telegram to Newcastle to meet Mr. Lloyd George. Mr. Sharp did not go, but Messrs. Lorimer and Bunton went, and were informed by Mr. Lloyd George that he had changed his mind about the Thursday meeting, that he intended first to visit the workshops, and that the meeting would be postponed to the Saturday (Xmas) morning.

The Committee of Trades Representatives, responsible for the Thursday meeting, met on Thursday evening, and after two hours' discussion, decided by 29 votes to 7 not to have anything to do with the Saturday meeting, owing to the shortness of time and their inability to secure a thoroughly representative gathering.

This resolution was again put to the meeting, and by 34 votes to 3 re-affirmed. It was then resolved unanimously that before any future meeting was arranged for the Ministry of Munitions that an aggregate meeting of Shop Stewards and Trade Union Officials be held, for the purpose of discussing and formulating a policy to be pursued at any future meeting with Mr. Lloyd George. Immediately after these decisions had been arrived at, someone had telephoned the result to Mr. Lloyd George's party, who viewed the decision so seriously that they desired to discuss the matter with the delegates at once. In a few minutes the Right Hon. Arthur Henderson, M.P., and three Government officials, appeared on the scene, and the whole business was re-opened. After a statement from Mr. Henderson, questions were asked and some were answered. It was then moved by Mr. Bunton (A.S.E.), and seconded by Bailie Whitehead (Brassfinishers), that the meeting rescind the previous resolutions agreed to, but by 20 votes to 13 the meeting refused to rescind their previous decisions, and, therefore, the Saturday meeting was declared off as an Official Representative Trade Union Meeting. The hour was now 11-45 p.m., and the delegates went home, but through the night letters were delivered at their homes and offices, signed by "Murray, of Elibank," asking them to meet at the Central Station Hotel, on Friday morning at 10 o'clock, and hear an appeal from Lord Murray as to reasons why they should reconsider their decision of the previous evening.

THIRTY RESOLUTE UNIONS.

Less than half the delegates turned up at the Friday morning meeting, the absentees being chiefly men at work. It transpired that, despite the decision of the previous evening, the following were willing to go on with the Saturday meeting — Bunton (Engineers), Whitehead (Brassfinishers), Lorimer (Blacksmiths), and Gardiner (Painters).

The remaining Unions, nearly 30 in number, agreed to remain loyal to the decisions arrived at on the previous evening.

Saturday's meeting, then, was not representative of all the Clyde Unions. The other Unions have drafted a circular to their members explaining why they refused to take part in the Saturday meeting.

[illegible] ness, the only comments necessary are of relief that such a large proportion of Union officials refused to be jockeyed about at the sweet will of the Ministry of Munitions—where so many showed dignity and refused to be overawed by the politicians, it may be even unfair to the others to single out Councillor George Kerr, of the Workers' Union, for specially honourable mention—and a comment of surprise that a Ministry of Munitions that openly boasts of the economies it is securing, should actually have cancelled an evening meeting that cost no expenses in workers' wages or in production, and substituted therefor a forenoon meeting, which, to the extent that it was attended by munition workers, diminished production, and cost the country 6s. per head in wages—this 6s. being the sum the Unions are to pay each member attending the meeting; the Unions are to be remembered by the Ministry of Munitions. In hard cash—uselessly spent hard cash—HERE GOES ONE THOUSAND POUNDS!

THE SATURDAY MEETING.

Mr. Lloyd George says Ramsay MacDonald "is one of my greatest personal friends."

But does not speak on Munitions Act.

Thanks Socialist for Appealing for hearing for him.

On Saturday morning the St. Andrew's Hall was fairly well filled. An official account of the meeting has been issued by the Censor and published in the Press. The account of Mr. Lloyd George's speech summarised very fairly the points he made, though the language has been "touched up"—at any rate, some of his graceful periods (in the Press reports) did not reach reporters in the audience.

The comments which preface the official Press report are misleading, inasmuch as they give the impression that only a small minority of the audience was hostile to the Munitions Act. The report also is unfair, in so far as it cuts out Mr. Lloyd George's loudly-cheered expression of his friendship for Ramsay MacDonald, and his thanks to the Convener of the Parkhead Shop Stewards (Mr. Kirkwood) for rising and appealing for a hearing to him, when the interruptions threatened to overwhelm him altogether.

The Censor has passed an official report of the meeting, issued by the Press Association—probably with the idea of preventing the publication of news about munitions, guns, etc., going to the enemy as might have been the case, if the ordinary newspaper reports had been permitted. We have no desire to touch the military or "preparedness" side of the speech, but the purely political side must not go misrepresented. It is simply stupid to go about deluding people that only an insignificant minority, and not the vast overwhelming majority of the meetings, was angry, and the journalist, whoever he was, who drew up the report and omitted the political references to Ramsay MacDonald and the efforts of the Socialists to secure a hearing for Mr. George, is really not playing a patriotic part.

MR. HENDERSON'S DIFFICULTIES.

We are all for free speech, and free speech not only for ourselves, but for our opponents. We, therefore, associate ourselves wholeheartedly with the Socialist effort to secure Mr. George a hearing, and regret that a mean-spirited Press report should seek to convey the impression that it was the Socialists (called "Syndicalists") who sought to break up the meeting.

The meeting began with a storm of hissing and booing, and the Chairman (Mr. Hender- [illegible] In our opinion, he would have done better to have explained the admirable part he played in getting Jas. Marshall, of Parkhead, released from jail, rather than to attempt, as he did, a rather general patriotic appeal. Here is the sort of thing he suffered :—

I am delighted to have the opportunity of appearing in this hall with the Minister of Munitions—(what about the hall for the workers?)—to lay before you the great issue of the present moment so far as the war is concerned. (Ay! and profits.) You are all aware of the fact that we are engaged in probably the greatest war—(at hame)—that ever the old country has been concerned with. . . The issue that was raised in August, 1914, when the neutrality—(Oh! Heavens, how long have we to suffer this?)—of a brave and independent people was trodden upon in the most shameful way. (That's enough.)

When we began the war—(we don't want to hear that. Get to the Munitions Act)—I am endeavouring to show you the country was not prepared, and the fact that we were not prepared—(loud interruption : Cut it short! Come away wi' Davy!) . . . Mr. Lloyd George—(loud hissing and booing)—will presently address you—(more booing and hissing and some cheering)—on the importance of the dilution of labour.

The scheme of dilution that Mr. Lloyd George will recommend to you did not come from any employer. It came from a Committee—(interruption)—upon which there were seven Trade Unionists. (Traitors : Give their names : Was John Hodge one o' them?).

SAFETY OF TRADE UNIONISM.

I am quite prepared to give you their names. I do not want to hold anything back. The first name I will give you is the Chairman of the A.S.E. (Booing and hissing.) My friends may jeer at his name, but he has been elected Chairman since this scheme of dilution came up. (Dirty.) Another member of the Committee was Mr. Kaylor—re-elected to the Executive. (Away with him.) Also Mr. Duncan, who, I believe, is still connected with the A.S.E. Another member was the Secretary of the Steam Engine Makers, and another one was Miss Macarthur. (Miss Macarthur's the best man o' the lot.) I am quite disposed to agree with my friend. She certainly knows how to deal with the women workers. (Soft soap.)

What is it they ask you to do? I will be done directly. (Hear, hear!) They only ask you to enable the skill of the worker to be utilised during this crisis in the best interests of the State. (Yes, in the interests of the Capitalists.)

We must have the workers necessary to equip the vast army. (What about the unemployed army after the war?) The whole position will be restored to you after the war. (Question : Don't think!) It appears to me if the position is so safeguarded that you have everything restored to you after the war—(Why don't you put it in the Bill?) It is already in the Bill. I am afraid some people do not read Acts of Parliament. They only read the criticisms, the false criticisms people make for their own advantage.

I want to say here in the most emphatic terms that the safeguarding of the Trade Union position is already in an Act of Parliament. And I want to tell you it was put there by

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD.

(Great cheering.)

I hope you all believe in freedom of speech. (What about the action of the Glasgow Magistrates?) (You've made a bloomer that time, Arthur!) (Great commotion.). . . . Now I am going to call upon Mr. Lloyd George, and I am quite sure, however much you may differ with him, you are prepared to give him that hearing to which his responsible position entitles him. (He has got to apologise first.)

Mr. Lloyd George was sent to organise munitions, and no man has had a harder task. (Tripe : Nonsense.) If we win this war, as I believe we shall, much of the credit will be due to him. (Commotion.) After he has stated his case I am going to ask for questions, and if you do not waste too much time I think we will have sufficient time to answer all the questions that are sent up. I must ask that the questions be sent up in writing. (No, no : We're had again.) Surely in a crisis like this Mr. Lloyd George is entitled to see the questions he is going to answer. I hope you will take note, and get your questions ready, and Mr. Lloyd George will do his best to give satisfaction.

MR. GEORGE'S RECEPTION.

On rising to speak Mr. Lloyd George was received with loud and continued booing and hissing. There was some cheering, certainly, [illegible] area, but the meeting was violently hostile. Two verses of "The Red Flag" were sung before the Minister could utter a word. Owing to the incessant interruption and the numerous altercations going on throughout the hall, it was quite impossible to catch every word of Mr. George's speech.

My first duty, he said, is to express regret to you because I could not address the meeting on Thursday. (Leave that alone.) At this stage a delegate in the area stood upon a seat and endeavoured to speak. He only got the length of saying "Mr. Lloyd George" when apparently he was pulled down. There were loud cries of "Free Speech," and someone shouted : "This is a meeting of Trade Union officials, not police officials," evidently hinting at the surprisingly large force of police in the hall. "This is the only opportunity we have," shouted another, "they on the platform will never give us the opportunity." The Chairman appealed for quietness, and again gave the order of procedure. It was only proper, he said, that they should accept the ruling.

FOR EXPLOITERS?

Mr. Lloyd George tried to resume : I have to express my regret at the alteration of the arrangement—(What about the Conference at Bristol? and loud cries of apologise.) I have addressed many meetings in Scotland and have never seen Scotsmen deny the right of free speech. The vast majority are in favour of it. Amidst the general commotion Mr. Lloyd George was understood to say that he stood with the Socialists against the South African War. He continued : I thought a small nationality was being oppressed, and I did not care whether it was being oppressed by our own people or by a foreign land. . . . Let me put this to you, friends : Whilst we are comfortable at home on a Christmas Day—(interruption : No sentiment : we're here for business!)—there are hundreds of thousands of our fellow-countrymen, some of them our sons, some of them our brothers, in the trenches facing death. (You're here to talk about the dilution of labour.) It's on their behalf and at their written request that I come here to put before the workmen of Glasgow their appeal for help.

We need a very large number of heavy guns and projectiles, and I am going to put to you a business proposition. (For the exploiters.) Do you think these men in the trenches are exploiters? (Don't hedge.) (The shipowners are doing their bit.) Do let me state the facts. (We know them.) . . . What steps have we taken? We have started great National factories; State owned and State-controlled; every timber and nail in them belonging to the State. My friends, these are great Socialist factories. (Violent interruption.) Believe me, the whole of them owned by the State, erected by the State; no profit made by any Capitalist, because they don't belong to the Capitalist.

What is the issue? Does anyone deny that these factories we are building are State factories? (A voice : Yes.) If you deny that you would deny anything.

I will ask any man representing you in the House of Commons—and surely there is someone you trust. (No! and laughter.) Not even Mr. Ramsay MacDonald? Yes, Not even Mr. Ramsay MacDonald? (Yes, Donald.) Mr. MacDonald is one of my greatest personal friends, and whether he is for the war or against the war not one single word will fall from my lips against Mr. MacDonald. You get Mr. Ramsay MacDonald—(what about the hall for him?) He will tel you they are National factories.

. . . M. Thomas, one of the most distinguished members of the Socialist Party an as good a Socialist to-day as he ever was-(what about Jaurès?)—took the matter of shell in hand. He called to his assistance the Frenc women and brought them into the factorie With what result? The German invasion wa rolled back, and the Germans have no mor chance of conquering any more French territor than they have of conquering the kingdom heaven.

THE POSITION OF A MINISTER.

Is it too much to ask the British workma to help his comrades in the field? (No; wh about the Munitions Act?) France will nev forget it. Whatever scheme the French wor man puts forward in the future for better tre ment, he will have the ear, the willing ear millions of French men and women, who w remember the gallant and devoted service rendered to his country. (Cries of Hurry and commotion.)

679/52

WHY THEY WANT CONSCRIPTION.

(Mr. Kirkwood apparently had been appealed to for help, and he made an appeal to the meeting to hear the speaker. This was duly acknowledged by Mr. Lloyd George.)

Mr. Kirkwood, he said, did not restrain himself from telling me what he thought about the Munitions Act and about me, but, at any rate, he knows the value of free speech, and I am very thankful to him for his assistance in obtaining order.

. . . I have but one word more to say. I want to talk to you in all sincerity as a man brought up in a worker's home. I know as much about the life of the worker as any man here. The responsibility of a Minister of the Crown in a great war is not an enviable one. (The money's good, and laughter.) I can assure you it is no laughing matter.

. . . There will be unheard-of changes in every country in Europe; changes that go to the root of our social system. You Socialists watch them. It is a convulsion of nature; not merely a cyclone that sweeps away the ornamental plants of modern society and wrecks the flimsy trestle bridges of modern civilisation. It is more. It is an earthquake that upheaves the very rocks of European life.

And to go on chaffering about a regulation here and the suspension of a custom there under these conditions, why, it is just haggling with an earthquake. Workmen, may I make one appeal to you? (Interruption.) Lift up your eyes above the mist of suspicion and distrust. Rise to the height of the great opportunity now before you. If you do, you will emerge after this war is over into a future which has been the dream of many a great leader. (Cheers; loud hissing and booing.)

At the close of his address, Mr. Lloyd George proceeded to answer the written questions which had been handed up from the body of the hall. He promised to reply to them all if he possibly could, but he had an engagement at 12 o'clock, and if he failed to get through them the remaining answers would be published. At 11-45, however, Mr. John Muir, of the Clyde Workers' Committee, got up on the seat and demanded an opportunity of stating the case for the workers. This, he said, had been promised, and he was not going to wait any longer. Both Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Henderson appealed to him to resume his seat, but Mr. Muir was determined not to be put off till Mr. George had to leave. As it was impossible to hear either the Minister or Mr. Muir, the Chairman closed the proceedings, and the meeting broke up in disorder.

ROUND THE YARDS.

DILUTION OF LABOUR.

Dramatic Discussion at Parkhead.

Socialists Agreeable but want Control of Labour in the Workshops.

Mr. George did not go to Fairfield; the men at Weir's declined to listen to him, preferring to get on with the making of munitions.

The Shop Stewards at Parkhead Forge met in the offices to greet the Minister.

A force of police, about 100 strong, guarded the entrance, and seemed surprised that common working men should be permitted to pass into the great presence. The meeting was held in the large drawing office, and the workers were gathered discussing the business before them when Mr. Lloyd George was ushered into the room in the best stage manner. His companions included the works' manager, Lord Murray, and Right Hon. Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P. The entrance ceremony fell flat. The workers displayed little or no interest in the newcomers, but went on with their business.

After a minute or two the works' manager approached Mr. Kirkwood, the Convener of Shop Stewards, and stated that Mr. Lloyd George wished an introduction to him. Davie appeared to bear the new distinction that was thus being conferred on him with his usual modesty, for when the Minister, in the course of the usual formalities, inquired how he was, Davie replied, "No sae bad at a'." Then there were a few moments of general conversation, during which it was suggested that Kirkwood act as chairman, while Lord Murray volunteered the hint that he should introduce Mr. Lloyd George as "The Right Hon. Mr. David Lloyd George, Chief Minister of Munitions for the British Empire." Kirkwood agreed on condition that his acting as chairman did not in any way restrict him in putting questions or discussing what was said. But at the outset and before going on with the proceedings, he wished to state that the workers had been discussing a meeting that was to have been held that night, and there was a rumour to the effect that some action of the Clyde Workers' Committee had caused it to be postponed. He wished to know if Mr. Lloyd George knew anything of this report? Mr. George replied that the rumour was absolutely false. He had discovered at the last moment that he could devote two or three days to investigating the unrest on the Clyde. The meeting then proceeded.

A FRANK CHAIRMAN!

The Chairman said: "This is Mr. Lloyd George. He has come specially to speak to you, and no doubt you will give him a patient hearing. I can assure him that every word he says will be carefully weighed. We regard him with suspicion, because every Act with which his name is associated has the taint of slavery about it, and he would find that they, as Scotchmen, resented this, and that if he desired to get the best out of them he must treat them with justice and respect."

This reception seemed to flabbergast the Minister of Munitions. He spoke about our brothers in the trenches, of the number of new factories, of big guns to blow the Germans out of France and across the Rhine, and of the need for unskilled labour being used for work on which skilled labour is now employed.

When he finished, Kirkwood asked if he was prepared to give the workers a share in the management of the works. They, as Socialists, welcomed dilution of labour, which they regarded as the natural development in industrial conditions. They were not like the Luddites of another generation, who smashed the new machinery. But this scheme of dilution must be carried out under the control of the workers. They recognised that if they had not control cheap labour would be introduced, and unless their demand was granted they would fight the scheme to the death.

Mr. Lloyd George here interjected some remarks to the effect that the workers were not capable of managing workshops, to which Kirkwood hotly retorted: "These men, for whom I ask a say in the management, carry the confidence of the workers, and have confidence in themselves. They brought out the men of the Clyde in February in defiance of you, in defiance of the Government, in defiance of the Army, and in defiance of the Trade Union leaders. They not only led them out, but they led them back victorious. They let it be known that if their demands were not granted, masters might force them to the workshops, but could not make them work. Who ran the workshops now? Men drawn from the ranks of the working class. The only change would be responsibility to the workers, instead of to the present employers. If production was to be improved, the benefit must go to the workers.

Mr. Lloyd George stated that this was a revolutionary proposal, and the present was not a time for revolutions, when the country was engaged in a life-and-death struggle with a foreign foe.

"Ah," said Kirkwood, "you are thinking as a lawyer. It takes engineers to reason out an industrial situation like the present one. The settlement of it would affect engineers, not lawyers. This war has proved conclusively to the workers that one engineer is worth a hundred lawyers, even of your kind."

A number of questions on the Munitions Act were afterwards put by various members of the audience, one speaker pointing out that he was prevented by Lloyd George's Act from taking another job in which the wages would be increased by 8s. a week.

Kirkwood added that this Munitions Act bound the workers to Beardmore as effectively as if they had branded a capital B on their brows.

Mr. Lloyd George said that he was not responsible for the Munitions Act. It emanated from their leaders, men like Mr. Brownlie and Mr. Arthur Henderson, who was present.

Kirkwood turned dramatically towards Mr. Henderson, and declared, while waving his hand, "We repudiate this man. He is no leader of ours. Brownlie has been told the same to his face. And if you, Mr. Lloyd George, want to know the mind of the workers, don't go to these men. If you wish to do away with the discontent in the workshops, do away with the cause."

Mr. Lloyd George and his party then left the meeting.

TRADE UNIONISTS—Beware of the Plot Against You!

THE CONSCRIPTIONISTS ARE DETERMINED TO CRUSH THE WORKER.

SMASH THEIR PRETTY GAME BEFORE IT IS TOO LATE.

If humour has a place in a situation so serious, it was surely present in the painstaking efforts of the supporters of Compulsion to convince the Labour Conference and the country that they hated nothing so much as Compulsion! Nevertheless, they were determined to register their votes in favour of the hateful principle!

It is noticeable that the people behind the agitation are the people who always wanted Conscription because of the power it would bestow upon the ruling classes, and one Cabinet Minister whose popularity is rapidly declining, and who is doubtless moved by a mixture of personal ambition and a desire for revenge upon the workers he has not been able to hoodwink.

There is no doubt about the reasons of the Conscriptionists. They have stated them themselves. Here are some of their democratic opinions!

Lt.-Col. W. H. Maxwell, in the Outlook for September, 1915, said:

Trade Unionism—that shelter for slinking shirkers—is imperilling our existence, and by its action a rot of our national soul has set in. One remedy, and one alone, can eradicate this state of rot—martial law will cure it.

The Saturday Review of August 21, 1915, was equally blunt:

National Service is required as much for the effect it will have upon MINERS AND MUNITIONS as for the part it will play in the actual raising of armies.

The same sentiment found expression in the Spectator of August 28, 1915:

Not every man will be wanted as a soldier, but all will be "fetched" to do what is wanted of them, WHETHER IN WORKSHOPS, OR GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS, OR MINES, OR MERCHANT SHIPS.

The following appeared in the Daily News of January 29, 1915:

Arguing in favour of compulsory Cadet Corps, he (Lord Methuen) quotes the example of the South African Citizen Army, and he says: "Little did we anticipate that within three years this force should (sic) have SCOTCHED A STRIKE and quelled a rebellion."

On August 28 again spake the Saturday Review, saying unto us:

It (Conscription) is not only a question of raising a given number of recruits, but of getting accepted by all citizens, CIVILIAN WORKERS as well as soldiers, the principle of public obligation.

Major-General Sir Alfred E. Turner, who is presumably not suffering from excessive poverty, thus insulted the workers in the Saturday Review of August 7, 1915:

The strikers gained their ends, and with them an everlasting stain on their reputation, which not all the rain of heaven can wash out—the stain of showing themselves perfectly ready to betray their country for filthy lucre. Compulsory service might not produce loyalty, but it would produce a sense of duty and discipline that would prevent such disgraceful and damaging incidents

Col. Lee, M.P., wants to conscript life to save money. Cheap soldiers! According to the Times report, he said on August 18, 1915:

Conscription would save an immense amount of money. . . . . At present each British soldier costs three times as much as a German, and owing to the necessity of bribing men to enlist we were squandering money at a rate which could only lead us to bankruptcy. The remedy was not fewer soldiers, but less wasteful methods, and those were only possible if we adopted compulsory service.

The Spectator expressed the same sentiment four days before. This is what it said:

The compelled man would, of course, receive the same treatment as regards food, clothing, and so forth as the volunteer, BUT THE SEPARATION ALLOWANCE MUST BE MADE ON A LESS GENEROUS SCALE TO THOSE DEPENDENT ON HIM, and only given where genuine poverty existed. It must neither be automatic nor lavish, and A CONSIDERABLY LARGER PROPORTION OF THE ALLOWANCE SO MADE MUST BE DEDUCTED FROM THE COMPELLED SOLDIERS' PAY.

Col. Sir Augustus Fitzgerald, son of the Royal Duke of Cambridge, said on August 26, 1915:

COMPULSORY SERVICE WAS NECESSARY AT THIS TIME WHEN THE PEOPLE WERE GETTING OUT OF HAND.

We admire the frankness and honesty of these men. They fight openly, and we can meet them on definite and clearly defined ground. They are out to smash us, and we are out not to be smashed!

And now we will give just two quotations to warn the workers against accepting the "thin end of the wedge." If they give the Conscriptionists a start, it will be difficult to stop them! Lord Roberts said on page 13 of his "Fallacies and Facts":

When the people accept the principle of universal military training there will then be no difficulty in adjusting the details of the scheme.

And Lord Dudley, speaking on Compulsory Training in Australia, said:

He felt sure they would have to increase the length of training. . . . But they were right to go slow. . . . It was tactful and politic not to make the term of service too arduous AT FIRST, and to let it grow.—DAILY CHRONICLE, September 18, 1911.

The Labour Conference has given its first word to the Trade Union smashers. It will do well to stick to its word through thick and thin, and not be turned from it by any nonsense about the necessity of Conscription to win the war. At this stage it is perfectly obvious that if the war cannot be won without Conscription it cannot be won with it!

very rocks of European life.

And to go on chaffering about a regulation here and the suspension of a custom there under these conditions, why, it is just haggling with an earthquake. Workmen, may I make one appeal to you? (Interruption.) Lift up your eyes above the mist of suspicion and distrust. Rise to the height of the great opportunity now before you. If you do, you will emerge after this war is over into a future which has been the dream of many a great leader. (Cheers; loud hissing and booing.)

At the close of his address, Mr. Lloyd George proceeded to answer the written questions which had been handed up from the body of the hall. He promised to reply to them all if he possibly could, but he had an engagement at 12 o'clock, and if he failed to get through them the remaining answers would be published. At 11-45, however, Mr. John Muir, of the Clyde Workers' Committee, got up on the seat and demanded an opportunity of stating the case for the workers. This, he said, had been promised, and he was not going to wait any longer. Both Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Henderson appealed to him to resume his seat, but Mr. Muir was [illegible] the great presence. The meeting was held in the large drawing office, and the workers were gathered discussing the business before them when Mr. Lloyd George was ushered into the room in the best stage manner. His companions included the works' manager, Lord Murray, and Right Hon. Mr. Arthur Henderson, M.P. The entrance ceremony fell flat. The workers displayed little or no interest in the newcomers, but went on with their business.

After a minute or two the works' manager approached Mr. Kirkwood, the Convener of Shop Stewards, and stated that Mr. Lloyd George wished an introduction to him. Davie appeared to bear the new distinction that was thus being conferred on him with his usual modesty, for when the Minister, in the course of the usual formalities, inquired how he was, Davie replied, "No sae bad at a'." Then there were a few moments of general conversation, during which it was suggested that Kirkwood act as chairman, while Lord Murray volunteered the hint that he should introduce Mr. Lloyd George as "The Right Hon. Mr. David Lloyd George, Chief Minister of Munitions for the British Empire." Kirkwood agreed on condition that he was allowed to do so in his own way. Lord Murray then introduced Mr. Lloyd George in the usual way, and Kirkwood then said: "Comrades, I have to introduce to you the Minister of Munitions, who has come here to-day to explain his Munitions Act. I have to say that we have not been consulted in the matter of this Act, and we have not been consulted in the matter of the Minister coming here to-day. We have decided that we will receive him with justice and respect."

This reception seemed to flabbergast the Minister of Munitions. He spoke about our brothers in the trenches, of the number of new factories, of big guns to blow the Germans out of France and across the Rhine, and of the need for unskilled labour being used for work on which skilled labour is now employed.

When he finished, Kirkwood asked if he was prepared to give the workers a share in the management of the works. They, as Socialists, welcomed dilution of labour, which they regarded as the natural development in industrial conditions. They were not like the Luddites of another generation, who smashed the new machinery. But this scheme of dilution must be carried out under the control of the workers. They recognised that if they had not control cheap labour would be introduced, and unless their demand was granted they would fight the scheme to the death.

Mr. Lloyd George here interjected some remarks to the effect that the workers were not capable of managing workshops, to which Kirkwood hotly retorted: "These men, for whom I ask a say in the management, carry the con-

A number of questions on the Munitions Act were afterwards put by various members of the audience, one speaker pointing out that he was prevented by Lloyd George's Act from taking another job in which the wages would be increased by 8s. a week.

Kirkwood added that this Munitions Act bound the workers to Beardmore as effectively as if they had branded a capital B on their brows.

Mr. Lloyd George said that he was not responsible for the Munitions Act. It emanated from their leaders, men like Mr. Brownlie and Mr. Arthur Henderson, who was present.

Kirkwood turned dramatically towards Mr. Henderson, and declared, while waving his hand, "We repudiate this man. He is no leader of ours. Brownlie has been told the same to his face. And if you, Mr. Lloyd George, want to know the mind of the workers, don't go to these men. If you wish to do away with the discontent in the workshops, do away with the cause."

Mr. Lloyd George and his party then left the meeting.

TRADE UNIONISTS—Beware of the Plot Against You!

THE CONSCRIPTIONISTS ARE DETERMINED TO CRUSH THE WORKER.

SMASH THEIR PRETTY GAME BEFORE IT IS TOO LATE.

If humour has a place in a situation so serious, it was surely present in the painstaking efforts of the supporters of Compulsion to convince the Labour Conference and the country that they hated nothing so much as Compulsion! Nevertheless, they were determined to register their votes in favour of the hateful principle!

It is noticeable that the people behind the agitation are the people who always wanted Conscription because of the power it would bestow upon the ruling classes, and one Cabinet Minister whose popularity is rapidly declining, and who is doubtless moved by a mixture of personal ambition and a desire for revenge upon the workers he has not been able to hoodwink.

There is no doubt about the reasons of the Conscriptionists. They have stated them themselves. Here are some of their democratic opinions!

Lt.-Col. W. H. Maxwell, in the Outlook for September, 1915, said:

Trade Unionism—that shelter for slinking shirkers—is imperilling our existence, and by its action a rot of our national soul has set in. One remedy, and one alone, can eradicate this state of rot—martial law will cure it.

The Saturday Review of August 21, 1915, was equally blunt:

National Service is required as much for the effect it will have upon MINERS AND MUNITIONS as for the part it will play in the actual raising of armies.

The same sentiment found expression in the Spectator of August 28, 1915:

Not every man will be wanted as a soldier, but all will be "fetched" to do what is wanted of them, WHETHER IN WORKSHOPS, OR GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS, OR MINES, OR MERCHANT SHIPS.

The following appeared in the Daily News of January 29, 1915:

Arguing in favour of compulsory Cadet Corps, he (Lord Methuen) quotes the example of the South African Citizen Army, and he says: "Little did we anticipate that within three years this force should (sic) have SCOTCHED A STRIKE and quelled a rebellion."

On August 28 again spake the Saturday Review, saying unto us:

It (Conscription) is not only a question of raising a given number of recruits, but of getting accepted by all citizens, CIVILIAN WORKERS as well as soldiers, the principle of public obligation.

Major-General Sir Alfred E. Turner, who is presumably not suffering from excessive poverty, thus insulted the workers in the Saturday Review of August 7, 1915:

The strikers gained their ends, and with them an everlasting stain on their reputation, which not all the rain of heaven can wash out—the stain of showing themselves perfectly ready to betray their country for filthy lucre. Compulsory service might not produce loyalty, but it would produce a sense of duty and discipline that would prevent such disgraceful and damaging incidents

Col. Lee, M.P., wants to conscript life to save money. Cheap soldiers! According to the Times report, he said on August 18, 1915:

Conscription would save an immense amount of money. . . . . At present each British soldier costs three times as much as a German, and owing to the necessity of bribing men to enlist we were squandering money at a rate which could only lead us to bankruptcy. The remedy was not fewer soldiers, but less wasteful methods, and those were only possible if we adopted compulsory service.

The Spectator expressed the same sentiment four days before. This is what it said:

The compelled man would, of course, receive the same treatment as regards food, clothing, and so forth as the volunteer, BUT THE SEPARATION ALLOWANCE MUST BE MADE ON A LESS GENEROUS SCALE TO THOSE DEPENDENT ON HIM, and only given where genuine poverty existed. It must neither be automatic nor lavish, and A CONSIDERABLY LARGER PROPORTION OF THE ALLOWANCE SO MADE MUST BE DEDUCTED FROM THE COMPELLED SOLDIERS' PAY.

Col. Sir Augustus Fitzgeorge, son of the Royal Duke of Cambridge, said on August 26, 1915:

COMPULSORY SERVICE WAS NECESSARY AT THIS TIME WHEN THE PEOPLE WERE GETTING OUT OF HAND.

We admire the frankness and honesty of these men. They fight openly, and we can meet them on definite and clearly defined ground. They are out to smash us, and we are out not to be smashed!

And now we will give just two quotations to warn the workers against accepting the "thin end of the wedge." If they give the Conscriptionists a start, it will be difficult to stop them! Lord Roberts said on page 13 of his "Fallacies and Facts":

When the people accept the principle of universal military training there will then be no difficulty in adjusting the details of the scheme.

And Lord Dudley, speaking on Compulsory Training in Australia, said:

He felt sure they would have to increase the length of training. . . . But they were right to go slow. . . . It was tactful and politic not to make the term of service too arduous AT FIRST, and to let it grow.—DAILY CHRONICLE, September 18, 1911.

The Labour Conference has given its first word to the Trade Union smashers. It will do well to stick to its word through thick and thin, and not be turned from it by any nonsense about the necessity of Conscription to win the war. At this stage it is perfectly obvious that if the war cannot be won without Conscription it cannot be won with it!

MARRIED SHIRKERS NEXT.

"Conscription has come . . . . . The single shirkers are to be fetched. And nobody need doubt that the married shirkers will, in turn, be compelled to realise their duty . . . . . Fetching the single shirkers is the thin end of the wedge. . . . . . Let no fit man delude himself with the notion that he can wriggle out of his duty. Single men are wanted first because they are less expensive than married men. It is not a matter of sentiment. When married men are wanted they will be fetched if they do not volunteer."—The Regiment, January 8, 1916.

The Regiment is a foremost military paper, having a circulation exceeding the combined sales of all the other Service Journals.

Read the "LABOUR LEADER"

EVERY THURSDAY. ONE PENNY FROM ALL NEWSAGENTS.

Blackfriars Press Ltd., 7, Blackfriars Street, Manchester

IS IT NECESSARY?

But have we yet come anywhere near that point? We believe not. And the proof that this is the case is afforded by the action of the Government itself—nay, often by the very advocates of a National Service Law themselves. It is plain that neither the Government nor these gentlemen, are "putting everything in." The armies need (both for transport of troops and stores, and for hospital work) many more motor-cars, and all the petrol that is imported. But the Government is not "commandeering" the tens of thousands of private motor-cars of the wealthy that we see still consuming petrol in pleasure riding. Our soldiers could do with unlimited gunpowder, and it might be supposed that all ammunition factories were working day and night to supply military requirements only; but there has been no prohibition of the consumption of gunpowder in the shooting game, and the rich have no difficulty in obtaining for private use as many sporting cartridges as they choose to pay for. We are anxious about the nation's supply of gold, which has to be used to make payments abroad, yet there has been no summons to those who have gold ornaments to yield them up to the Mint. We are supposed to be short of men, but the rich have not been required by law to give up their footmen and gardeners, and gamekeepers and chauffeurs (though many wealthy households have voluntarily cut down their numbers); nor are the Government Offices yet substituting (except for a few of the humblest jobs) women for men. To-day, more than ever before, it is money that furnishes the sinews of war; and the experts are looking more to financial exhaustion to bring the war to a close than to any dramatic military achievements. Yet our Government is not (except in taxes, which do not amount to five per cent. of the total) seizing the wealth of the nation. Nor do those who are seeking to stampede the Cabinet into a National Service Law—practically all of them belonging to the propertied class—propose that these things should be done. It is only the lives of men that they ask the Government to commandeer. It is plain that we are not yet at the point of having to "put everything in" to escape national defeat; or we should see the propertied classes, in their patriotism, insisting on the Government taking all their motor-cars, prohibiting their shooting parties, taking away all their able-bodied servants, confiscating their gold ornaments, and appropriating for National Service all their wealth; at any rate, in excess say of £20,000 per family. Is it fair to take the men before taking the motor-cars; to commandeer people before commandeering property?

THE SHAM "EQUALITY" OF COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

Those who demand a "National Service Law" make much of what they call its "fairness" and the "equality," in that it makes the same requirement of every man, rich or poor; namely, that he should give a year or two of his life, and risk disablement or death, in defence of our common country. But is this either "fair" or "equal"?

We must notice, to begin with, that Compulsory Military Service is never, in any country whatsoever, exacted from all men. Only the physically fit are taken; though those who are short, or without good teeth or good eyesight, or have weak hearts, or are ruptured, or have varicose veins have also a duty to their country. There are always lots of other exemptions for men of particular professions, and what not. In no country have all the men of military age been actually compelled to serve in the Army or Navy. Without making any accusations, it must be said that, as a mere matter of statistics, it is not, on the whole, the wage-earning class that gets the benefit of these exemptions.

But even those who are forced to serve do not serve in anything like the same way or under the same conditions. The rich man's son or the University graduate usually becomes an officer; or (as in Germany) have a special class to himself as a "One-Year Volunteer"; and their allowances from home enable them to make their military service quite agreeable. The young manual worker goes into the ranks, and has to live on his rations and pay; and to put up with whatever conditions his officers think good enough for "the lower classes." It is not for nothing that a young man commits suicide; and it is significant that the rate of suicide among the soldiers in conscript armies is very high—far in excess of that among the men who are not forced to serve. Even if all ranks were treated alike, and if all classes had equal chances of promotion, the difference in the sacrifice exacted by Compulsory Military Service, as between men of different position and means, is necessarily enormous, and most unfair. To the young man of a wealthy family, the year or so that he is required to spend in the Army, instead of at Oxford or Cambridge University, is a mere change of amusement or sport, or at best, an alternative form of preparation for life, quite as useful as many a University career, and one which involves him in no pecuniary loss. To the young mechanic, who have already been in the workshop for four or five years, and is just getting to his full earning capacity, the year or so that he spends in barracks or camp means the loss of a year's earnings, and a dangerous interruption in his industrial career, to the rich have not been required by law to give up their footmen and gardeners, and gamekeepers and chauffeurs (though many wealthy households have voluntarily cut down their numbers); nor are the Government Offices yet substituting (except for a few of the humblest jobs) women for men. To-day, more than ever before, it is money that furnishes the sinews of war; and the experts are looking more to financial exhaustion to bring the war to a close than to any dramatic military achievements. Yet our Government is not (except in taxes, which do not amount to five per cent. of the total) seizing the wealth of the nation. Nor do those who are seeking to stampede the Cabinet into a National Service Law —practically all of them belonging to the propertied class—propose that these things should be done. It is only the lives of men that they ask the Government to commandeer. It is plain that we are not yet at the point of having to "put everything in" to escape national defeat; or we should see the propertied classes, in their patriotism, insisting on the Government taking all their motor-cars, prohibiting their shooting parties, taking away all their able-bodied servants, confiscating their gold ornaments, and appropriating for National Service all their wealth; at any rate, in excess say of £20,000 per family. Is it fair to take the men before taking the motor-cars; to commandeer people before commandeering property?

THE SHAM "EQUALITY" OF COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

Those who demand a "National Service Law" make much of what they call its "fairness" and the "equality," in that it makes the same requirement of every man, rich or poor; namely, that he should give a year or two of his life, and risk disablement or death, in defence of our common country. But is this either "fair" or "equal"?

We must notice, to begin with, that Compulsory Military Service is never, in any country whatsoever, exacted from all men. Only the physically fit are taken; though those who are short, or without good teeth or good eyesight, or have weak hearts, or are ruptured, or have varicose veins have also a duty to their country. There are always lots of other exemptions for men of particular professions, and what not. In no country have all the men of military age been actually compelled to serve in the Army or Navy. Without making any accusations, it must be said that, as a mere matter of statistics, it is not, on the whole, the wage-earning class that gets the benefit of these exemptions.

But even those who are forced to serve do not serve in anything like the same way or under the same conditions. The rich man's son or the University graduate usually becomes an officer; or (as in Germany) have a special class to himself as a "One-Year Volunteer"; and their allowances from home enable them to make their military service quite agreeable. The young manual worker goes into the ranks, and has to live on his rations and pay; and to put up with whatever conditions his officers think good enough for "the lower classes." It is not for nothing that a young man commits suicide; and it is significant that the rate of suicide among the soldiers in conscript armies is very high—far in excess of that among the men who are not forced to serve. Even if all ranks were treated alike, and if all classes had equal chances of promotion, the difference in the sacrifice exacted by Compulsory Military Service, as between men of different position and means, is necessarily enormous, and most unfair. To the young man of a wealthy family, the year or so that he is required to spend in the Army, instead of at Oxford or Cambridge University, is a mere change of amusement or sport, or at best, an alternative form of preparation for life, quite as useful as many a University career, and one which involves him in no pecuniary loss. To the young mechanic, who have already been in the workshop for four or five years, and is just getting to his full earning capacity, the year or so that he spends in barracks or camp means the loss of a year's earnings, and a dangerous interruption in his industrial career, to which (if he happens to leave the Army in a year of bad trade), he may never be able to succeed in returning.

Apart from all this, however, there is a fundamental fallacy in supposing that there is either "equality" or "fairness" in making an equal demand on men of very different means. We do not think it either "equal" or "fair" to compel every man to pay the same tax to the State, because an equal tax from men of unequal wealth means a great inequality of sacrifice. The State nowadays professes to take from everyone in proportion to his means. When the Government wants land or ships or the service of doctors or lawyers, it does not compel every person having land or ships, or every doctor or lawyer, to give an equal quantity of land or of ships, or an equal amount of doctoring or legal service—that would be deemed a most unfair inequality of sacrifice. What it does, for the sake of getting as much real equality as possible, is to buy or hire, at market prices, whatever land or ships, or doctors or lawyers, that it needs, and then to levy the cost on the whole nation, in such a way as (at any rate, this is the professed principle) to make everybody pay in proportion to his means. Why should not the Government continue this system of real equality for its soldiers and sailors, as well as for its doctors and lawyers—that is to say, get their services voluntarily at the market price, and levy the cost on the whole people, in proportion to their means?

Private and Confidential—All proofs MUST be returned to the Secretary, with criticisms and suggestions by Monday, 27th September.

What the Demand for Compulsory Military Service means to the Workers

Do you understand what the "National Service" means, which most of the militarists, perhaps half the members of the two Houses of Parliament, and probably a majority of the property-owners are now trying to impose on the nation by law?

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

What the so-called National Service Law demands is that the Government should be authorised to make men compulsorily into soldiers. The usual proposal is that all men between the ages of 18 and 40, whether married or unmarried, should be required, on receipt of a Government Order, to present themselves for medical examination, and that all those declared physically fit should be compulsorily enrolled in the Army (or Navy), put into uniform, made subject to military law. What used to be understood was that all the men thus compulsorily enlisted would serve alike in fighting battalions, either for home defence, or in the firing line abroad. The alleged necessity for this proposal and its assumed fairness to all, will be considered later on.

INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION.

But behind the proposal for Compulsory Military Service there lies at this moment a special peril for the British wage-earning class. It has been made quite clear by many of those who are pressing for the "National Service Law" that the object now is not wholly, or even primarily, to get more soldiers to send to the firing line. The most pressing need is for shells, not soldiers—for more munitions rather than more men at the front. Mr. Lloyd George says he must have at least 280,000 more workers in the munition factories; and the intention is to get these by using the machinery of Compulsory Military Service.

What is being proposed by many of those who are demanding the "National Service Law" is that the compulsory enlistment should be for service in whatever capacity the Government may require. Those men whom a superior officer thinks fit for any branch of munition work are to be arbitrarily selected; and sent, whether they like it or not, to any factory in any part of the country that may be short of hands. They will have to work there under military law; bound to implicit obedience to any orders given by any superior; required to accept whatever wages, to work for whatever hours, and to submit to whatever conditions may be imposed upon them. Any remonstrance or complaint will be a breach of discipline, punishable by Court Martial. Any refusal to work at whatever speed may be required will be a serious crime, punishable by imprisonment. These compulsorily enlisted men will not be allowed to throw up their job, or to leave the factory—they will just have to obey orders for as long as their superior officer chooses. They will, in fact, be soldiers put to factory work; and no Trade Unionism is allowed among soldiers. Moreover, they will, in most cases, be made to work not in the State arsenals or workshops, but in the factories belonging to private capitalists, and run for private profit (though if they are "controlled establishments" under the Munitions Act, there is a nominal "limitation" of the profit which the capitalist owners are to be allowed to make—a limitation to not more than all the profit they have hitherto been making in "boom" years, with 20 per cent. extra!) This is what is meant by Industrial Conscription. It is an attempt to make use of the present war to get Servile Labour.

HOW MILITARY SERVICE CAN BE USED FOR INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION.

This proposal is so dangerous that it compels us to take care that even simple Military Service is not made the instrument for Industrial Conscription. It would, for instance, be quite possible for the Government, if Parliament merely authorised Compulsory Military Service, to compel men under 40 to enter the munition factories, under whatever conditions the Government chose to impose. It would only be necessary for the Government officer to say, to any man whom the officer chose arbitrarily to select for Munitions Work, "either accept this service, or you will be sent straight to the trenches." The same power of "discipline" could be used to enforce, inside the Munitions Factory, any order whatsoever. "Either obey, or you will be reported to the War Office for instant transfer to the front." Those men who did not keep up what the employer thought a sufficient output could, at any moment, be dealt with in the same way. The Government may compulsorily enrolled in the Army (or Navy), put into uniform, made subject to military law. What used to be understood was that all the men thus compulsorily enlisted would serve alike in fighting battalions, either for home defence, or in the firing line abroad. The alleged necessity for this proposal and its assumed fairness to all, will be considered later on.

INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION.

But behind the proposal for Compulsory Military Service there lies at this moment a special peril for the British wage-earning class. It has been made quite clear by many of those who are pressing for the "National Service Law" that the object now is not wholly, or even primarily, to get more soldiers to send to the firing line. The most pressing need is for shells, not soldiers—for more munitions rather than more men at the front. Mr. Lloyd George says he must have at least 280,000 more workers in the munition factories; and the intention is to get these by using the machinery of Compulsory Military Service.

What is being proposed by many of those who are demanding the "National Service Law" is that the compulsory enlistment should be for service in whatever capacity the Government may require. Those men whom a superior officer thinks fit for any branch of munition work are to be arbitrarily selected; and sent, whether they like it or not, to any factory in any part of the country that may be short of hands. They will have to work there under military law; bound to implicit obedience to any orders given by any superior; required to accept whatever wages, to work for whatever hours, and to submit to whatever conditions may be imposed upon them. Any remonstrance or complaint will be a breach of discipline, punishable by Court Martial. Any refusal to work at whatever speed may be required will be a serious crime, punishable by imprisonment. These compulsorily enlisted men will not be allowed to throw up their job, or to leave the factory—they will just have to obey orders for as long as their superior officer chooses. They will, in fact, be soldiers put to factory work; and no Trade Unionism is allowed among soldiers. Moreover, they will, in most cases, be made to work not in the State arsenals or workshops, but in the factories belonging to private capitalists, and run for private profit (though if they are "controlled establishments" under the Munitions Act, there is a nominal "limitation" of the profit which the capitalist owners are to be allowed to make—a limitation to not more than all the profit they have hitherto been making in "boom" years, with 20 per cent. extra!) This is what is meant by Industrial Conscription. It is an attempt to make use of the present war to get Servile Labour.

HOW MILITARY SERVICE CAN BE USED FOR INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION.

This proposal is so dangerous that it compels us to take care that even simple Military Service is not made the instrument for Industrial Conscription. It would, for instance, be quite possible for the Government, if Parliament merely authorised Compulsory Military Service, to compel men under 40 to enter the munition factories, under whatever conditions the Government chose to impose. It would only be necessary for the Government officer to say, to any man whom the officer chose arbitrarily to select for Munitions Work, "either accept this service, or you will be sent straight to the trenches." The same power of "discipline" could be used to enforce, inside the Munitions Factory, any order whatsoever. "Either obey, or you will be reported to the War Office for instant transfer to the front." Those men who did not keep up what the employer thought a sufficient output could, at any moment, be dealt with in the same way. The Government may possibly make some pretence at exempting from Compulsory Military Service the strongly organised coalminers and railway men, on the pretext that their present service is indispensable to the successful conduct of the War (which is no more true of them than of millions of other workers). But exactly the same power of "discipline" could be used to the coalminer or railway worker. If he is not "docile," he will be told by the manager or foreman that he will be dismissed; with the hint that the recruiting sergeant will be waiting for him outside the door, to take him instantly into military custody.

Now that the desire and intention have been avowed to use Compulsory Military Service for the purpose of Industrial Conscription, and getting Servile Labour, the workers must see to it very carefully that there shall be no such possibility.

MUST WE DECLARE AGAINST COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE?

Although there are some men who have a conscientious objection to military service of any kind—and these men will go to prison rather than submit to it—not many of us would say that under no circumstances would Compulsory Military Service be justified. There might come a time when, for the maintenance of the great British Commonwealth of free peoples against a foreign foe, or in defence of our own country against aggression—all other means having been exhausted—we should have to "put everything in," sacrificing all our prejudices and prepossessions—nay, life itself as well as property in resistance to the national enemies.

WHY CONSCRIPTION IS NOW ASKED FOR.

We can now understand why it is that it is always the propertied class that is mostly in favour of Compulsory Military Service. It has been frequently avowed that one of the motives of many Conscriptionists is to get a cheap Army. It has frequently been pointed out that the British Government paid its soldiers a "shilling a day," or even more; and liberal rations, with allowances for wives, and pensions for widows and orphans, and provision for disablement, on what was deemed an "extravagant" scale. The other European Governments were able (because of Compulsion) to get their soldiers for something like a halfpenny a day, and much less costly rations, allowances and pensions. This is not really any saving to the Continental countries. The same needs have to be met, in one country as in another, but it is not the same people who pay for them. The conscript soldiers and their families are so miserably provided for in France, Germany, Italy, etc., that a very heavy burden is cast on their relations, in order to provide for the soldier's own requirements whilst on service, and for his wife and children, either whilst he is serving, or after he has been wounded or killed. But, seeing that the cost could in this way be thrown on the wage-earning class, to provide out of the taxes for the soldier and his family, even as well as the British Government did, was regarded as an unnecessary burden on the wealthy taxpayers. Why should not men be compelled to serve in the Army for something like a halfpenny a day, instead of having to be induced to serve at a shilling a day or more? This was avowedly one of the reasons why Compulsory Military Service was asked for.*

* It is interesting to note that, although the British Government pays, every year an enormous sum to the lawyers who serve it, no one has ever suggested that they should be compelled to serve in the legal offices and so got at a much cheaper rate.

When the present war broke out, the British Government was forced by the Labour Party, after a prolonged and even embittered resistance by both Ministers and Civil servants, to concede—though still not enough—much better terms than have ever before been given in the way of Separation Allowances and Pensions for "unmarried wives," mothers and other dependents, as well as for disabled men. All this increased the attraction of Compulsion to those who wanted a Cheap Army; and great have been the complaints of the "extravagance" of the Voluntary System. The intention was still to cut down the cost as soon as Compulsion could be secured. Suddenly, only a few weeks ago, it seems to have occurred to the Conscriptionists that this was not the way to make Compulsion acceptable; and they changed their tone. One and all they began to disavow any desire to reduce the soldier's pay and allowances, even if he were legally compelled to serve on whatever conditions the Government might prescribe. Now the Conscriptionists disavow any intention to reduce the cost of the Army. What they now say they are concerned about is only to get enough men. But can we have any confidence that, when men are compelled to serve, the rates of pay and allowances will not be reduced to the level of those of the other conscript armies of Europe?

IS CONSCRIPTION REQUIRED?

It is clear—indeed, it is scarcely denied by any candid person—that Compulsory Military Service imposes a very heavy burden on the wage-earning class. Yet it might be necessary for the nation to resort to Compulsion, if there was no other way of preventing national disaster.

But is there any reason to suppose that soldiers and sailors cannot be obtained, even in the present unparalleled war, in numbers equal to all the requirements, without resorting to compulsion? Among the military experts themselves, there is a division of opinion as to whether the system of Voluntary Recruiting could not be made to yield all the soldiers and sailors that the War Office would like to enrol, and could possibly equip, and whether compulsion—introduced in this sudden way—would really produce any larger total armies. The number enlisted week by week is still enormous, and still more than there is equipment for. And Voluntary Recruiting is at present being deliberately prevented from yielding as many men as it could be made to do. The influence of most of those who want to force Compulsory Military Service upon the nation, is being used to "crab" voluntary recruiting. Some of the most widely read newspapers obviously do all they can to discharge it. Some, at least, of the officials concerned in its organisation work it so clumsily, and with so much "red tape," as to lead to the suspicion that their heart is not in its success. Whole sections of employers (such as the Railway Companies and the farmers), honestly believing that no more men can be spared, put every possible obstacle in the way of their enlisting. Other employers do not want their profits to suffer by losing more men. No protection is given to a soldier's wife or mother against arbitrary ejectment from her cottage, even if she continues to pay the rent. No definite promise has yet been given by the Government that it will see to it that, when peace comes, every man who has served shall be found a situation, at not less than the Standard Rate of Wages; or, in cases in which this cannot be done, shall be maintained until such a situation can be found for him. Yet it is the bounden duty of the Government to give this pledge and to fulfil it. It is now prevented from giving this pledge by those who want to force Compulsion upon the whether compulsion introduced in this sudden way would really produce any larger total armies. The number enlisted week by week is still enormous, and still more than there is equipment for. And Voluntary Recruiting is at present being deliberately prevented from yielding as many men as it could be made to do. The influence of most of those who want to force Compulsory Military Service upon the nation, is being used to "crab" voluntary recruiting. Some of the most widely read newspapers obviously do all they can to discharge it. Some, at least, of the officials concerned in its organisation work it so clumsily, and with so much "red tape," as to lead to the suspicion that their heart is not in its success. Whole sections of employers (such as the Railway Companies and the farmers), honestly believing that no more men can be spared, put every possible obstacle in the way of their enlisting. Other employers do not want their profits to suffer by losing more men. No protection is given to a soldier's wife or mother against arbitrary ejectment from her cottage, even if she continues to pay the rent. No definite promise has yet been given by the Government that it will see to it that, when peace comes, every man who has served shall be found a situation, at not less than the Standard Rate of Wages; or, in cases in which this cannot be done, shall be maintained until such a situation can be found for him. Yet it is the bounden duty of the Government to give this pledge and to fulfil it. It is now prevented from giving this pledge by those who want to force Compulsion upon the nation.

It is the opinion of many of those who know the circumstances that an enormous number more recruits could be obtained—probably twice as many each week as the Government is now getting—if the Government:

(i) Definitely promised to every man who had served, to secure him, when Peace comes, either a situation at not less than the Standard Rate of Wages, or Maintenance until such a situation could be found for him;

(ii) Protected the wife or mother of every man serving against ejectment so long as the rent was paid;

(iii) Insisted that all employers should stop preventing their men from enlisting;

(iv) Induced the cessation of mischievous discouragement of recruiting by influential newspapers;

(v) Explained that it was in a position now to equip all the men, put rifles into their hands as soon as they needed them, and place them in the field immediately they were trained; and

(vi) Made a frank and serious appeal to the nation for just as many soldiers as the projected military operations require.

None of these things have been done. The possibilities of Voluntary Recruiting are therefore not exhausted. There is, accordingly, no justification for the dangerous experiment of Compulsion.

WHY MR. LLOYD GEORGE WANTS COMPULSION.

The fact is the real need of the Government at this moment is not for more soldiers—the Voluntary Recruiting is still yielding, week by week, as many men as can be equipped and armed. More can be got when required to supply the wastage, merely by using the appropriate means (as explained above). The real reason why Compulsion is asked for at this moment is because the Munitions Act has not been a success. Although a great increase in the output has been obtained, the shells and rifles and cartridges and machine guns and cannon, together with the uniforms, the boots, and the various accoutrements of the soldier, are still not being turned out in sufficient quantities to supply, not only our own Army, but also those of all our Allies. Mr. Lloyd George declares that he must have 80,000 additional mechanics and 200,000 additional unskilled labourers. And men and women are slow to take service in the controlled establishments. Hence, it is proposed to rush through a measure for Compulsory Military Service; forcibly to enrol some hundreds of thousands of men between 18 and 40; and then draft off the 280,000 of them whom the Government officers select to Compulsory Service in the Capitalists' Munition Works, which are still being run for private profit (nominally limited, as already explained, to all that the capitalist got before the war, with the addition of 20 per cent.).

679/56

HOW MR. LLOYD GEORGE HAS PREVENTED THE INCREASE OF MUNITION WORKERS.

Now, the reason why men are slow in taking service in "Controlled Establishments" is plain. They don't like the penal conditions. They don't like being brought up before the Munitions Court, and punished as criminals for "losing time" (at their own expense). They don't like being compelled to continue in one establishment, however badly they may be treated; and not being allowed to go and work elsewhere on pain of what is really a heavy fine. If the Minister of Munitions wants to attract workmen to Munition Works, why does he put them under penal conditions?

But there is another reason why Mr. Lloyd George is failing to get as many operatives as he wants. There are various grievances as to the rates of wages. In some of the "Controlled Establishments" the pay of the unskilled labourers, and especially of the women, is quite inadequate. Mr. Lloyd George, speaking at the Trade Union Congress, accepted full responsibility for all the rates of wages, which (as he expressly said) were fixed by the Government. What does he think of rates of 4d., 3d., and even 2d. per hour to adult women workers employed by time?

HOW TO GET MORE WORKERS TO THE MUNITION FACTORIES.

We may frankly admit the national urgency of putting more workers to make munitions. Can they be obtained without Industrial Conscription? We believe that they can be got in sufficient numbers, if the appropriate steps are taken. But they must be attracted there by sufficient inducements. There is no profit in Forced Labour.

We may note that there are still many tens of thousands of mechanics of one sort or another to be drawn in. There are probably over 50,000 men still employed in connection with private motor-cars, either as drivers or as repairers at the thousands of garages. Nearly all of these have mechanical skill. If the Government were to stop all use of motor-cars by private persons, unless driven by the owner himself; and at the same time offer the discharged drivers and repairers continuous employment in munition works at proper earnings most of these men could be obtained.

There is even less difficulty about the supply of unskilled labour, male or female. There are still many hundreds of thousands of men—including men unfit for military service, but competent for factory work—in retail shops, on the tramways, and elsewhere who could be attracted to munition work. If, for instance, every tramway conductor in the kingdom were definitely guaranteed replacement in his situation when the War was over; and offered, meanwhile, £2 per week at munition-making, an enormous proportion of the fifty thousand such men would accept the offer; and their places could be temporarily filled by women.

No serious attempt has yet been generally made—though quite successful at a few places—to put women to all the work of which they prove themselves capable. Literally hundreds of thousands of women could be drawn to the Munition Works, if proper conditions of services were guaranteed; a minimum wage of not less than £1 per week, and the chance of going on to the men's piece-work rates. But the capitalist owners of the "Controlled Establishments" will neither take the trouble to arrange for proper conditions for women, nor offer them anything like such a wage. And though Mr. Lloyd George tells us that the Government fixes all the rates of wages in these controlled establishments he has not yet required any decent offer to be generally made to the women workers of the country.

Hence there is no case for Compulsion. If sufficient workers have not yet been obtained, it is because the Government still allows mechanics to be diverted for the pleasure of the wealthy; does not make the necessary arrangements to draw in such classes as tramway conductors; and does not offer conditions sufficiently attractive even to the hundreds of thousands of low-paid women.

To utilise these new classes of workers would, of course, involve trouble and demand organising ability—yet only a trifle in comparison with what Forced Labour would require!

WHAT IS REALLY NATIONAL SERVICE?

Thus the objection of the workers is not to Compulsory National Service in any real sense. The wage-earning class, indeed, always finds itself under compulsion to render service; and it would see nothing but justice in any such legal compulsion as woud impose this obligation on the idlers. It is true that National Service, of this genuine kind, is at present being loyally given by the great majority of the adult population, but it is being avoided and escaped by "the shirkers." The daily work of man or woman to earn an honest living, whether in digging coal or tilling the soil, in manufacturing or distributing commodities, in the various forms of transport and communication, in rearing children and maintaining the home, in teaching the young and tending the helpless, in inventing and organising and directing such useful services, in science and art and literature—aye, also in preventing and resisting every kind of crime and forceful aggression, national or international—all this is real National Service, which is due personally in one or other form from every one of us so long as health and strength lasts, according to and up to the limit of our several capacities.

WHO ARE "THE SHIRKERS?"

The National Service is at present being avoided and escaped, not only by the wastrels and the criminals, who are comparatively few in number, but also by the great mass of those who—because, as they put it, they have "property"—live idly on the incomes which (in the form of rent, interest, or dividends) the law allows them to extract from the labour of others. Not all "the rich" are idle, by any means. Many of them—in this time of national peril a much larger proportion than usual—do work hard (though they are not forced to do so), and render admirable National Service in one way or another. These may be said "to earn their keep." Many more do not spend all their "unearned" incomes on themselves or their families, but devote some fragments to charities or to new investments of national utility. These portions of the "unearned" incomes may be admitted to be usefully applied. But the greater part of these incomes are consumed in the mere living of the rich without work. And a great number of rich people, men as well as women, do no work of any kind. They render no National Service whatever.

WILL THE SHIRKERS BE MADE TO WORK?

Is it proposed to compel these people to work for their living in the only effective way, namely, by depriving them of their present artificial power of levying tribute on the labour of others—this is, by the Government taking in taxation for the purposes of the nation (with humane allowances for the aged and the helpless), all "unearned" incomes; or, at any rate, raising the Super-tax to Nineteen Shillings in the Pound on all such income in excess of, say, a thousand pounds a year? Is this the "Law of National Service" which it is sought to impose on the country in this time of national peril?

Unfortunately, as we have shown, it is not. The proposed Law—which may any day be suddenly sprung on us, as the Munitions Act was—does not touch "property" at all. It does not interfere with the power of the idle, absentee owner of land or investments to draw, year after year, an income in rent, interest, or dividends from the labours of those who are rendering "National Service," without necessarily giving anything to the community in return for this income. The fatal blot in the present demand for a "National Service Law" is that it is not a demand that those who are at present idling away their lives—living, as they say, on their incomes, which means, of course (seeing that they do not themselves produce anything) on our incomes—in this way consuming, to no public use, the food and petrol and personal services which are badly needed elsewhere—should be sternly called upon, at least during the continuance of the war, to work for their own living. What it is, on the contrary, is that those who are already working should be compelled to come under military law, in order that a great many of them may be arbitrarily sent to labour in the Munition Works under conditions of Servile Labour.

27-11-15.

679

ITEM 679/57

CONSCRIPTION AND CONSCIENCE

Presidential Address by

CLIFFORD ALLEN

To the National Convention of the
NO-CONSCRIPTION FELLOWSHIP
November 27th, 1915

27-11-15.

CONSCRIPTION AND CONSCIENCE

Presidential Address by

CLIFFORD ALLEN

To the National Convention of the
NO-CONSCRIPTION FELLOWSHIP
November 27th, 1915

Price 1d.; post free 1½d.
Published at 8 Merton House, Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES OF THE NO-CONSCRIPTION FELLOWSHIP.

THE NO-CONSCRIPTION FELLOWSHIP is an organisation of men likely to be called upon to undertake military service in the event of conscription, who will refuse from conscientious motives to bear arms, because they consider human life to be sacred and cannot, therefore, assume the responsibility of inflicting death. They deny the right of Governments to say "You shall bear arms," and will oppose every effort to introduce compulsory military service into Great Britain. Should such efforts be successful, they will, whatever the consequences may be, obey their conscientious convictions, rather than the commands of Governments.

APPLICATION OF PRINCIPLES TO WAR-WORK.

THE FOLLOWING resolution, which has also been adopted, defines the attitude of the Fellowship towards forms of War Service other than the bearing of arms :

> "The members of the Fellowship will refuse to engage in any employment which necessitates taking the military oath. Whilst leaving the decision open to the individual judgment of each member, the Fellowship will support members who conscientiously resist compulsory alternatives to military service involving a change of occupation."

FOREWORD

THE ORIGINAL date fixed for the termination of the recruiting scheme, organised by Lord Derby, was November 30th, 1915.

UPON NOVEMBER 27th there met at the Memorial Hall, London, a special National Convention of the No-Conscription Fellowship. The Convention was summoned to consider ways and means of resistance to any form of Conscription that might follow the conclusion of the voluntary recruiting effort. It was attended by delegates from every district of the country, and afforded a very striking incident in the course of the war.

THE FOLLOWING was the address delivered by the Chairman (Mr. Clifford Allen) at the public session of the Convention.

New Year's Day, 1916.

Conscription and Conscience

Comrades and Friends, I think you will agree with me when I say that I bear a very grave responsibility in having to make at this juncture a public statement as to the object, the intention, and the faith of the No-Conscription Fellowship. I want it to be clearly understood by all, who are members and delegates present, that there must be no under-estimating the gravity of the conscription crisis which at present faces us. It is because your National Committee was fully aware of all that has been taking place in the conscription conspiracy, that we felt it to be our duty to call together here in conference representatives of every section of the Fellowship throughout the country. Ten months ago, when the war was in its early stages, at the instigation of our Secretary, Mr. Fenner Brockway, or, as he would say, of his wife, a few men who were of military age decided that it would be well if they met and took common counsel together with a view to dealing with any possible danger arising from conscription during the war. At that time the danger of compulsory service was a remote danger; and for that reason, in the early months of this year, very little was done by those who were responsible for the early ideas of the Fellowship. As time went on, the danger of conscription became more imminent; and in proportion, as the danger increased, so was the serious attention of the founders of the Fellowship given more and more to its development. In proportion, as the issue became pressing, so did the number of members in this organisation increase, with the result that at the present time we represent in this Hall almost every district from Land's End to John o' Groats, and voice the opinion of thousands of men who will under no circumstances submit to this evil thing, should it come about.

As soon as the danger of conscription became imminent, and the Fellowship something more than an informal gathering, it was necessary for those responsible to consider what should be the basis upon which the organisation should be built. It was necessary for our Fellowship itself to be articulate; and it was further essential that we should have some method of making our purpose known to the country in order that those who might already agree with that view should be aware of our existence. The conscription controversy has been waged by many people who, by reason of age or sex, would never be subjected to the provisions of a Conscription Act. The chief characteristic of this Fellowship is that full membership is strictly confined to those men who would be subject to the provisions of any such Act; and that being so, the importance of the organisation in the controversy becomes far greater than would be the case if we were merely a society to debate the academic principles of conscription.

Having decided that we must have some common basis of belief, we had to look round in order to discover which one of the objections to conscription was that which met with general approval amongst our members, and so should form the basis of our organisation. Upon examination we discovered the following objections to conscription. There were firstly the groups of people who strongly advocated war, but who differed as to whether the best way of carrying on war was the voluntary or the conscript system. These people also held that the contribution of our country to the Allied cause in this war should be a contribution of money and munitions. In addition to this argument that was being advanced, we discovered others; arguments that conscription would be the gravest possible interference with individual liberty in this country of free traditions; that conscription would be a menace of the most serious character to the development of our Trade Union Movement; that indeed the imposition of conscription might be construed as the first step towards its inevitable conclusion, the domination of the military caste and the military spirit in Britain. We examined all those views, and, after careful discussion, we unanimously rejected the whole of the first group, which may be described as merely military or strategic. So far as the second group of opinions was concerned, those dealing with the infringement of individual liberty, and with the danger to the Trade Union Movement, it was immediately apparent that each of us held very firmly one or all of those opinions—that, in fact, our objection to conscription was intensified just in so far as we held vigorously one or all of those views. But that was not all. We discovered a fact, which is the most important characteristic of our organisation, that not only did we individually hold the views that I have expressed, but that there was one objection to conscription which we shared with intense fervour, and that was a belief in the sanctity of human life. The members of the No-Conscription Fellowship base their fundamental objection to conscription on this ground: that whatever else a State may or may not do, whatever infringement of individual liberty a State may or may not effect, there is one interference with individual judgment that no State in the world has any sanction to enforce—that is, to tamper with the unfettered free right of every man to decide for himself the issue of life and death. We contend that the individual conscience alone must decide whether a man will sacrifice his own life, or inflict death upon other people, and that however far the State may impose its commands upon the will of the community, the right of private judgment in this particular must be left to the individual, since human personality is a thing which must be held as sacred. Upon that we have built up our organisation. It is because we hold that view so intensely, whilst believing in the other arguments that I have indicated, that nothing would ever induce us to betray our deep religious and moral conviction by accepting conscription.

You will at once realise, that having decided upon that statement of faith, there joined us many men whose views, politically, socially, and in matters of religion, were profoundly different, and the amazing thing about our Fellowship is the way in which it has been possible to build up an organisation for action amongst men, who, on so many points, are at variance with each other. We have in our midst Socialists of every school, Christians of every shade of thought, men from the masses as they are called, men from the middle classes, and men from every other class; and yet within our organisation, in our conscientious objection to this form of compulsion, we have found a common basis for action at the present moment.

WE ARE sometimes described as shirkers. I want to say very emphatically that the members of the No-Conscription Fellowship believed in National Service long before many who are now advocating it. We may differ as to our interpretation of that service, we may differ as to its degree, but at the present moment we are only cut off from that particular service which our State demands from us, because it is a contribution to the carrying on of war. We, though believing in varying ways in national service, cannot as an organisation accept service which conflicts with our profound belief in the brotherhood of man, and in international solidarity.

I THINK, therefore, I have shewn that the No-Conscription Fellowship has been responsible, not entirely but very largely, for throwing up in the conscription controversy what we may call the moral issue, and that our contribution has been to lay tremendous stress upon the conscientious, and not the mere political objection to conscription.

HAVING COME to that conclusion, we proceeded with our work of organisation, and as the delegates are here, it is as well that they should know how remarkable has been the development and growth of our Fellowship. We have only been in existence from an organising standpoint for about six months; and in that six months we have built up a network of branches in every important city of the British Isles; in six months, by a process of what we may call lightning organisation, we have created a Society of an unique character to deal with an unprecedented problem; in six months not only have we built up the structure of our organisation, but we have also devised ways and means of a resistance to a Conscription Bill and a Conscription Act. In the course of our work we have discovered other bodies with whom we have been willing and glad to co-operate in this work. We have discovered, to our joy, that one organisation which has taken a similar stand in history in the past, intends to take that stand again to-day. We have on the platform fraternal delegates from those organisations, and they will presently address you. I think it better that they themselves should put the point of view of their respective societies; but this I will say, that there is now a strong binding Committee between our Fellowship and such organisations as the Men's Service Committee of the Society of Friends and the Fellowship of Reconciliation. The history of the Society of Friends, so far as peace and war are concerned, is one which is so honourable that it requires no word of praise from me, and I am confident that when the representative of that Society speaks, as he will in a few moments, we shall hear once more stated in the old Quaker spirit that firm and convinced determination in this vital matter of life and death.

THERE IS another characteristic of our organisation which I must touch upon, and it is this : Whether or no a man becomes a member of this Fellowship, it rests entirely with his own individual initiative. We have decided so far carefully to eschew any kind of public propaganda; we decided that it was not our business to go out into the highways and hedges to increase our membership by means of propaganda; that it was indeed for each individual man to decide, having seen our statement of faith, whether or no he desired to take the consequences of that belief. But that does not mean that our organisation has been idle. During the last few months I venture to say that there is no society opposed to conscription in this country which has exercised a more profound influence upon the whole controversy raging in the House of Commons. Night and day, members of your National Committee have been working behind the scenes. Day after day we have been laying the intentions of this organisation before those who are in authority; and I want to submit to you that our real triumph lies here : that the mere existence and the maintained activity of a body pledged to resist conscription, should it become law, has had more to do with the hindering of its imposition than any other influence at work in our country. I have every reason for believing that when the forces, which are governing the present discussion, are weighed by the historian in the future, it will be found that the publicly announced intention of this organised body has been one of the most potent forces in making the Government hesitate to impose this evil system upon the country.

DURING OUR existence we have given the Authorities and the Police every kind of information that they have required. We have nothing in our organisation of which we are ashamed. When I myself and my colleagues have been faced by detectives and members of the Police force, we have offered to them our documents, we have answered willingly every question they cared to put to us, and we have told them that they could learn everything which they required to know in the matter of our organisation, but that there was one thing they could never take from us, and that was our individual judgment in this matter of conscience.

THE CRISIS has now come upon us, and this Convention this afternoon is going to consider detailed proposals as to how that crisis is to be faced. I stated at the beginning of my speech that we were fully informed of all that was going on in every section of political life regarding this conscription controversy. It has been very largely our work which has assisted in raising (what the Government would call prematurely) the issue in the House of Commons during the last few weeks. I submit to you, that as the result of that premature raising of the conscription controversy, His Majesty's Government have given to the world a remarkable exhibition of political trickery. They have not strengthened their chances of conscription by the lack of confidence which they have invited by that exhibition. It is perfectly true at the present moment that we have not got in this country what you might describe as legal conscription; but let no one mistake that there is now in existence an almost more wicked form of conscription, and that is economic conscription, the conscription of victimisation under which thousands of men are suffering at the present moment. I have no doubt that you will endorse my view when I say that there is nothing more deplorable that has happened during this war than the way in which employers have kicked men with 30s. a week down the office stairs in order to serve their country.

WE ARE going to oppose this system. But there are two kinds of opposition which can be offered to any measure in Parliament or outside. You can oppose a Bill in the House of Commons, and by agitation in the country up to the time that that Bill becomes the law of the land : you can also resist the operations of that Act, should it go upon the Statute Book. I want it to be clearly known here, speaking on behalf of the Fellowship, that it is the latter of those two kinds of opposition that we intend to offer. The late Attorney-General has set a precedent with regard to resistance to a Bill which may become an Act. Mere insurrection or rioting, which we confidently believe will be one of the results of the introduction of Conscription, are not the only forms of resistance to hand. Speaking with a full sense of responsibility, I want the Government and the public to know that our opposition is not going to be a mere political game. As an organisation we have attempted by our abstention from propaganda to avoid interfering with the will of the majority in the State, so far as the prosecution of the war is concerned; but we want to make it perfectly clear that if now the majority in the State through their Government (if indeed there is a majority) decides to impose a system which violates men's deepest religious convictions, we are not going to play at opposition. Your National Committee are considering the most vigorous possible forms of opposition. We are keeping in the closest possible touch with the rank and file of the Trade Union movement; and we are able to say that the opposition to conscription in the form of an Act will not emanate merely from the No-Conscription Fellowship.

IN MAKING that perfectly emphatic statement regarding our unqualified opposition and our determined resistance, let me make one point absolutely clear. However deep and however vigorous our opposition is going to be—and vigorous it is going to be—we will never adopt any kind of measure which would result, so far as we are concerned, in the taking of human life. We do not hold an opinion one day as the basis of our organisation in order to go back upon it the next day in the methods of our resistance. In making that statement, a further point should be emphasised. There are various kinds of opposition which a Government can engender in a community. It can engender political opposition and social opposition: but the most dangerous form of resistance which a Government can arouse is that which results from religious persecution. If you cast your mind back over the past, you will see over and over again repeated in our own history and the history of other countries, that the one kind of opposition which it has been almost impossible to suppress, and has often ultimately gained the day, has been that which has found its source in deep religious conviction. That is going to be repeated if conscription is imposed on this country at the present moment.

WHILST BUILDING our opposition upon a moral and religious basis, we are none the less adopting the most businesslike methods possible for the organisation of that resistance. We are not going to carry it out in a mere slipshod fashion; and the Agenda which you will have to discuss this afternoon is an illustration to you of the businesslike programme by which we hope to obtain our objects.

I BELIEVE we are going to succeed in preventing the imposition of conscription. But supposing we fail in preventing that system becoming law, I wish to make this point by way of clearing up a misconception which sometimes exists as to the character of a shirker. If, despite our present determined opposition, and notwithstanding our determined opposition in the future, conscription becomes the law of the land, we are willing to undergo the penalties that the State may inflict—yes, and even death itself—rather than go back upon our convictions. Let it be clearly understood that the members of our organisation have not formed the Fellowship in order to shelter themselves against suffering. It may be that the only way whereby we can ever convince public opinion that one class of so-called shirkers is willing to suffer, will be through the process of compulsory service. Those of us who have joined the organisation, those of us who have come to this decision, which may entail such results, are young men; and we have not come to it without a mental and spiritual struggle. We have endeavoured, so far as possible, to clear our minds of mere cant and hysterical thinking; and having done that, we have braced ourselves to an unqualified decision. From my own personal experience, I know that that mental struggle has not been an easy process. I repeat we are all young men; and life is a very precious thing to the young man. We cherish life because of the opportunities for adventure and achievement which it offers to a man who is young. We cherish life because of the call which it offers to national and international service, and as we come to our decision here in this Convention, we do it casting our eyes over many years of opportunity which lie spread out before us. I believe there is no man amongst us who has any lust for martyrdom for martyrdom's sake; and it is well that those, who appraise or condemn our determination, should remember the struggle through which we have gone to arrive at it.

But once our minds have been made up, I suggest to you that there has come to us a certain joy, because we are able now to put to the practical test the words which we have used so often in the past, and the principles which we have merely proclaimed and debated. I hold that it is a privilege that the young men of our generation should have such an opportunity of bearing witness to the faith that is in them. It is an experience which I believe must refine and temper not only our judgment at present, but our judgment throughout the rest of our lives. And yet, no man has joined the Fellowship in order to advertise his willingness to suffer. Perhaps the yoke which is hardest to bear is our inability at the present moment to undertake the generally accepted form of service, since it appears to us to be one contrary to our deepest convictions; that we have to stand, as it were, idly by while the rest of the world is busying itself with service. Sometimes I feel it would be a sheer luxury to be able to undertake the vilest kind of work in order that I might assuage that feeling, but directly I have examined the problem I see it is immediately answered. Just in proportion as we cannot render that particular service which the nation at the present moment asks, since it is part of the process of war, we seize upon new forms of service in order to take its place. There is no organisation whose members are more active and busied in national service than the No-Conscription Fellowship at the present moment. It may be, that judged by the narrow, practical standpoint, we shall appear, because of the imposition of conscription, to have failed; but I do not believe you can judge our success or our failure by so narrow a judgment. May not we say with perfect truth that just in proportion as we men have to suffer for the cause of peace, we shall advance that very cause which we have at heart at the present moment; and just in so far as we cause the Government to persecute those who believe in peace, so we may be doing the greatest service, which has been performed since the war broke out, to stimulate the national conscience in that direction. Probably a far more powerful propaganda than countless meetings, or countless declarations, will be the testimony of men who are willing to suffer rather than sacrifice their convictions in this matter of peace.

I DO NOT know how you view it, but this belief sometimes breaks in upon my mind. If you examine the war at the present moment, it is the most wonderful instance that I have ever known of a State being willing to undertake one achievement at a time. In the old days, before the war broke out, many of us were urging the national conscience, so that the nation might be willing to do one thing at a time. Then it was to remove poverty and cheapness from national life. We failed. And now what a change is to be noted. The hoardings of our streets are covered with posters calling upon men to take up national service for one purpose. Rich and poor in varying degrees are casting in their lives and their money for the service of the community; and why?—for the work of destruction. The decision we must secure, the moral that we have got to point in the future is this: that as now the community is realising the possibility of one accomplishment at a time, so it shall admit this again in the future. But upon the next occasion, the objective shall not be the work of destruction, the purpose of national service shall not be the mere degrading of humanity. Rather, it must be that such service in those days may make human life as valuable as it is now cheap, and may bring into human existence as much joy as there is now grief burdening the hearts of men.

COMRADES, I WANT to move, on behalf of the National Committee, a resolution re-affirming our intention, and I submit to you that you should stand in silence and thus signify your agreement. It is :

> "That we, the delegates and members of the No-Conscription Fellowship, assembled in National Conference, fully conscious of the attempt that may be made to impose conscription on this country, recognising that such a system must destroy the sanctity of human life, betray the free traditions of our country and hinder its social and industrial emancipation, though realising the grave consequences to ourselves that may follow our decision, hereby solemnly and sincerely reaffirm our intention to resist conscription, whatever the penalties may be."

THE RESOLUTION was then adopted, the delegates standing in silence.

ITEM 679/58

Compulsory Military Service
and
Industrial Conscription

WHAT THEY MEAN TO THE WORKERS

PRICE ONE PENNY.

WAR EMERGENCY: WORKERS' NATIONAL COMMITTEE,
1 VICTORIA STREET,
WESTMINSTER, S.W.

WAR EMERGENCY:
WORKERS' NATIONAL COMMITTEE

CHAIRMAN:
ROBERT SMILLIE, J.P.

VICE-CHAIRMAN:
JAS. O'GRADY, M.P.

TREASURER:
W. A. APPLETON,
HAMILTON HOUSE, BIDBOROUGH STREET, LONDON, W.C.

H. GOSLING, L.C.C.

FRED BRAMLEY

C. W. BOWERMAN, M.P.
(Trades Union Congress).

J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P.

JOHN HODGE, M.P.

W. C. ANDERSON, M.P.

W. H. HUTCHINSON
(The Labour Party).

BEN COOPER

BEN TILLETT
(General Federation of Trade Unions).

DAVID GILMOUR
(Scottish Trades Union Congress).

HERBERT SMITH

J. WINSTONE
(Miners' Federation of Great Britain).

JOS. CROSS
(United Textile Factory Workers).

ALBERT BELLAMY
(National Union of Railwaymen).

ROBERT WILLIAMS
(National Federation of Transport Workers).

W. B. STEER
(National Union of Teachers).

F. W. JOWETT, M.P.

H. DUBERY
(Independent Labour Party).

Mrs. M. A. GASSON

B. WILLIAMS
(The Co-operative Union).

H. J. MAY
(Co-operative Congress Parliamentary Committee).

W. H. BROWN
(Stratford Co-operative Society).

Miss MARY MACARTHUR
(Women's Trade Union League).

Miss MARGARET BONDFIELD
(Women's Co-operative Guild).

Dr. MARION PHILLIPS
(Women's Labour League).

Miss SUSAN LAWRENCE, L.C.C.

SIDNEY WEBB

W. STEPHEN SANDERS
(The Fabian Society).

H. M. HYNDMAN
(British Socialist Party).

JOHN STOKES
(London Trades Council).

SECRETARY:
J. S. MIDDLETON,
1 VICTORIA STREET, LONDON, S.W.

Telegraphic Address:
"LABREPCOM, VIC. LONDON."

Telephone:
1213 VICTORIA

Compulsory Military Service
and
Industrial Conscription:
What they mean to the Workers

Do you understand what is meant by the "National Service" which most of the militarists, perhaps half the members of the two Houses of Parliament, and probably a majority of the property-owners are now trying to impose on the nation by law?

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

What the so-called National Service Law demands is that the Government should be authorised to make men compulsorily into soldiers. The usual proposal is that all men between the ages of 18 and 40, whether married or unmarried, should be required, on receipt of a Government Order, to present themselves for medical examination, and that all those declared physically fit should be compulsorily enrolled in the Army (or Navy), put into uniform and made subject to military law. What used to be understood was that all the men thus compulsorily enlisted would serve alike in fighting battalions, either for home defence or in the firing line abroad.

INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION.

But behind the proposal for Compulsory Military Service there lies at this moment a special peril for the British wage-earning class. It has been made quite clear by many of those who are pressing for the National Service Law that the object now is not wholly, or even primarily, to get more soldiers to send to the firing line. The most pressing need is for shells, not soldiers—for more munitions, rather than more men at the front. Mr. Lloyd George says he must have at least 280,000 more workers in the munition factories; and the intention is to get these by using the machinery of Compulsory Military Service.

What is being proposed by many of those who are demanding the National Service Law is that the compulsory enlistment should be for service in whatever capacity the Government may require. Those men whom a superior officer thinks fit for any branch of munition work are to be arbitrarily selected; and sent, whether they like it or not, to any factory in any part of the country that may be short of hands. They will have to work there under military law; bound to implicit obedience to any orders given by any superior; required to accept whatever wages, to work for whatever hours, and to submit to whatever conditions may be imposed upon them. Any remonstrance or complaint will be a breach of discipline, punishable by Court Martial. Any refusal to work at whatever speed may be required will be a serious crime, punishable by imprisonment. These compulsorily enlisted men will not be allowed to throw up their job, or to leave the factory—they will just have to obey orders for as long as their superior officer chooses. They will, in fact, be soldiers put to factory work; and no Trade Unionism is allowed among soldiers. Moreover, they will, in most cases, be made to work not in the State arsenals or workshops, but in the factories belonging to private capitalists, and run for private profit (though these capitalists will now have to yield up half of any extra profit in taxation and if their establishments are "controlled" under the Munitions Act, there is a nominal "limitation" of the profit which the capitalist owners are to be allowed to make—a limitation to not more than all the profit they have hitherto been making in "boom" years, with 20 per cent. extra!) This is what is meant by Industrial Conscription. It is an attempt to make use of the present war to get Servile Labour.

HOW MILITARY SERVICE CAN BE USED FOR INDUSTRIAL CONSCRIPTION.

This proposal is so dangerous that it compels us to take care that even simple Military Service is not made the instrument for Industrial Conscription. It would, for instance, be quite possible for the Government, if Parliament merely authorised Compulsory Military Service, to compel men under 40 to enter the munition factories, under whatever conditions the Government chose to impose. It would only be necessary for the Government officer to say to any man whom the officer chose arbitrarily to select for Munitions Work, "either accept this service, or you will be sent straight to the trenches." The same power of "discipline" could be used to enforce, inside the Munitions Factory, any order whatsoever. "Either obey, or you will be reported to the War Office for instant transfer to the front." Those men who did not keep up what the employer thought a sufficient output could, at any moment, be dealt with in the same way. The Government may possibly make some pretence at exempting from Compulsory Military Service the strongly organised coalminers and railway men, on the pretext that their present service is indispensable to the successful conduct of the War (which is no more true of them than of millions of other workers). But exactly the same power of "discipline" could be used to the coalminer or railway worker. If he is not "docile," he will be told by the manager or foreman that he will be dismissed; with the hint that the recruiting sergeant will be waiting for him outside the door, to take him instantly into military custody.

Now that the desire and intention have been avowed to use Compulsory Military Service for the purpose of Industrial Conscription, and getting Servile Labour, the workers must see to it very carefully that there shall be no such possibility.

IS COMPULSORY SERVICE NECESSARY?

Is there any necessity for Compulsory Service? We believe not. And the proof that this is the case is afforded by the action of the Government itself—nay, often by the very advocates of a National Service Law themselves. It is plain that neither the Government nor these gentlemen are "putting everything in." The armies need (both for transport of troops and stores, and for hospital work) many more motor-cars, and all the petrol that is imported. But the Government is not "commandeering" the tens of thousands of private motor-cars of the wealthy that we see still consuming petrol in pleasure riding. Our soldiers could do with unlimited gunpowder, and it might be supposed that all ammunition factories were working day and night to supply military requirements only; but there has been no prohibition of the consumption of gunpowder in the shooting of game (though many people have voluntarily abandoned it), and those who have money have no difficulty in obtaining for private use as many sporting cartridges as they choose to pay for. We are anxious about the nation's supply of gold, which has to be used to make payments abroad, yet there has been no summons to those who have gold ornaments to yield them up to the Mint. We are supposed to be short of men, but the Government Offices are not yet substituting (except for a few of the humblest jobs) women for men. To-day, more than ever before, it is money that furnishes the sinews of war; and the experts are looking more to financial exhaustion to bring the war to a close than to any dramatic military achievements. Yet our Government is not seizing the wealth of the nation. Nor do those who are seeking to stampede the Cabinet into a National Service Law —practically all of them belonging to the propertied class—propose that these things should be done. It is only the lives of men that they ask the Government to commandeer. Is it fair to take the men before taking the motor-cars; to commandeer people before commandeering property?

THE SHAM "EQUALITY" OF COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

Those who demand a National Service Law make much of what they call its "fairness" and the "equality in peace time," in that it makes the same requirement of every man, rich or poor; namely, that he should give a year or two of his life, and risk disablement or death, in defence of our common country. But is this either "fair" or "equal"?

We must notice, to begin with, that Compulsory Military Service is never, in any country whatsoever, exacted from all men. Only the physically fit are taken; though those who are short, or without good teeth or good eyesight, or have weak hearts, or are ruptured, or have varicose veins have also a duty to their country. There are always lots of other exemptions for men of particular professions, and what not. In no country have all the men of military age been actually compelled to serve in the Army or Navy. As a mere matter of statistics, it is not, on the whole, the wage-earning class that gets the benefit of these exemptions.

But even those who are forced to serve do not serve in anything like the same way or under the same conditions. The rich man's son or the University graduate usually becomes an officer; or (as in Germany) has a special class to himself as a "One-Year Volunteer"; and their allowances from home enable them to make their military service quite agreeable. The young manual worker goes into the ranks, and has to live on his rations and pay; and to put up with whatever conditions his officers think good enough for "the lower classes." It is not for nothing that a young man commits suicide; and it is significant that the rate of suicide among the soldiers in conscript armies is very high—far in excess of that among the men who are not forced to serve. Even if all ranks were treated alike, and if all classes had equal chances of promotion, the difference in the sacrifice exacted by Compulsory Military Service in peace time, as between men of different position and means, is necessarily enormous, and most unfair. To the young man of a wealthy family, the year or so that he is required to spend in the Army, instead of at Oxford or Cambridge University, is a mere change of amusement or sport, or at best, an alternative form of preparation for life, quite as useful as many a University career, and one which involves him in no pecuniary loss. To the young mechanic, who has already been in the workshop for four or five years, and is just getting to his full earning capacity, the year or so that he spends in barracks or camp means the loss of a year's earnings, and a dangerous interruption in his industrial career, to which (if he happens to leave the Army in a year of bad trade), he may never be able to succeed in returning.

THE FUNDAMENTAL FALLACY.

Apart from all this, however, there is a fundamental fallacy in supposing that there is either "equality" or "fairness" in making an equal demand on men of very different means. We do not think it either "equal" or "fair" to compel every man to pay the same tax to the State, because an equal tax from men of unequal wealth means a great inequality of sacrifice. The State nowadays professes to take from everyone in proportion to his means. When the Government wants land or ships or the service of doctors or lawyers, it does not compel every person having land or ships, or every doctor or lawyer, to give an equal quantity of land or of ships, or an equal amount of doctoring or legal service—that would be deemed a most unfair inequality of sacrifice. What it does, for the sake of getting as much real equality as possible, is to buy or hire, at market prices, whatever land or ships, or doctors or lawyers, that it needs, and then to levy the cost on the whole nation, in such a way as (at any rate, this is the professed principle) to make everybody pay in proportion to his means. Why should not the Government continue this system of real equality for its soldiers and sailors, as well as for its doctors and lawyers—that is to say, get their services voluntarily at the market price, and levy the cost on the whole people, in proportion to their means?*

WHY CONSCRIPTION IS NOW ASKED FOR.

We can now understand why it is that it is always the propertied class that is mostly in favour of Compulsory Military Service. It has been frequently avowed that one of the motives of many Conscriptionists is to get a cheap Army. It has frequently been pointed out that the British Government paid its soldiers a "shilling a day," or even more; and liberal rations, with allowances for wives, and pensions for widows and orphans, and provision for disablement, on what was deemed an "extravagant" scale. The other European Governments are able (because of Compulsion) to get their soldiers for something like a halfpenny a day, and much less costly rations, allowances and pensions. This is not really any saving to the Continental countries. The same needs have to be met, in one country as in another, but it is not the same people who pay for them. The conscript soldiers and their families are so miserably provided for in France, Germany, Italy, etc., that a very heavy burden is cast on their relations, in order to provide for the soldier's own requirements whilst on service, and for his wife and children, either whilst he is serving, or after he has been wounded or killed. But, seeing that the cost could in this way be thrown on the wage-earning class, to provide out of the taxes for the soldier and his family, even as well as the British Government did, is regarded as an unnecessary burden on the wealthy taxpayers. Why should not men be compelled to serve in the Army for something like a halfpenny a day, instead of having to be induced to serve at a shilling a day or more? This was avowedly one of the reasons why Compulsory Military Service used to be asked for.

When the present war broke out, the British Government was forced by the Labour Party, after a prolonged and even embittered resistance by both Ministers and Civil servants, to concede—

* It is interesting to note that, although the British Government pays every year an enormous sum to the lawyers who serve it, no one has ever suggested that they should be compelled to serve in the legal offices and so be secured at a much cheaper rate.

though still not enough—much better terms than have ever before been given in the way of Separation Allowances and Pensions for wives, "unmarried wives," mothers and other dependents, as well as for disabled men. All this increased the attraction of Compulsion to those who wanted a Cheap Army; and great have been the complaints of the "extravagance" of the Voluntary System. The intention was still to cut down the cost as soon as Compulsion could be secured. Suddenly, only a few weeks ago, it seems to have occurred to the Conscriptionists that this was not the way to make Compulsion acceptable; and they changed their tone. One and all they began to disavow any desire to reduce the soldier's pay and allowances, even if he were legally compelled to serve on whatever conditions the Government might prescribe. Now the Conscriptionists disavow any intention to reduce the cost of the Army. What they now say they are concerned about is only to get enough men. But can we have any confidence that, when men are compelled to serve, the rates of pay and allowances will not be reduced to the level of those of the other conscript armies of Europe?

IS CONSCRIPTION REQUIRED?

It is clear—indeed, it is scarcely denied by any candid person—that Compulsory Military Service imposes a very heavy burden on the wage-earning class.

Is there any reason to suppose that soldiers and sailors cannot be obtained, even in the present unparalleled war, in numbers equal to all the requirements, without resorting to compulsion? Among the military experts themselves, there is a division of opinion as to whether the system of Voluntary Recruiting could not be made to yield all the soldiers and sailors that the War Office would like to enrol, and could possibly equip, and whether compulsion—introduced in this sudden way—would really produce any larger total armies. The number enlisted week by week is still enormous, and still more than there is equipment for. And Voluntary Recruiting is at present being deliberately prevented from yielding as many men as it could be made to do. The influence of most of those who want to force Compulsory Military Service upon the nation, is being used to "crab" Voluntary Recruiting. Some of the most widely-read newspapers obviously do all they can to discourage it. Some, at least, of the officials concerned in its organisation work it so clumsily, and with so much "red tape," as to lead to the suspicion that their hearts are not in its success. Whole sections of employers (such as the Railway Companies and the farmers), honestly believing that no more men can be spared, put every possible obstacle in the way of their enlisting. Other employers do not want their profits to suffer by losing more men. No protection is given to a soldier's wife or mother against arbitrary ejectment from her cottage, even if she continues to pay the rent. No definite promise has yet been given by the Government that it will see to it that, when peace comes, every man who has served shall be found a situation, at not less than the Standard Rate of Wages; or, in cases in which this cannot be done, shall be maintained until such a situation can be found for him. Yet it is the bounden duty of the Government to give this pledge and to fulfil it. It is now prevented from giving this pledge by those who want to force Compulsion upon the nation.

It is the opinion of many of those who know the circumstances that an enormous number more recruits could be obtained—probably twice as many each week as the Government is now getting—if the Government:

(i) Definitely promised to every man who had served to secure him, when Peace comes, either a situation at not less than the Standard Rate of Wages, or Maintenance until such a situation could be found for him;

(ii) Protected the wife or mother of every man serving against ejectment so long as the rent was paid;

(iii) Insisted that all employers should stop preventing their men from enlisting;

(iv) Explained that it was in a position now to equip all the men, put rifles into their hands as soon as they needed them, and place them in the field immediately they were trained; and

(v) Made a frank and serious appeal to the nation for just as many soldiers as the projected military operations require.

None of these things have been done. The possibilities of Voluntary Recruiting are therefore not exhausted. There is, accordingly, no justification for the dangerous experiment of Compulsion.

WHY COMPULSION IS AIMED AT.

The fact is the real need of the Government at this moment is not for more soldiers—the Voluntary Recruiting is still yielding, week by week, as many men as can be equipped and armed. More can be got when required to supply the wastage, merely by using the appropriate means. The real reason why Compulsion is asked for at this moment is because the Munitions Act has not been a success. Although a great increase in the output has been obtained, the shells and rifles and cartridges and machine guns and cannon, together with the uniforms, the boots, and the various accoutrements of the soldier, are still not being turned out in sufficient quantities to supply, not only our own Army, but also those of all our Allies. Mr. Lloyd George declares that he must have 80,000 additional mechanics and 200,000 additional unskilled labourers. And men and women are slow to take service in the controlled establishments. Hence, it is proposed by those who are running this agitation to rush through a measure for Compulsory Military Service; forcibly to enrol some hundreds of thousands of men between 18 and 40; and then draft off the 280,000 of them whom the Government officers select to Compulsory Service in the Capitalists' Munition Works.

HOW MR. LLOYD GEORGE HAS PREVENTED THE INCREASE OF MUNITION WORKERS.

Now, the reason why men are slow in taking service in "Controlled Establishments" is plain. They don't like the penal conditions. They don't like being brought up before the Munitions Court, and punished as criminals for "losing time" (at their own expense). They don't like being compelled to continue in one establishment, however badly they may be treated; and not being allowed to go and work elsewhere on pain of what is really a heavy fine. If the Minister of Munitions wants to attract workmen to Munition Works, why does he put them under penal conditions?

But there is another reason why Mr. Lloyd George is failing to get as many operatives as he wants. There are various grievances as to the rates of wages. In some of the "Controlled Establishments" the pay of the unskilled labourers, and especially of the women, is quite inadequate. Mr. Lloyd George, speaking at the Trades Union Congress, accepted full responsibility for all the rates of wages, which (as he expressly said) were fixed by the Government. What does he think of rates of 4d., 3d., and even 2½d. per hour to adult women workers employed by time?

HOW TO GET MORE WORKERS TO THE MUNITION FACTORIES.

We may frankly admit the national urgency of putting more workers to make munitions. Can they be obtained without Industrial Conscription? We believe that they can be got in sufficient numbers, if the appropriate steps are taken. But they must be attracted there by sufficient inducements. There is no real increase in output to be got out of Forced Labour.

We may note that there are still many tens of thousands of mechanics of one sort or another to be drawn in. There are probably over 50,000 men still employed in connection with private motor-cars, either as drivers or as repairers at the thousands of garages. Nearly all of these have mechanical skill. If the Government were to stop all use of motor-cars by private persons, unless driven by the owner himself; and at the same time offer the discharged drivers and repairers continuous employment in munition works at proper earnings most of these men could be obtained.

There is even less difficulty about the supply of unskilled labour, male or female. There are still many hundreds of thousands of men—including men unfit for military service, but competent for factory work—in retail shops, on the tramways, and elsewhere who could be attracted to munition work. If, for instance, every tramway conductor in the kingdom were definitely guaranteed replacement in his situation when the War was over; and offered, meanwhile, £2 per week at munition-making, an enormous proportion of the thousands of such men would accept the offer; and their places could be temporarily filled by women.

No serious attempt has yet been generally made—though quite successful at a few places—to put women to all the work of which they prove themselves capable. Literally hundreds of thousands of women could be drawn to the Munition Works, if proper conditions of services were guaranteed; a minimum wage of not less than £1 per week, and the chance of going on to the men's piece-work rates. But some of the capitalist owners of the "Controlled Establishments" will neither take the trouble to arrange for proper conditions for women, nor offer them anything like such a wage. And though Mr. Lloyd George tells us that the Government fixes all the rates of wages in these controlled establishments he has not yet required any decent offer to be generally made to the women workers of the country.

Hence there is no case for Compulsion. If sufficient workers have not yet been obtained, it is because the Government still allows mechanics to be diverted for the pleasure of the wealthy; does not make the necessary arrangements to draw in such classes as tramway conductors; and does not offer conditions sufficiently attractive even to the hundreds of thousands of low-paid women.

To utilise these new classes of workers would, of course, involve trouble and demand organising ability—yet only a trifle in comparison with what Forced Labour would require!

Thus, it is not to the point for any fire-eating General, or for the Government, or even for Lord Kitchener, to declare that they must have more men. They can have more men (without compulsion) if only they will take the measures that are indicated to them by every representative of the wage-earning class. Compulsion is unnecessary.

WHAT IS REALLY NATIONAL SERVICE?

Thus the objection of the workers is not to Compulsory National Service in any real sense. The wage-earning class, indeed, always finds itself under compulsion to render service; and it would see nothing but justice in any such legal compulsion as would impose this obligation on the idlers. It is true that National Service, of this genuine kind, is at present being loyally given by the great majority of the adult population, but it is being avoided and escaped by "the shirkers." The daily work of man or woman to earn an honest living, whether in digging coal or tilling the soil, in manufacturing or distributing commodities, in the various forms of transport and communication, in rearing children and maintaining the home, in teaching the young and tending the helpless, in inventing and organising and directing such useful services, in science and art and literature—aye, also in preventing and resisting every kind of crime and forceful aggression, national or international—all this is real National Service, which is due personally in one or other form from every one of us so long as health and strength lasts, according to and up to the limit of our several capacities.

WHO ARE "THE SHIRKERS?"

The National Service is at present being avoided and escaped, not only by the wastrels and the criminals, who are comparatively few in number, but also by the great mass of those who—because, as they put it, they have "property"—live idly on the incomes which (in the form of rent, interest, or dividends) the law allows them to extract from the labour of others. Not all "the rich" are idle, by any means. Many of them—in this time of national peril a much larger proportion than usual—do work hard (though they are not forced to do so), and render admirable National Service in one way or another. These may be said "to earn their keep." Many more do not spend all their "unearned" incomes on themselves or their families, but devote some fragments to charities or to new investments of national utility. These portions of the "unearned" incomes may be admitted to be usefully applied. But the greater part of these incomes are consumed in the mere living of the rich without work. And a great number of rich people, men as well as women, do no work of any kind. They render no National Service whatever.

WILL THE SHIRKERS BE MADE TO WORK?

Is it proposed to compel these people to work for their living in the only effective way, namely, by depriving them of their present artificial power of levying tribute on the labour of others—this is, by the Government taking in taxation for the purposes of the nation (with humane allowances for the aged and the helpless), all "unearned" incomes; or, at any rate, raising the Supertax to Nineteen Shillings in the Pound on all such income in excess of, say, a thousand pounds a year? Is this the Law of National Service which it is sought to impose on the country in this time of national peril?

Unfortunately, as we have shown, it is not. The proposed Law—which may any day be suddenly sprung on us, as the Munitions Act was—does not touch "property" at all. It does not interfere with the power of the idle, absentee owner of land or investments to draw, year after year, an income in rent, interest, or dividends from the labours of those who are rendering

National Service, without necessarily giving anything to the community in return for this income. The fatal blot in the present demand for a National Service Law is that it is not a demand that those who are at present idling away their lives—living, as they say, on their incomes, which means, of course (seeing that they do not themselves produce anything) on our incomes—in this way consuming, to no public use, the food and petrol and personal services which are badly needed elsewhere—should be sternly called upon, at least during the continuance of the War, to work for their own living. What is being demanded is that those who are already working should be compelled to come under military law, in order that a great many of them may be arbitrarily sent to labour in the Munition Works under conditions of Servile Labour.

LONDON: AT THE NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS LTD.; ALSO AT MANCHESTER.

New Edition Now Ready.

Memorandum
by the Workers' National Committee on the Increased Cost of Living during the War.

August, 1914—September, 1915.

Price 1d. : Post free 1½d.
9d. per dozen ; 5s. per 100.

Note New Address—

1, VICTORIA STREET
:: WESTMINSTER ::
LONDON :: S.W.

The Daily News 1/4/16

Western Mercury. 6.7.16.

7.5.16.

1679B/1

THE NEW APPEAL TRIBUNALS.

Forty Set Up in England and Wales.

WOMEN AND LABOUR MEN TO BE MEMBERS.

Mr. Walter Long, President of the Local Government Board, has circularised chairmen of County Councils and Mayors of County Boroughs asking them to suggest to him the names of persons qualified to serve on the Appeal Tribunals for England and Wales. It will be remembered that the Local Tribunals under the Derby recruiting scheme are appointed by the Local Registration Authorities, and the Appeal Tribunals and the Central Tribunal by his Majesty.

England and Wales are divided into 40 districts, many of them coterminous with the present counties, some consisting of counties grouped, or, in the case of Yorkshire, divided. Mr. Long suggests that in each district comprising more than one of these areas a meeting should take place of the chairman or chairmen of the County Councils and the mayor or mayors of any county boroughs situate within the district for the purpose of compiling a list of suitable persons who could be invited to act on the Appeal Tribunal for the district.

It is intended, he says, that opportunity shall be afforded by the Appeal Tribunals to the parties to any appeal to appear in person if they so desire and the question will arise in each case whether one tribunal will suffice for the district or whether it will be more convenient to have two or possibly more sitting in different places within it. This will depend largely on the size of the district, the density of its population, and its railway facilities. Where one tribunal will suffice, he thinks from 7 to 10 names would be sufficient.

In selecting the names to be submitted, Mr. Long continues, care should be taken to choose persons of judicial and unprejudiced mind and temperament. It is of the highest importance that the tribunal should command the confidence of the community, and, inasmuch as the labouring population will have a large interest in the questions to be determined, it is necessary that a fair proportion of the members of the tribunal should be direct representatives of labour. It will be expedient that at least one member of the tribunal should have had some legal training and experience. Women may be placed upon tribunals with advantage, and representatives of chambers of commerce possessing the necessary qualifications would also be serviceable.

It is not desirable that the names sent in should include those of men of military age who have not been attested or pronounced physically unfit for military service. Members of local tribunals or advisory committees should not be selected unless they are willing to resign their membership of those bodies.

Evening News. 31.5.16.

"COMPULSION FOR WOMEN."

The need for women on the land is becoming acute in some districts.

At a meeting at Newtown the recruiting officer for Montgomeryshire said that one of the principal War Office recruiting officers had told him that before long, when women and boys had been trained, the men would be taken from the land.

The crisis was so important that it was not merely a question of women offering their services on the land; they would have to go.

NEWTON URBAN.

FARMER WHO OBJECTS TO FEMALE LABOUR.

Newton Abbot Urban Tribunal met yesterday, Mr. W. Vicary presiding.

The proprietor of an art marble company, aged 28, married, applied for total exemption. Before the war eight men were employed in the industry, and only one was now left.

In reply to Mr. F. W. Marshall, who appeared for the military authorities, applicant said he personally assisted his father in a packing manufacture business most of the time, and also superintended the marble business. He was also appealing for the man referred to, who was a marble mason, aged 31.—Applicant was granted exemption as long as he continues his present work, and in the other case a month's postponement was allowed.

A dentist said it was impossible to get anyone to carry on his business.

Mr. Marshall: I think he ought to go. He is wanted.—Allowed until August 15.

DID NOT WANT WOMEN.

A general farm labourer's employer said there were 50 acres and seven cows, and this was the only man he had.

Mr. Murrin: Have you got any women on the farm?—No, sir, and don't want them—(laughter). I haven't even got a servant girl, and can't get one.—November 1st.

A married man, aged 23, managing a dairy business for his father, said the latter had broken his leg. His single brother had now joined.

The Chairman: It was agreed that if one went the other should stay.—Exempted whilst continuing his present employment.

An ironmongery firm asked exemption for a manager, the only other man left inside being a deaf clerk.

Replying to a question as to whether he had tried to obtain female help, the employer said women might be able to sell brushes, but not radiators, mangles, and bicycles—it was not like selling paint or cartridges—(laughter).—Fourteen days' postponement allowed, making a month altogether.

A plumber in the same employ who was said to do considerable work for farmers was granted exemption.

APPEAL TO BE LODGED.

Another ironmonger said five of his staff had gone, and he asked exemption for his acting-manager and also a plumber. The latter produced a doctor's certificate of unfitness.

Mr. Marshall elicited that upon attestation he was passed by another doctor.—Three months' postponement was allowed in the first case, and the man about whom the doctors disagreed was exempted whilst continuing the same occupation.

The Urban Electric Supply Company applied for the exemption of a stoker as being in a certified occupation.

The Chairman asked how long he had been in this occupation, and the answer was "seven years at one time and another."

The Chairman: We don't want to know about one time and another. How long have you been here now?—Three weeks this time.

The Manager said it was impossible to get another man in his place.—Granted a month.

The Manager said they would have to take the matter up and go to the Appeal Tribunal.

A youth of eighteen, the chief support of a widowed mother, was given six months' exemption, and told that he could then apply again.

A photographer and boot and shoe salesman with a family of young children, who said he had a lease and his business would have to be closed if he went, was also exempted for six months.

679B/2

Conscription and Conscience

By CLIFFORD ALLEN, (Chairman, N.C.F.)

ONE PENNY
Usual terms for quantities)

From 8 Merton House, Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE TRIBUNAL

"Tribunal. A Court of Justice."—Webster's Dictionary.

EDITED BY W. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Hon. Organiser N.C.F.)

The Military Service Act
Fully and Clearly Explained

By PHILIP SNOWDEN, M.P.

ONE PENNY

From 8 Merton House, Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

No. 4 THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1916 One Halfpenny

The Tribunal
Published by the No-Conscription Fellowship at
8 MERTON HOUSE, SALISBURY COURT, FLEET ST., E.C.
All communications should be addressed to the Editor at above address, and should reach him not later than Monday morning of each week.
Care should be taken to verify all matter sent for publication.

THE GOVERNMENT MOVING

Events have crowded upon each other this week. We have secured a new circular to the Tribunals from the Local Government Board. Mr. Snowden and our other friends in Parliament on Wednesday forced an acknowledgment that the administration of the Act had been a farce and a disgrace. Mr. Lloyd George expressed a desire to avoid a conflict with the Conscientious Objectors, and we are waiting daily for the public appointment of a new Committee to advise the Tribunals, and to provide civil alternative service for those Conscientious Ojectors who desire it.

These are important developments, but the gravity of the position is in no way lessened. Already many Conscientious Objectors have been rejected by the Appeal Tribunals, and quietly await action by the authorities. It is important that the Government should state how it intends to meet the serious dilemma in which it has involved itself. Is a man who was rejected by the Tribunals before the issue of the Local Government Board circular to be arrested and punished, whilst another man is to be reckoned a Conscientious Objector, and free from penalties because his case was heard after the issue of that circular? Is a man to be taken and shot in France because he lived in Glasgow, where the Tribunal refuses to give absolute exemption, and another man to be free from all punishment and be counted a just man because he lived in Edinburgh, where twenty-one absolute exemptions were given in one day?

What is to be the position of men whose cases have been decided before the new Government schemes are announced? Are they to be criminals because their cases have been heard too soon?

Persecution in any case will be a dangerous experiment, but under these circumstances it would be little short of madness.

The Government desires to avoid a conflict with the Conscientious Objector, and many schemes to impose civil alternative service are under its consideration. Whilst rejoicing that our testimony has produced so speedy a result, we must examine these proposals carefully and not for a moment lose sight of the real objective that we seek to attain.

We have always recognised that a decision in this matter must rest with the individual conscience, but we are fully alive to the serious results of accepting conditions, however harmless in themselves, by which we virtually acquiesce in a system of military conscription, and thereby help to fasten upon the nation that very militarism against which our consciences rebel.

Some people are warning us to beware of deciding our policy by "political" considerations. We agree in so far as objection is raised to merely obstructionist methods. We must be confident that we do nothing which places our convictions in a second place to tactics. On the other hand, we should be false indeed if—in order to secure an exemption, conditional upon a service otherwise unobjectionable—we compromised with an Act designed to organise men for fighting or alternative work to facilitate warfare, which we believe to be wrong. If the first line of Conscientious Objectors falter, the task of the anti-militarists in the future will be immeasurably harder.

And, after all, why does Mr. Lloyd George, speaking on behalf of the Government, desire peace with the Conscientious Objector? In order, he states, to secure the harmonious administration of the Act now that it is an Act. Is it for us, then, to secure its harmonious working? If that is Mr. Lloyd George's view of conscience, it is not ours.

Every man amongst us feels, and has long felt, the imperative call to service, but it would be a tragedy if men only answered that call in time of war. We believe that our work for peace is real national service; we yearn for the declaration of peace when we may give of our best to help in binding up what is now being broken; but let it never be supposed that our present daily work offers no chance for service, and let us not confuse free sacrifice for the community with compulsory war service. We are willing to remain usefully employed. We claim the right—provided by the Act—of absolute exemption. If that is refused, there can be no compromise.

CLIFFORD ALLEN.

THE FRIENDS' AMBULANCE UNIT

The following letter has been issued by the Friends' Service Committee to men of military age in the Society of Friends:—

"Many claimants for absolute exemption under the Military Service Act have been asked by the Tribunals to perform work under the direction of the Friends' Ambulance Unit. This suggestion is, apparently, the outcome of a comprehensive scheme of service, other than Ambulance work, drawn up by some members of the F.A.U. Committee. Their arrangement is designed to meet the case of Friends and those closely connected with them, who are willing to accept exemption, conditional on undertaking certain specified work.

It should be understood that this scheme does not come officially from the Society of Friends. Members of the F.A.U. Committee, with whom we have met in conference, tell us they have tried to make this clear in all their negotiations with the Government on the matter.

The scheme does not seem to us in any way to meet the case of those who have claimed absolute exemption. Nor is it without objection for Friends who are willing to accept conditional exemption, for it has the effect of dividing us from others by whom we wish to stand.

In the Military Service Act no distinction is made in favour of Friends, and yet already we have reason to be disquieted by the manner in which the Tribunals are discriminating between Friends and others. By this new arrangement Friends are given preferential treatment, while other conscientious objectors remain directly under War Office control. Friends will remember that the spirit and concern of the Adjourned Yearly Meeting were to unite ourselves to the fullest extent with all conscientious objectors.

Each man must, of course, decide for himself what service he can render. For those who feel with us that they cannot accept work under such conditions as are proposed, we wish to reaffirm our conviction that we, too, are serving the State. Once more we emphasise the all-important service of working towards the attainment of peace and for the removal of international and racial hatreds. This, we maintain, is the highest service we can render to our fellow-men, now and at all times. Whether or not we are exempted by the Tribunals, the stand we have taken and the public testimony we have borne, pledge us in all circumstances of life to demonstrate the way of peace, to meet violence with gentleness, anger with reason."

IT CANNOT BE!

. . . . But is it possible that, having such a need of loving your fellow-men, and a still greater need of being loved by them implanted in your heart; having such strongly-rooted aversion to human suffering, torture, and murder; seeing clearly that the greatest possible happiness accessible to men can be attained only by the acknowledgment of the equality of all men, and by their serving one another; being taught this by your heart, your reason, the faith you profess, being told the same thing even by science—is it possible that, in spite of all this, you should be compelled, on the strength of certain very vague and complex arguments, to act in a way directly contrary to all you know and feel? . . . . Is it possible that you or any other young man should have to do that on which all the evil of the world is founded—to enter the army and, renouncing your own free will and all human feelings, promise, in obedience to the will of superiors, to slaughter all those whom they order you to slaughter?

It cannot be!

—Tolstoy.—

679B/3

WHAT THE APPEAL TRIBUNALS ARE DOING

A TRAVESTY OF JUSTICE

Now that the Appeal Tribunals have begun their work, we are able to appreciate fully the scandalous travesty of justice perpetrated by the Local Tribunals in refusing to give applicants the grounds on which their claims have been disallowed. In the vast majority of cases where the application of a conscientious objector has been refused, the applicant has asked for the reasons for such refusal, only to be met with the curt reply, "We refuse to give our reasons."

These same applicants are now appearing before the Appeal Tribunals, and charges are being made against them by the Local Tribunals—CHARGES WHICH THE APPLICANTS ARE MADE AWARE OF FOR THE FIRST TIME WHEN FACING THE APPEAL TRIBUNAL. As an example of what is happening, we quote the case of a member of the N.C.F., who was refused absolute exemption by the St. Helens Local Tribunal, and appealed against the decision to the Appeal Tribunal at Liverpool. After the appellant's statement had been read, the Chairman read the following report from the St. Helens Tribunal:—

"This man belongs to a group who are coaching men of military age to object to service. He has no religious convictions, and would see his sisters ravished, or the war lost, rather than do anything to help. He is willing to take Government money. He considers himself first and only."

The appellant indignantly denied that he had no religious convictions, and stated that he cycled 20 miles to his church. He also offered to bring witnesses to prove his statement and to testify to his convictions, but the Chairman, after a few questions, announced that the appeal was dismissed, and refused leave to appeal to the Central Tribunal.

Surely this reduces the whole proceedings of the Tribunals to a farce. The worst type of criminal could not be treated in this manner: he, at least, would know the charges to be brought against him, and would be given an opportunity to refute them. Is there no standard of justice, or no laws whatever, to govern the proceedings of the tribunals? Cicero spoke truly when he said, "The laws are silent in the din of arms"!

* *

The above-mentioned appellant is employed by the St. Helens Education Authority as a teacher. The Chairman of the Liverpool Appeal Tribunal (the Lord Mayor) asked him if he taught his children to fear God and honour the King? The appellant, who had previously stated his belief that nationalism was the cause of all wars, replied that he could not conscientiously teach children to honour the King as a King; he would honour the King as a man and gentleman.

Chairman: All the members of this Tribunal would agree with me that the Education Committee at St. Helens should take into serious consideration whether a gentleman who has such views in regard to honouring his King is a proper person to teach the young people of St. Helens. We shall forward this decision to the St. Helens Education Authority.

Will the President of the Local Government Board please communicate with the Lord Mayor of Liverpool immediately, pointing out that neither the Act or the Regulations allow of such amazing conduct on his part?

"No Power to Grant Absolute Exemption."

Before the Surrey Appeal Tribunal.—Appellant: I am not prepared to assist others to take up combatant service.

Chairman: But what power have we to grant you exemption from non-combatant service? You are claiming exemption from combatant and non-combatant service, and the Act states that an exemption may be granted on the grounds of a conscientious objection to combatant service. There is nothing else in the Act that helps you. Your exemption can only be on that ground.

Appellant: I understand that it is quite possible to grant me a complete exemption.

Chairman: Well, the only ground is non-combatant service. There are some cases in which it would be possible to grant a complete exemption, but the circumstances would have to be very, very exceptional.

Appellant: I cannot take part in any service.

Chairman: That has nothing to do with it.

Absolute exemption refused. In giving the decision the Chairman again remarked that "the Act does not permit of exemption from non-combatant duties."

* *

At the West Sussex Appeal Tribunal, on Tuesday, March 21st, the Chairman announced that he had no power to grant absolute exemption to conscientious objectors.

Local Tribunal Decisions Reversed: C.O.'s to Fight.

The chief feature of the proceedings at yesterday's sitting of the Lancashire County Appeal Tribunal at Liverpool was the amendment of the decision of local tribunals recommending non-combatant service in the case of three conscientious objectors AND THE SUBSTITUTION OF COMBATANT SERVICE.

—"Manchester Guardian, 24-3-16.

At the London County Appeal Tribunal, on March 20th, a member of the N.C.F., who is in charge of the Gospel Lifeboat Mission at Peckham, appealed against the decision of the Camberwell Tribunal, which had granted him non-combatant service. The Appeal Tribunal decided to take away the certificate of non-combatant service and recommend appellant for combatant duties. Leave to appeal to the Central Tribunal was refused.

Anything But Fair Treatment.

At the South Staffordshire Appeal Tribunal, on March 17th, nine West Bromwich members of the N.C.F. appealed against the decision of the Local Tribunal. All appeals were refused, and our watcher reports that the appellants received anything but fair treatment. In several cases they were not allowed to finish their statements, and one appellant was pulled away by a police officer in the midst of his remarks to the Chairman. In another case the father of an appellant was refused leave to speak as a witness to his son's belief. Leave to appeal to the Central Tribunal was refused in each case.

Worse Than the Local Tribunal.

Extract from report of proceedings of the Middlesex Appeal Tribunal:—

"The Chairman asked appellant to state his reasons for objecting to non-combatant service. Appellant did so, and the members of the Tribunal were amused at same. Appellant also read a statement giving his reasons for being aggrieved at the decision of the Local Tribunal. The Chairman told appellant to cut his statement short, as there were several more claims to be heard. After a few more questions, the Chairman remarked, "Appeal dismissed." Appellant asked for leave to appeal to Central Tribunal.—Chairman: I refuse permission. Applicant: May I ask for your reasons?—Chairman: I decline to give any reasons.

The general attitude of the Appeal Tribunal was far more prejudiced and biassed against conscientious objectors than that of the Local Tribunal."

Abuse of the Local Tribunal!

According to the "Birmingham Gazette" of March 21st, a letter was read at the Staffordshire Appeal Tribunal, held at Walsall, from an insurance agent, who is a member of the Walsall Board of Guardians, stating, as the ground of his appeal, that the Walsall Tribunal which heard his case was offensive and insolent. The Chairman, he said, asking him why he was skulking there when others were going to fight, and also referred to his conduct as being "pig-headed."

The Clerk to the Appeal Tribunal ruled that this was no ground of appeal, BUT SIMPLY ABUSE OF THE LOCAL TRIBUNAL!

The appeal was disallowed.

MR. AYLMER ROSE BEFORE THE TRIBUNAL.
The Business of His Employer!

Mr. Aylmer Rose, the Organising Secretary to the N.C.F., appeared before Southwark Tribunal on March 21st, claiming absolute exemption on grounds of conscience. The Clerk to the Tribunal was somewhat taken aback when he came to the applicant's description of his occupation. Turning to the Chairman with a gasp of astonishment, he said:

"He says that the business of his employer is 'A Fellowship for common counsel and action of men of enlistment age who are not prepared to bear arms in the event of conscription, whatever the penalties for refusing.'"

In the course of the proceedings the Chairman remarked to the applicant: "And you will do nothing to get your country out of its present difficulties?"

Mr. Rose: No, that is not my position; I AM doing something to get the country out of its difficulties. I advocate peace and oppose militarism, and have always done so."

Chorus from Tribunal: So do we all advocate peace. . . . We all believe in peace. . . . We go the proper way about it. . . .!

Mr. Rose having expressed uncompromising opposition to non-combatant service in any form, the Chairman announced that his application for absolute exemption was refused.

* *

At the Southwark Tribunal, on March 23rd, exemption for six months was granted to 21 single men employed by the Amalgamated Press, Ltd., printers of "Home Chat," "Forget-Me-Not," "Comic Cuts," "Chips"—and other works of national importance!

679B/4

AN URGENT QUESTION FOR MR. LONG

The President of the L.G.B. has acknowledged the truth of the charges we have brought against the tribunals by issuing another circular to them, in which he tells them plainly that they HAVE the power to grant absolute exemption, that they must NOT hold their sittings in private, that they MUST treat conscientious objectors as human beings, and that, generally speaking, they had better begin to put their house in order, and endeavour to administer the Act in the spirit intended by Parliament. All this is to the good.

But what we want to know is, WHAT IS MR. LONG GOING TO DO ABOUT THE DECISIONS ALREADY GIVEN BY THOSE TRIBUNALS, BOTH LOCAL AND APPEAL, WHICH HAVE CLEARLY BEEN TRANSGRESSING BOTH THE LETTER AND THE SPIRIT OF THE ACT?

For instance, among the tribunals which have definitely stated that they had no power to grant absolute exemptions are the following:—Leyton, Montrose, Glasgow, Barrowfoot, Brighouse, Twickenham, the Surrey Appeal Tribunal, and the West Sussex Appeal Tribunal. Each of these tribunals have adjudicated in cases of conscientious objectors who claimed absolute exemption. Will Mr. Long take steps to render null and void all decisions given by these tribunals, and order a new hearing in each case?

Then again, the Mountain Ash Tribunal decided to hear ALL cases in camera, in spite of a petition, signed by 40 applicants, asking for a public hearing. The tribunals at Hull, Doncaster, Sunderland, Swansea, Musselburgh, etc., also sat in private without good reasons for so doing. Are the decisions arrived at in these circumstances to hold good? And if a conscientious objector can prove that the Chairman, or any member of a tribunal, called him a traitor, a coward, a lunatic, a cad, or said he ought to be shot, or put on the point of a German bayonet, or made use of any similar pleasantry, will Mr. Long consider that sufficient evidence of bias and annul the decision given by such a tribunal?

MR. LONG'S NEW CIRCULAR.

The following are extracts from the new L.G.B. circular issued on March 23rd to Local and Appeal Tribunals:—

"It has been represented to Mr. Long that in some cases at least Local Tribunals, in dealing with applications on grounds of conscientious objection to the undertaking of combatant service, have seemed to be under the impression that the only form of exemption which could be given in such cases is an exemption from combatant duties only. If this is so, the Tribunals have overlooked Section 2 (3) of the Act, which provides THAT ANY CERTIFICATE OF EXEMPTION, INCLUDING ONE ON CONSCIENTIOUS GROUNDS, MAY BE ABSOLUTE, conditional, or temporary, and in regard to exemption on conscientious grounds, indicates that such exemptions may also either take the form of an exemption from combatant service only, or may be a total exemption from military service conditional on the applicant being engaged in some work which in the opinion of the Tribunal dealing with the case is of national importance.

Some Tribunals are alleged to have subjected applicants to a somewhat harsh cross-examination with respect to the grounds of their objection. It is, of course, necessary that the Tribunal should satisfy themselves of the bona fides of an applicant and of the precise grounds and nature of his objection, but it is desirable that enquiries should be made with tolerance and impartiality. In this connection reference may be made to paragraph 16 of Mr. Long's circular letter of 3rd February.

In a few cases complaints have been made that Tribunals have decided to conduct ALL their hearings in private. Mr. Long desires to point out that, under the Regulations and Instructions, it is not competent to a Tribunal so to act. Reference may be made to paragraph 4 of Section II. of the Regulations and paragraph 6 of Section II. of the Instructions."

WHAT IS HAPPENING AT WESTMINSTER

TUESDAY, MARCH 21st.

We Breathe Again!

Mr. Peto asked the Home Secretary whether his attention had been called to the announcement of intended concerted action by the National Council of the I.L.P., the National Committee of the No-Conscription Fellowship, the Society of Friends, and the Fellowship of Reconciliation to obstruct the operation of the Military Service Act, 1916; and whether he had found that the action of these associations or any of them goes outside the immunity granted to persons and associations to advocate the repeal of the Military Service Act, 1916; and, if so, what action he proposed to take in the matter?

Mr. Samuel: I have not seen the announcement referred to, and HAVE NOT YET OBSERVED ANY ILLEGAL ACTION BY THESE BODIES WHICH WOULD CALL FOR MEASURES ON MY PART.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22nd.

Mr. Snowden's Smashing Indictment.

In the debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill, Mr. Snowden created a sensation in the House by his powerful and absolutely unanswerable indictment of the proceedings of the tribunals. He quoted case after case of insult, bullying, and injustice on the part of the tribunals—cases such as we have been drawing attention to in our columns in every issue—and not one of these were refuted by the Government. He described the treatment meted out to conscientious objectors by the tribunals as "nothing short of an outrage and a public scandal." Speaking of the determination of the conscientious objector, Mr. Snowden declared: ". . . . I say in all seriousness that I know these young fellows, and there are hundreds and thousands of them; these men are the present-day type of those men to whom we owe all the liberties we have to-day. They are men who are prepared to go to the scaffold for the sake of their principles. They are men who, without a quiver, will stand against the wall and face the muskets of the soldiers rather than be conscripted into an army against their conscientious views."

Mr. Long and the Death Penalty.

In the course of his reply to Mr. Snowden, Mr. Long said: I am asked two legal questions. One question is, whether the death penalty is to be imposed in regard to a conscientious objector who refuses to have anything to do with military service. Most certainly not. The section of the Act is perfectly clear, which indicates that the death penalty shall not be inflicted upon a man who is called up from the Reserve, and who refuses to go. Then I am asked, is the death penalty to be inflicted in France? I do not follow the case. The man has gone. He may have protested, but, surely, if he is going to give active resistance, his active resistance will be in this country before he goes to France. I TAKE IT THAT A CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTOR WHO SAYS, "IT IS AGAINST MY CONSCIENCE TO HAVE ANY CONNECTION WITH MILITARY SERVICE," WILL REFUSE TO PUT ON HIS UNIFORM. You are not going to send him to France in plain clothes.

The N.C.F. Hon. Organiser Exposed!

At Ruddington Tribunal, a member of the N.C.F., in reply to an enquiry, mentioned the fact that Mr. W. J. Chamberlain was the Hon. Organiser of the Fellowship.

Member of Tribunal: Perhaps it is the renegade Englishman named Chamberlain who is in Germany plotting against England!

The Military Representative's Tribute.

When our Cardiff Secretary appeared before the Llandaff Tribunal, he made an obvious impression upon the military representative (General Lee).

Said the General: He is the best example of a conscientious objector we have had. I detest these fellows from the bottom of my heart, but when listening to this chap, he struck me as being as near a conscientious objector as one can be.

Absolute exemption refused.

Was He Coached?

Mr. J. P. Fletcher, a member of the National Committee of the N.C.F. was granted absolute exemption on grounds of conscience by the York Tribunal. The military representative has appealed against the decision. The following is a copy of this gentleman's grounds of appeal:—

"Do not consider this man should have absolute exemption from Military Service. His main objection was to compulsory service in any form. Not considered a matter of conscience, but the fact is he does not like to be under the Military Authorities."

Did the military representative fill up his appeal form unaided, or was he coached?

6798/5

PUBLIC OPINION

The Bishop of Oxford's Warning.

The following letter from the Bishop of Oxford appeared in "The Times" on March 16th, 1916:—

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE TIMES."

Sir,—I do not hold the views of those who are seeking exemption from military service on grounds of conscientious objection to war under any circumstances. I can quite believe (though I have no evidence of it) that some of those who take this ground may really be shirkers. But I know one or two men personally (not members of the Church of England) who, I am sure, are not shirkers, men whom you might accuse of fanaticism but never of cowardice or stupidity. I think these men have not been treated by the tribunals with sufficient respect. I feel sure that they will be driven to passive resistance, and that, whatever punishment is finally meted out to them, they will take it gladly. But 10 cases of punishment for conscience' sake would establish their cause with very many who are deaf to their reasonings. I am venturing to write this because I think that the appeal tribunals, while discriminating as severely as necessary, had better be more respectful where there is good evidence of conscientious conviction, however unreasonable the conviction seems to the tribunal, as to me, to be.

I am, Sir, Yours, etc.,
C. OXON.

Cuddesdon, March 14th.

* *

Free Church Council Committee's Protest.

On Friday, 24th inst., the General Committee of the Free Church Council passed the following resolution by a unanimous vote, moved by Dr. Clifford, seconded by Dr. Garvie: "This Committee records its strong disapproval of the recruiting injustices which have taken place in various parts of the country, and urges on the Government the necessity of insisting that the provisions of the Military Service Act, intended to safeguard the liberty of the conscience, should not be invalidated by the decisions of local tribunals."

* *

A Legal Criticism of the Tribunals.

We quote the following from the "Solicitors' Journal and Weekly Reporter," of March 18th:—

"The case of the conscientious objector has been equally misunderstood by the tribunals, and so obviously that the Bishop of Oxford has been moved to protest in a letter to the 'Times' of Thursday. And yet both the statute and the Local Government Board circular—very conveniently printed in Chitty's Statutes for 1916, 'Express Service' Edition, Part I.—are quite clear. The statute speaks of 'conscientious' objection merely, without reference to any form of religious belief, and the circular points out that 'whatever may be the views of the members of the tribunals, they must interpret the Act in an impartial and tolerant spirit. Difference of convictions must not bias judgment.' So far as we can judge, many members of local tribunals decline to recognise that there can be any conscientious objection to participation in warfare, and they have attempted to browbeat applicants in the style of the seventeenth century. They forget that conscientious objection is, neither in fact nor under the statute, dependent on religious belief; and that the existence of conscientious objectors has to be accepted without cavilling. It is the duty of the tribunals to administer the Act impartially, remembering that the exemption clauses have been introduced for the express purpose of preventing the claims of the Army from being carried too far. . . ."

* *

"A Very Grave Scandal Indeed."

From a leading article in the "Daily Chronicle" on March 24th:

". . . . We disagree totally from Mr. Snowden's views regarding the war; but no one can read the tremendous array of recruiting injustices which he recounted to the House of Commons on Wednesday (of which not one was refuted, while many as bad, or even worse, were brought forward by subsequent speakers), without realising that we are here in face of a very grave scandal indeed, one for which those responsible in ordinary time could not survive many hours. It is natural that all over the country a great amount of indignation should hesitate to show itself in normal ways. But it is there; and it is not too much to say that the grosser military irregularities—the browbeating of men by deliberate mis-statements of the law, the cheating of some, the kidnapping of others, the continuance of the monstrous impressment of the medically unfit, and the open exhibitions of political partisanship—are bearing fruit which deserves a more serious place in the calculations of serious statesmen than any ephemeral newspaper cries. Nor, we think, will any serious statesman, with the actual record of the local tribunals before him—their inconsistency, their uneven hand, their frank and avowed illegalities, and their general failure to give any reasoned and unprejudiced consideration to difficult cases or business needs—be disposed to devolve further decisions of national consequence upon them. . . ."

* *

A Plea for Courtesy.

We believe the conscientious objectors to military service are wrong in their views, but that does not blind us to the fact that the Military Service Act concedes the right for their applications to be heard and decided on their merits, and the applicants are entitled to courteous treatment. In these circumstances, we note with the deepest regret the reception accorded a conscientious objector before the Castle Donington District Tribunal, on Saturday. Mr. W. P. Woolley, in his zeal for the reputation of Kegworth, is reported as saying: "That this man should come here with such a plea is a scandalous disgrace to the parish," while the Chairman, after telling the applicant that he had come to the Tribunal with lies, observed: "The country would be well rid of such as you." Two members of the Tribunal entered a protest against the Chairman's observations, and we hope more will be heard of the matter, if necessary by a question in Parliament.

—"The Leicester Daily Post," 20-3-16.

* *

At Least Entitled to Respect.

". . . . Many of those who have a conscientious objection to conscientious objectors are content to dismiss them, in the words of the Scotchman, as 'You peetiful dribblets o' damnation,' or terms of similar approbrium. . . . Men who sincerely and genuinely put conscience first are at least entitled to respect, for they are prepared to appear before a public court, in defence of their belief, in face of the unpopularity which that course involves. . . ."

—"The Mid-Devon and Newton Times," 18-3-16.

OUR ADVICE COLUMN

Legal Expenses.

With reference to the advice previously given in this column regarding the use of local solicitors, we would point out that, wherever possible, we desire all expenses incurred in this way to be met locally. In cases where the financial condition of the branch does not allow of this being done, Head Office will, of course, consider the matter of making a grant.

Local Agitation.

We shall be glad to hear from branches who may have decided upon various schemes of local agitation. By being kept in touch with the methods adopted we shall be better able to advise other branches who may be desirous of ascertaining what is being done elsewhere. One branch may have adopted a scheme which could be worked effectively by every other branch. We want to hear about it, and to pass it on.

Our Latest Circular.

If any member has not received a copy of the circular dated March 23rd, he should at once write to his Divisional Secretary.

Recruiting Officer's Wire to Local Tribunal.

At the Hinckley Local Tribunal, on March 21st, the Clerk announced that a telegram had been received from the local Recruiting Officer, Capt. Stephenson, requesting them to grant no total exemptions.

How Robert Reasoned with a Ruffian.

"I have found the wildest and the lowest amenable to reason and kindness. One of the greatest ruffians in the regiment once spoke rudely to me in camp, and even threatened me. I was then a lance-corporal, and a mere boy. I sat down and talked to the bruiser quietly for a few minutes, and from that day he would have done anything for me."

No, this is NOT a reply by a conscientious objector to the usual "What would you do if a German ruffian threatened your mother?" but a quotation from Robert Blatchford's "Not Guilty"!

TO OUR MEMBERS.

It is essential that every member of the N.C.F. should read the "Tribunal," which can be obtained from Branch Secretaries. Only in cases where this is impossible should it be ordered direct from Head Office, when a penny stamp should be enclosed with order.

You MUST read the "LABOUR LEADER." Every Thursday. One penny.

NATIONAL LABOUR PRESS LTD., 74 SWINTON STREET, LONDON W.C.

Leeds Mercury.
2.5.16.

THE TRIBUNALS AND FEMALE LABOUR.

MANUFACTURERS' PROBLEMS IN COLNE VALLEY

The Appeal Tribunal for the East Central District of the West Riding, which comprises the areas of the Huddersfield and Saddleworth Unions, met at Huddersfield yesterday, Mr. T. Norton, Blagden Hall, presided.

A firm of film producers appealed against the decision of the Huddersfield Tribunal on a claim for exemption in respect of their manager, a single man. The appeal was dismissed.

A firm of Holme Valley manufacturers appealed on behalf of two piecers, who are engaged on night work.

A representative of the firm said that they could not get men, and women could not do night work.

Mr. E. J. Bruce, a member of the Tribunal who is a manufacturer, said that in the Colne Valley there were between thirty and forty women who had come from East Coast towns. They were engaged learning that class of work in the day time, and when proficient they would do night work.

The Tribunal allowed the firm six weeks in which to replace the men with women.

MORE WOMEN LABOUR

One firm of Longwood manufacturers had before the Huddersfield Military Service Tribunal, yesterday, twenty-nine applications for the exemption of employees. Incidentally the question of the importation of female labour from the East Riding and other districts was raised.

The representative of the Longwood firm said they could spare twenty men chiefly from the spinning department, in which there was a chance of female labour being substituted for them. Some imported labour had already been engaged, but this did not help them in the finishing and dyeing departments, which were absolutely "tied up."

The Mayor (Alderman Blamires) said the difficulties the firm would encounter would not be light, as the women who had come from a distance had never seen a mill before, and, probably, they would be frightened at first. They would not get accustomed to the noise for a month.

Twenty of the men were passed by the Tribunal for service; the applications for the men remaining were adjourned six weeks.

A QUESTION OF BADGES

At a sitting of the Keighley Military Service Tribunal, yesterday, Mr. A. Liddemore asked what was to be done in respect of two men who now turned out to be in possession of Ministry of Munitions badges.

The Military Representative (Mr. J. W. Morkill), referring to the newspaper correspondence on the subfect, said that the only thing was to raise the question again, as with the badges themselves they could do nothing as a Tribunal.

The Chairman (Ald. J. W. Smith) said that it was understood that the Ministry of Munitions had written a letter, but the Tribunal had received no communication.

Mr. Morkill said he proposed to ask the Ministry of Munitions for a copy of the letter which Mr. Beadman had written to him, and say that he was not satisfied that these men ought to be badged, and, further, to ask on what grounds he had badged them.

Canon Russell said the Tribunal would take its own course, and pay no attention to the letter in the newspaper.

Mr. Morkill said later on that munitions employers had agreed to the "combing out" of a number of single men, but the latter might urge any personal pleas.

The Tribunal spent a good deal of time in investigating these. In several cases applicants who did not appear were referred for immediate service.

"THANK GOODNESS FOR THAT"

After a young elementary school teacher had appealed at Hull, yesterday, for total exemption from military service, the Chairman (Dr. H. Woodhouse) expressed the hope that the applicant did not attempt to promulgate his views at the school.

Applicant: "No, I simply teach the curriculum."

The Chairman: "Thank goodness for that."

Asked what he was willing to do in the interests of his country, the applicant said that he was prepared to continue the work in which he was engaged.

He was granted exemption from combatant service conditional upon him undertaking work in the national interests.

Yorkshire Post.
16.4.16.

6

679B

NORTH RIDING APPEAL TRIBUNAL.

FARMERS AND WOMEN'S LABOUR.

The Appeal Tribunal for the North Riding of Yorkshire, and the County Boroughs of York and Middlesbrough, sat at the Town Hall, Scarborough, yesterday, under the chairmanship of Sir Henry Beresford-Peirse, Bart. The other members present included Alderman Vernon Wragge, York, and Alderman V. Fowler, Scarborough.

An interesting application was that of a Scarborough firm of wholesale stationers and printers, who applied on behalf of an estimate clerk whom they claimed possessed highly technical knowledge. It would, it was stated, be impossible to replace this man. The head of the firm stated that the firm had now £3,000 worth of work captured from the Germans. The clerk was acquainted with all those matters. The works, which employed 160 people, could not be kept going unless they had this clerk.

The appeal was dismissed, and leave to appeal was refused.

In another case Mr. John Whitfield, who appeared for the appellant, an attested married man, said the man attested because otherwise he was led to believe he would have no power to appeal. He thought Tribunals were to be set up to consider such cases.

Alderman Vernon Wragge: You had better wait and see. We cannot consider a nebulous Tribunal.

The military representative appealed against an exemption granted to a Whitby grocer's traveller.

The employer said that if the man went they would have to drop the most difficult journey.

The Military Representative: People can come and give their orders at Whitby, or they can be supplied with printed postcards on which to write their orders.

Alderman Wragge: Would that not be restricting the business?

Another Member: I should say it would be handing the business over to someone else.

The employer said his contention was that the man could serve his country better as a civilian than as a soldier.

The previous exemption was until October 1st, and it was now reduced until July 1st.

In another case the representative of the Board of Agriculture deplored the fact that farmers of the district did not take advantage of women labour.

In the appeal of a Scarborough dentist, who had numerous patients in the country district, the Tribunal granted a further extension of one month, expiring on June 14th.

Nottingham Guardian.
27.9.16

WOMEN ON FARMS.

LOCAL AGRICULTURAL OFFICER'S SUGGESTION.

The Mansfield Woodhouse Tribunal had before them, last evening, a letter from the Assistant Agricultural Organising Officer at Nottingham, who drew attention to the fact that there were women available for farm work from the training centres at Welbeck and Colston Bassett. They were training in poultry, milking, feeding, cleaning out stock, and horse work, and also, if required, butter-making. After a week in residence, those who were not considered likely to do good work, were eliminated, and, therefore, he had every confidence in requesting the tribunal, where possible, to recommend them to farmers who came before them.

All those whom they had already placed were giving every satisfaction. He would also be glad to know the views of the Tribunal upon the necessity for farm work in the ensuing six months, as one would wish to shape one's policy in encouraging girls to take up this work, with regard to the possibility of employment.

The tribunal made no answer to the last paragraph.

Birmingham Post
27. 3. 16

FINED FOR BAD TIME-KEEPING.

At the Birmingham Munitions Tribunal yesterday, Professor Tillyard presiding, the case was enquired into of a young woman employed at a controlled factory, who was accused of bad time-keeping. The case had been before the Tribunal on March 28, and was then adjourned to give the young woman an opportunity of keeping better time. A statement put in by the firm, however, showed that she had not done so. The girl averred that she was "fed up" with the place.

A fine of 15s. was imposed, to be paid in six weekly instalments, and the Chairman suggested that at the end of that time the firm should grant a permit.

The representative of the firm agreed; and the Chairman pointed out to the girl that the alternative was to stay out of work six weeks. If she did so she would probably experience difficulty in securing other employment, and would still have to pay the fine.

Daily Mail
5. 4. 16

WOMAN'S WAR WEALTH.

£3 18s. A WEEK GIVEN UP TO HUNT FOR MORE.

A woman munition worker before the Coventry Tribunal yesterday asked to leave her work because she was not earning enough. She said that in Birmingham she got not less than £3 18s. a week.

The Chairman: Why did you leave?

The Trade Union Secretary: She was told that the Coventry streets were paved with gold, but she earns less here than in Birmingham.

The court refused a certificate till she gave the work another trial.

Daily Graphic
1. 12

WOMEN'S WORK IN WAR.

TRIBUNAL'S HIGH PRAISE FOR THEIR SERVICES.

Sir Ian Heathcote Amory, chairman of the Devon Appeal Tribunal, made strong remarks yesterday directed against milk-sellers.

In his town of 10,000 inhabitants there was, he said, the equivalent of 20 men, whose business it was to work on the land, coming into the town each day for several hours peddling milk from house to house. It should be sufficient that milk was brought into the town and, perhaps, deposited in certain depots, to which people could go. Either that, or women could be found to take milk carts around.

Nothing a Woman Cannot Do.

This same point, about woman's capacity for work, came up at the City of London Appeal Tribunal, when an appeal was made for a young man engaged solely in cutting and designing underclothing and blouses. A girl had been tried and had proved, it was said, a hopeless failure.

"I do not think," observed a member, referring to munitions work, "there is anything a woman cannot do."

A month's exemption was granted.

Yorkshire Observer.
9. 10. 16
6798/7

LEEDS MUNITIONS TRIBUNAL.

A sitting of the General Munitions Tribunal for the Leeds district of the Yorkshire and East Midlands Division was held at the Leeds Town Hall on Saturday. Sir Alfred Hopkinson, K.C., presided, and the assessors were Mr. Joseph Henry (employers' panel) and Alderman Arthur Taylor (workmen's panel).

A. Kershaw & Son, Limited, scientific instrument makers, summoned Messrs. Rose & Co., provision merchants, for giving employment to a person employed by the complainants within the previous six weeks and not discharged by them. The employee was a married woman who had been in the complainants' service for two days as an overlooker. She stayed away for three weeks to attend to her husband, who, she said, was ill, and later it was found that she was working for Messrs. Rose.

The Chairman said there was a good deal of excuse for the defendants. The woman had left her previous employment, which only lasted two days, three weeks before, and when the defendants found out where she had come from they suggested that she should return. In view of the excuse that the defendants had, they would only be fined 10s. At the same time the tribunal wished to emphasise the duty of employers to make inquiries before engaging persons who had been employed on munitions work.

Mr. W. D. Perkins, proprietor of the firm of Messrs. Lee & Wilson, confectioners, Harehills, Leeds, was the defendant in a case brought by Messrs. Greenwood & Batley, who alleged that he had given employment to a woman who had left their service without notice. The defendant said his wife engaged the employee, who told her that she did not like the work at the munitions factory. At that time he did not know that it was illegal to employ a person within six weeks of leaving a munition works unless the person had been discharged or had a leaving certificate.

On behalf of the complainant firm it was stated that they would be satisfied if the woman returned to work out a week's notice. Such a course would have a wholesome disciplinary effect.

The Chairman said the tribunal had no power to order the woman to go back to the factory, and he was advised that if they had it would not be desirable, in the interests of discipline, to exercise it. In this case the light penalty of £1 would be imposed. Employers were warned, however, that in cases where there was deliberate breaking of the law with regard to the employment of munition workers the tribunal would not shrink from doing its duty to protect controlled establishments.

The Star.
17. 11. 16

VERMIN KILLING.

Women Refuse Work in Holds of Liners.

At the Southwark Tribunal Messrs. D. and L. Phillips, vermin destroyers, of Blackfriars-road, applied for the exemption of five employees, two of whom had been passed for general service.

A solicitor stated that these men specialised in the destruction of rats and cockroaches. The firm could not get women to do the work, although they advertised extensively and received hundreds of applications. When the women were told the nature of the work, however, they refused to take it. The work was carried on in the holds of liners.

The Mayor: Would not these men be more usefully employed killing vermin in the trenches.

The Solicitor: That is an open question.

Three months' extension was granted in the cases of three of the men, but the claims on behalf of the two who were passed for general service were refused.

Worcester Times. 29.8.16

COUNTY WAR AGRICULTURAL COMMITTEE.

"Objectors" and Farm Work.

Monday, at the Shirehall. Present: Mr. T. W. Parkes (Chairman), Mr. J. W. Willis Bund, Viscountess Deerhurst, Lady Isabel Margesson, Lady Barbara Smith, the Hon. Mary Pakington, Miss Day, Major Reddie, Dr. H. E. Dixey, Miss Micholls, Messrs. H. C. Gardner, R. V. Berkeley, J. Faulkner, W. H. Gabb, A. de C. Wilson, T. Lawson Walker, G. Vernon, J. W. Dee, A. Allsebrook, Frank Smith.

A communication was received from the Committee on Work of National Importance stating that at the reques of a large number of Tribunals throughout the county they had already been instrumental in placing several hundreds of men in farms, market gardens, and fruit growing centres. The experience of the Committee had been that, while there had been a feeling of prejudice against the employment of conscientious objectors, there were at the same time many farmers who recognised that their services should be properly directed to the land, and several hundreds had already been so employed. The Committee, with the concurrence of the Board of Agriculture, asked for the names of any farmers or market gardeners who would be likely to consider favourably the employment of such men.

Mr. Willis Bund said he did not like to say anything against the employment of these people, but he thought a man ought not to do better by being a conscientious objector than a man who was not. If they refused to fight, and wanted work, he must be given work at very little higher wages than he would get in the Army, and it must be hard work. These people had been flattering themselves that they had got off, but he hoped if they were taken on in this country, it would be on the distinct understanding that they were made to work at less wages than the agricultural labourer.

Mr. Dee said he hoped they would put it as strongly as they could. He would send these men to the front to put up barbed wire entanglements. How could they expect farmers, many of whom had sons fighting, to employ such men? If they brought some of these men to work alongside him he would "down tools."

The Chairman said personally he did not hold out any encouragement to such men, but he would bow to the wishes of the Committee. He thought they might reply that the farmers of Worcestershire would not be favourably inclined towards the employment of these men.

Dr. Dixey moved a resolution to this effect, which was seconded by Mr. Gabb, and carried.

PURCHASE OF WOOL.

The Staffordshire War Agricultural Committee wrote enclosing a resolution calling the attention of the Government to the widespread dissatisfaction felt with the arrangements made for the commandeering of the wool and hay, and the price paid for it. The Staffordshire Committee expressed the opinion that its work was being rendered migatory by the action of the War Office.

The Chairman, referring to the purchase of wool, said the regulations laid it down, after inspecting the wool, 75 per cent. of its value would be paid by the Government, and the balance when the final valuation had been made, and that the final inspection of the wool should be made in the merchants' warehouses. He contended that the final examination should be made on the flockmaster's premises in the presence of the farmer, and not 200 miles away where the farmer had no means of rectifying it. He moved that the Committee represent to the War Office that all rejections of wool should be made on the farmer's premises.

Mr. Gabb seconded, and Mr. Dee supported.

Mr. Willis Bund said he should like to support it, but he was personally interested. He had some land in Wales, where the tenants kept between 6,000 and 7,000 sheep, and they had written to him to say that until they settled with the Government they could not pay their rent. (Laughter.)

Mr. Gardner said he could not see what remedy the wool growers would have if they saw the wool inspected. The valuation of the Government was absolute, and they had to take the price. Personally, he did not think farmers had much to quarrel about in the matter of the price, but as Mr. Willis Bund pointed out, it had the effect of hanging up a certain amount of money.

With regard to hay, Mr. Faulkner complained that farmers would get less for their crop than last year.

Mr. Walker said Mr. Faulkner was under a misapprehension. The Produce Committee of the county had the power of fixing the maximum price. Last year the maximum price was £5, this year it was £6. The Committee had had a few grievances, which they had dealt with, and if Mr. Faulkner had any grievance the Produce Committee would be pleased to deal with it.

INSURANCE AND CASUAL LABOUR.

A communication from the Warwickshire War Agricultural Committee stated that they had written to the Board of Agriculture pointing out that farmers did not object to pay the insurance contributions of women who were liable, provided they were entitled to some benefit in return, but they protested against the injustice of claiming contributions when it was perfectly obvious that the women for whom they were paid would receive no benefit.

The Chairman said they were bound to pay these contributions, but why farmers or anyone else should be called upon to insure more or

Birmingham Daily Mail. 29.8.16 679.10. 679B/8

FARMERS AND CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

A meeting of the Worcestershire War Agricultural Committee was held at the Shire Hall, Worcester, yesterday, Mr. T. W. Parkes presiding. A communication was received from the Committee on Work of National Importance, asking to be supplied with the names of farmers or market gardeners who would employ conscientious objectors.

Mr. Willis Bund said he did not like to say anything against the employment of these people, but if they would not fight the work they did must be hard work, and at very little higher wages than they would get as soldiers.

A resolution was eventually carried that the committee were of opinion that the farmers of Worcestershire were not favourably inclined towards the employment of such men.

The Hon. Mary Pakington presented a report of the Sub-committee for Women's Work on the Land, which stated that the organisation now covered the whole county. There were only thirty-two parishes from which no returns had been sent in; 4,209 women had registered.

Miss Day (organiser for the county) stated that of the counties in England Worcester was the third in regard to the number of women who had registered, Norfolk being first with over 5,000, and Suffolk second with 4,500.

Sheffield Daily Telegraph. 22.9.16.

LINDSEY POULTRY DEALER AND WOMAN LABOUR.

A Thorpe St. Peter's poultry and coal-dealer, appealed at the Lindsey Appeal Tribunal, yesterday, on behalf of a married assistant (27). He stated that he was the only man he had left, and he dressed 500 to 600 head of poultry a week. At the outbreak of the war the appellant employed 10 men.

The Chairman (Mr. A. C. Newsum) asked if the appellant employed any women, and a reply was given in the negative.

The Chairman: Is egg collecting too difficult for women?

Mr. J. D. Blanchard: Or poultry dressing?

The appeal was dismissed.

A Lincoln builder (36), with an invalid wife, applied for an exemption on condition that he worked on munitions at such time as he could.

The Court granted the application, providing a single man from the works could be set at liberty for the Army.

Captain Marris (the military representative) said that would mean the man would have to give up the whole of his time to the work.

The Chairman agreed.

A Waddington fruit farmer (39), who also described himself as a market gardener, attested, appealed for exemption. He stated that he had an orchard of five acres, which he had possessed for about 12 years. He also grew oats and vegetables. He was married and had three children. His wife was very delicate.

Mr. E. Scorer, on behalf of the appellant, said his client spent two years in being trained, and he practised most up-to-date and scientific fruit cultivation.

Captain Marris elicited from the appellant that he possessed means and owned a motor-car, and Captain Marris suggested that he was not setting a good example to others.

The Tribunal unanimously dismissed the appeal and declined to grant leave to further appeal, the Chairman remarking that the property would improve during the appellant's absence, if the necessary pruning was done.

Mr. Scorer asked that the appellant might be granted a short time in which to gather his fruit.

Captain Marris: He should sell the trees as they stand to clear off.

Mr. Scorer: Perhaps you could tell us who would buy?

Captain Marris: I could find you a man who would buy it, only it is not part of my work.

The Court declined the request.

An appeal by the Greetwell Drainage Commissioners for an assistant engineman and drainage labourer (36), married, was not entertained, the Tribunal suggesting that the Commissioners should find a substitute not of military age.

had written to the Board of Agriculture pointing out that farmers did not object to pay the insurance contributions of women who were liable, provided they were entitled to some benefit in return, but they protested against the injustice of claiming contributions when it was perfectly obvious that the women for whom they were paid would receive no benefit.

The Chairman said they were bound to pay these contributions, but why farmers or anyone else should be called upon to insure more or less casual labour, and in the case of accident get no benefit, he did not know.

The letter was referred to the County Insurance Committee.

The Board of Agriculture wrote that the Army Council were placing 27,000 soldiers at the disposal of agriculturists for harvest work. The number allotted to this district was 225, and application should be made to Warwick.

In connection with this matter, a report was presented by Mr. Roberts, of the Worcester Labour Exchange, and

The Chairman said the Committee had been very greatly helped by the local Military Authorities. He expressed the gratitude of the Committee to Col. Edwards and Col. Winnington especially. Col. Edwards, Mr. Roberts, and he had been given very wide powers, and they had done their best for the welfare of the county, and it was no fault of theirs they had not done better.

THE WORK OF THE WOMEN.

The Hon. Mary Pakington presented a report of the Sub-Committtee for organising women's work on the land. This stated that the organisation now covered the entire county, and there were only 32 parishes from which no returns had been sent in. The parishes canvassed numbered 165, farmers registered 568, women registered 4 299. Of these women 107 received instruction under the County Council scheme; 1,380 armlets had been applied for and issued.

The Chairman said the Committee had done exceedingly well. They had shown a much better record that the County Committee were able to show.

Mr. Walker endorsed these remarks. He did not know what they would have done in their district without lady workers.

Miss Day said Worcestershire was the third county in England. Norfolk came first with 5,000 women registered, and Suffolk second with 4 500.

The Clerk presented a report by the Executive Committee which stated inter alia that the Headmasters of Malvern College and the King's School, Worcester, had made arrangements whereby gangs of schoolboys had been made available for work in the fields. The Committee had recommended the names of representatives of the Board of Agriculture on the various Tribunals in the county. The report also dealt with unsuccessful efforts to secure a steam tractor.

Mr. Allsebrook stated that Lady Barbara Smith had a steam tractor working on her home farm, which would be at the disposal of farmers in the district.

A discussion took place on the question of the arrangements made for women to take part in competitions at the annual show of the Knightwick and District Farmers' Club on October 10th.

679 b
679B/9

CRANKS and COMMONSENSE

An Essay of To-day
By
MILES MALLESON.

Price: THREEPENCE
(Post Free: Fourpence.)
From 8 Merton House, Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE TRIBUNAL

"Tribunal. A Court of Justice."—Webster's Dictionary.

EDITED BY B. J. BOOTHROYD during the imprisonment of W. J. Chamberlain.

C.O.'s HANSARD
You Must Get It.
One Penny Weekly.

No. 25 | THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1916 | One Halfpenny

THE EXTREMIST

The peace-crank is not by any means such a modern production as is generally supposed, and the fact that people to-day are regarding the opinions of the pacifist with such surprise, as something unknown before, is proof of the need of propaganda. It is close on three centuries since George Fox underwent imprisonment rather than join the Army, and since William Penn made his successful experiment in pacifism amongst the Red Indians, which we describe in another part of this issue.

Seventy years ago Emerson, in an essay on war, gave an admirable reply to some of the questions which beset us to-day, and incidentally emphasises the need for a positive and active attitude on the part of those who oppose war, as against the passive and negative attitude with which pacifism is too often associated. We reproduce the following extract from his essay, as reprinted in the Malton Leaflets No. 6, entitled "The Chivalry of Peace":

If you go for no war, then be consistent, and give up self-defence in the highway, in your own house. Will you push it thus far? Will you stick to your principle of non-resistance when your strong-box is broken open, when your wife and babies are insulted and slaughtered in your sight?

If you say yes, you only invite the robber and assassin, and a few bloody-minded desperadoes would soon butcher the good.

In reply to this charge of absurdity on the extreme peace doctrine, as shown in the supposed consequences, I wish to say that such deductions consider only one half of the fact. They look only at the passive side of the friend of peace, only at his passivity; they quite omit to consider his activity. But no man, it may be presumed, ever embraced the cause of peace and philanthropy for the sole end and satisfaction of being plundered and slain. A man does not come the length of the spirit of martyrdom without some active purpose, some equal motive, some flaming love. If you have a nation of men who have risen to that height of moral cultivation that they will not declare war or carry arms, for they have not so much madness left in their brains, you have a nation of lovers, of benefactors, of true, great and able men. Let me know more of that nation; I shall not find them defenceless, with idle hands springing at their sides. I shall find them men of love, honour and truth; men of an immense industry; men whose influence is felt to the ends of the earth; men whose very look and voice carry the sentence of honour and shame; and all forces yield to their energy and persuasion. Whenever we see the doctrine of peace embraced by a nation, we may be assured it will not be one that invites injury; but one, on the contrary, which has a friend in the bottom of the heart of every man, even of the violent and the base; one against which no weapon can prosper; one which is looked upon as the asylum of the human race and has the tears and the blessings of mankind.

In the second place, as far as it respects individual action in difficult and extreme cases, I will say, such cases seldom or never occur to the good and just man; nor are we careful to say, or even to know, what in such crises is to be done.

A wise man will never impawn his future being and action and decide beforehand what he shall do in a given extreme event. Nature and God will instruct him in that hour.

The question naturally arises, How is this new aspiration of the human mind to be made visible and real? How is it to pass out of thoughts into things? . . . . This is not to be carried by public opinion, but by private opinion, by private conviction, by private, dear and earnest love. For the only hope of this cause is in the increased insight and it is to be accomplished by the spontaneous teaching, of the cultivated soul, in its secret experience and meditation—that it is now time that it should pass out of the state of beast into the state of man; it is to hear the voice of God, which bids the devils that have rended and torn him come out of him and let him now be clothed and walk forth in his right mind. Nor, in the next place, is the peace principle to be carried into effect by fear. It can never be defended, it can never be executed by cowards. Everything great must be done in the spirit of greatness. The manhood that has been in war must be transferred to the cause of peace before war can lose its charm, and peace be venerable to men. . . . .

Self-subsistency is the charm of war; for this self-subsistency is essential to our idea of man. But another age comes, a truer religion and ethics open, and a man puts himself under the dominion of principles. I see him to be a servant of truth, of love, and of freedom, and immovable in the waves of the crowd. The man of principle, that is, the man who, without any flourish of trumpets, titles of lordship or train of guards, without any notice of his action abroad, expecting none, takes in solitude the right step uniformly, on his private choice and disdaining consequences—does not yield, in my imagination, to any man.

He is willing to be hanged at his own gate, rather than consent to any compromise of his freedom or the suppression of his conviction.

The cause of peace is not the cause of cowardice. If peace is sought to be defended or preserved for the safety of the luxurious and the timid, it is a sham,and the peace will be base. War is better, and the peace will be broken. If peace is to be maintained, it must be by brave men, who have come up to the same height as the hero, namely, the will to carry their life in their hand, and stake it at an instant for their principle, but who have gone one step beyond the hero, and will not seek another man's life;—men who have by their intellectual insight or else by their moral elevation, attained such a perception of their own intrinsic worth, that they do not think property or their own body a sufficient good to be saved by such dereliction of principle as treating a man like a sheep.

If the universal cry for reform of so many inveterate abuses, with which society rings—if the desire of a large class of young men for a faith and hope, intellectual and religious, such as they have not yet found, be an omen to be trusted; if the disposition to rely more in study and in action on the unexplored riches of the human constitution—if the search of the sublime laws of morals and the sources of hope and trust, in man, not in books, in the present, and not in the past, proceed; if the rising generation can be provoked to think it unworthy to nestle into every abomination of the past, and shall feel the generous darings of austerity and virtue, then war has a short day, and human blood will cease to flow.

THE NEED FOR AN ALTERNATIVE HEROISM.

"The fact remains that war is a school for strenuous life and heroism; and . . . is the only school that as yet is universally available. . . . But when we gravely ask ourselves whether this wholesale organisation of irrationality and crime be our only bulwark against effeminacy, we stand aghast at the thought. . . . What we now need to discover in the social realm is the moral equivalent of war; something heroic that will speak to men as universally as war does, and yet will be as compatible with their spiritual selves as war has proved itself to be incompatible.—Prof. William James ("Varieties of Religious Experience").

679B/10

The Tribunal

Published by the No-Conscription Fellowship at 8 MERTON HOUSE, SALISBURY COURT, FLEET ST., E.C.
All communications should be addressed to the Editor at above address, and should reach him not later than Monday morning of each week.

Care should be taken to verify all matter sent for publication.

THE HOME OFFICE SCHEME

Throughout the Fellowship, and particularly among our members stationed at Keddington, Dyce, and Newhaven, there is keen discussion as to the merits and demerits of the Home Office scheme. I hope the discussion will be marked by the tolerance and good feeling which have always characterised the Fellowship. The issues involved demand careful and quiet consideration, and whatever our conclusions, we must scrupulously avoid any suggestion of censure of those who do not take our view. It is inevitable that within a fellowship based upon liberty of conscience and composed of men of many different schools of thought diverging attitudes should be revealed as new problems to be faced. We ought frankly to recognise this fact, and by toleration one toward another, prove to the world that our Fellowship is strong enough to rise superior to it.

The first word I want to say is one of gratitude to the men who are being released from prisons for the stand they have already made. They have been the pioneers. They have had to bear the brunt of the fight. They have won a respect for our movement, which is finding expression wherever they have been in kindlier treatment to those who follow. To Mr. C. H. Norman particularly I want to express our thanks and admiration. He has probably passed through severer treatment than any man in our movement, and we all revere him for the resolute manner in which he faced it. Even if we do not, on the point under discussion, see eye to eye with him, and many of the comrades who have borne themselves so bravely in military and civil custody, the thought of what they have done must always be uppermost in our minds, and we must make them realise that the Fellowship is as much their home as ever it was.

A number of men working under the Home Office scheme have always been ready to accept Alternative Service but have previously had no opportunity of undertaking it. It has been manifestly unfair that they should have been compelled to pass into military and civil custody whilst others were readily given Alternative Service in the first place by the Tribunals. If they had been offered honourable service their duty would be quite clear, but the conditions attached to their work have made it a penalty rather than a service, and they must seriously consider whether, by accepting it they are not acquiescing in the imposition of a slavery which will serve as a precedent as long as conscription remains the law of the land.

But it is the position of the men who have been opposed to Alternative Service which is most difficult to understand. They argue that the Home Office scheme is not an alternative to military service, but to prison work, and that they are merely prisoners on parole. Since they have done work in prison they consider they have no right to refuse to do civil work outside, and they insist that, having compelled the Government to release them from the army, they are in a very different position from men who accept Alternative Service without passing into the hands of the military at all.

I imagine most of us will agree that they have carried the struggle much further than those who have not been handed over to the military, and that they have achieved a victory in compelling the army authorities to dispense with their services. Perhaps if we had passed through the same ordeal many of us would interpret the position as they interpret it. But situated as we are we do not do so, and whilst the experiences which they have had lend weight to their opinion, the advantage we possess of reviewing the situation from a detached point of view in the light of all the development of events outside must also be borne in mind.

I am not sure that the view of Mr. Norman and his comrades is not in large measure due to a too modest estimate of part they have played in the struggle. They seem to imply that immediately they were transferred from the army into civil prisons they ceased to be fighting militarism and the Military Service Act. None of us outside can take that view. We know that every single Conscientious Objector in prison has been fighting militarism in the most effective way possible. Had it not been for the witness of the two thousand men in custody all our agitation might have been in vain. Even if we could accept the view that the Home Office scheme is merely an alternative to civil imprisonment, we should reply that in prison the men were withstanding the Military Service Act, outside that stand has largely ceased, and only a limited victory has been won.

But we cannot accept the view that the Home Office scheme is not Alternative Service to Military Service. Surveying the progress of events, we see that the Tribunals failed, as we said they would fail, to sift out the genuine from the non-genuine conscientious objectors. The determined resistance in the hands of the military of hundreds of men who had been refused exemption by the Tribunals proved this to be the case, and the Government was compelled to ask the Central Tribunal to re-examine their claims and to offer those who were considered genuine work of national importance as a condition of release from prison and from the army. Seen in this perspective, how can it be argued that the Home Office scheme is not Alternative Service?

In addition to this the theory that the Home Office scheme is merely an alternative to prison seems to us to break down before certain concrete facts. How can work which is offered to men who have completed their sentence in prison, and who would otherwise have to return to the army, be described as an alternative to prison? Further, the agreement which the men accepting the Home Office scheme must sign states explicitly that they will be returned to the army after the completion of their prison sentences should they not fulfil its conditions. Surely these facts make it abundantly clear that the scheme is an alternative to military service?

The National Committee is asking branches to consider whether they think work should be done in prison by our members, but I do not think it can be reasonably argued that work in prison comes within the same category as work under the Home Office scheme. The former comes within the normal routine of prison; the latter is accepted by the men as a means of release from prison and the army, and is undertaken under a signed contract. Whatever view is taken of work in prison I cannot see that it need affect our judgment of the Home Office scheme.

But apart from all these considerations I would like to urge with all possible strength that the Home Office scheme ought not to be countenanced by us because it is in reality a form of slavery the acceptance of which is a denial of that sense of the worth of human personality which is the foundation of all we are doing. The positive contribution which the N.C.F. is making is its insistence on the value of individual liberty. What will history say of us if we only resist military service to fasten upon ourselves and our successors a vicious scheme of indentured labour?

A. Fenner Brockway.

Total number of men arrested and handed over to the Military Authorities	2085
Number of these men who have been court-martialled	1172
Number of these men who have been released—
(1) until called up again	12
(2) on grounds of health	95
(3) for other or unknown reasons	36

THE SOLE PREROGATIVE

Liberty, we are told, is England's sole prerogative. Perhaps that is why the Government, having prevented Mr. Bertrand Russell from going to America to deliver scientific lectures at Howard University, have now forbidden him to enter for any purpose whatsoever any prohibited area in the country, including the Sussex village where he has lodgings. Mr. Russell, therefore, because he objects to nations slaughtering one another, cannot carry on his occupation in this country, and cannot go and do so elsewhere. Of a government that does things like this, it is equally true to say that a sense of humour is another of its prerogatives, in addition to liberty.

The Haunted House.

Mr. Bertrand Russell's flat is at present let to an Italian gentleman, who recently wrote to Mr. Russell saying that officers from Scotland Yard had called repeatedly at the flat and searched it from top to bottom. He says he could not prevent this, and would be thankful to know just what to do, as it gave him much trouble and annoyance.

Mr. Russell replied, "Dear Sir, . . . There is nothing to do about the police. Domiciliary visits from the police are one of the customs of the country. If you desire less interference with personal liberty I should advise you to emigrate to Russia.—Yours faithfully, Bertrand Russell."

C.O.'S FROM FRANCE PLEASE NOTE.

Mr. W. A. Brewster, 28 Watery Lane, Merton Park, Wimbledon, wishes us to ask the parents or near relatives of the C.O.'s who were sentenced to death in France if they will kindly forward their names and addresses to him at the above address.

6798/11

AT KEDDINGTON AND DYCE

Mr. C. H. Norman attended the last meeting of the National Committee of the N.C.F., and asked for a statement from the Committee of its view of the Home Office scheme. After Mr. Fenner Brockway had expressed the appreciation of the Committee of the firm stand which Mr. Norman and his comrades have made in the hands of the military and in prison, detailed consideration was given to the argument of Mr. Norman that the Home Office scheme is an alternative to prison rather than to military service, and that if the Home Office scheme be rejected N.C.F. should also refuse to do work in prison. Finally, the National Committee adopted a resolution reiterating its opposition to Alternative Service and expressing the view that the Home Office scheme is in its mind Alternative Service to military service. The Committee agreed to consult branches as to whether work should be performed in prison.

The men at Keddington, who number 49, have considered the resolution of the National Committee and have forwarded a statement in reply. They point out that they have succeeded in compelling the authorities to grant them civil work by their refusal to perform military duties, and urge that in the circumstances the work they are doing cannot be classed in the same category as work given by Local or Appeal Tribunals under the Military Service Act, as an alternative to being handed over to the military authorities, "in view of the fact that those accepting such work are not called upon to stand the pressure in the hands of the military."

They argue that there is no distinction between working for the Government in prison and out of prison, and that the acceptance of work under the Home Office scheme is work which is alternative to imprisonment, and not specifically to military service. They consider that the present attitude of the National Committee is an extension of the principles of the Fellowship and of the decisions of the National Conventions, and point out that the National Conventions have never considered what attitude should be adopted with regard to employment under civil control after the C.O.'s have undergone their ordeal in the hands of the military, in detention, and in prison. They express the view that it is not likely that continuance in prison would induce the Government "to grant to every C.O. at present in or out of prison complete exemption."

Finally, the statement says, "whilst we consider the rules of absolute morality require that the individual should refuse assistance in the prosecution of war, however remote that assistance may be, yet as we have decided for the better furtherance of our cause, to remain members of a community which is engaged in war, we realise that religion and morality, as well as policy, indicate that we should render the utmost service to the community that lies in our power, always provided that in so doing we are not asked to violate the fundamental principles of our conscience .

For these reasons, while expressing its appreciation and admiration of the action of those men who cannot see their way to accept work under this scheme, adheres to its decision to continue working under it, at the same time emphasising that should any attempt be made to interfere with civil liberty outside of working hours that would be regarded as a breach of the conditions and would warrant the strongest action."

The National Committee has sent a representative to Dyce, where 250 men are stationed, to report upon the situation there. He attended a meeting at the camp, at which there was a full discussion of the position. A number of the men are frankly in favour of Alternative Service, and the remainder largely took the view expressed in the Keddington statement printed above. A resolution was unanimously passed promising that they would all return to prison if the men who had rejected the Home Office scheme suffered serious consequences.

MILITARY STRATEGY.

Scene: Somewhere in Wiltshire.

Court-martial President: I should just like to ask you one or two questions. What would you do if your mother or your sister were assaulted (etc., as usual)?

Accused C.O.: May I ask you a question?

President: No; I am asking you a question.

Accused C.O.: I can only reply by asking you what you would do if you were captured by the enemy, together with your mother and sister, and the enemy threatened to violate and murder them unless you divulged military secrets, which would ——

President: The Court is closed.

Exit C.O. abruptly with escort.

NOT OF NATIONAL IMPORTANCE

A London Branch Secretary gives us the following information about one of his members, and says with truth that it is an abominable example of the penalising purpose of alternative service and an excellent corroboration of the argument for refusing it. The member in question, who is Mr. T. F. Drayton, of Golders Green, was three months within the age limit. He had been a Post Office servant for over 26 years, and was engaged on night duty connected with registered letters and foreign mails. There was no one ready to replace him at his office, which was already grossly under-staffed. He had worked there 12 hours a night for months, and had for years been connected with social work, such as classes of telegraph boys, &c., which may now have to stop through his removal.

Humour, we are informed, rainbows the tears of the world, and the fact that the Tribunal offered Mr. Drayton work of national importance is one of those things that add to the gaiety of nations. Mr. Drayton was convinced by this treatment of the fatuity of the suggestion that alternative service is "mobilisation of the nation for efficiency," and therefore decided that he will not compromise with such a scheme. He has therefore followed the lead of the National Committee, and was handed over at Mill Hill last week.

Of National Importance.

Agriculture is an industry of some importance to the nation, particularly to the women and children, whom Lloyd George accuses us of neglecting. Perhaps that is why a young "C.O." from Wales has been shut up in prison, leaving one brother and a father nearly 70 years old to manage 1,000 acres, and no one to look after 1,400 sheep. No doubt he will, however, be invited to make a road in Suffolk.

ON THE SCENT.

Work of national importance has recently been found for police and military officials in large numbers all over the country. During the last few days officials have called, armed with search-warrants, on the following:—

Rev. R. V. Holt, Edinburgh; Rachel S. Jeffrey, Edinburgh; Rev. H. J. Dawtrey, Dundee; James Marshall, Glasgow; V. Swinton, Pontypool; B. Longstaffe, Barrow; Alan M. Laing, Liverpool; J. J. Ingham, Nelson; A. Clatworthy, Warrington; Tom Evans, Swansea Valley; Councillor H. Davies, Port Talbot; T. Mainwaring, Port Talbot; Arthur Mandefield, Leeds; Moses P. Price, Pengam; H. C. Shackleton, Keighley; Mrs. Wray, New Conisboro', Yorks; B. J. Boothroyd, Finchley; P. Millwood, Streatham; J. P. Hughes, Cardiff;; P. R. Morrison, Cardiff; Mrs. Chamberlain, Bourneville; W. A. Bond, Newton Abbott; Mr. Townley, Bristol; The Friends' Institute, Liverpool; Miss Hattrill, Portsmouth; A. W. Haycock, Manchester; and H. Davies, Tenbach.

That is the list up to the moment of going to press. The result has been the removal of quantities of pamphlets and documents relating to N.C.F. and other pacifist work. "Rex v. Russell" appeared to be most in demand.

FAME!

Millwood writes from Kingston Barracks, where he is awaiting court-martial: "The 'Tribunal,' 'Labour Leader,' and 'Herald' have a good circulation among soldiers. . . . Chappelow is very popular here, they all remember him as a singer, and all respect him. His firmness and that of other earlier ones has undoubtedly made it easier for us to maintain our position, and their good-tempered endurance of all the petty persecutions has been of great value in disarming prejudice against us. The sergeant of the guard says to all newcomers: 'You've got a C.O. in there, he's genuine he is, he's a good fellow.' (That's me.)"

Millwood was court-martialled last Thursday. In his defence he declared that he was not a soldier, as he was entitled to absolute exemption, the Tribunal having admitted the genuineness of his rejection. They had, however, suggested "arbitrary and fantastic changes of occupation," obviously as a punishment, but for him to accept them would be contemptible moral surrender.

THE CENTRAL TRIBUNAL'S CIRCULAR.

With regard to Circular R96 (Notes on further cases . . . for the information of Tribunals), which we mentioned last week, the Joint Advisory Committee of the N.C.F. and F.O.R. are sending a letter to the Prime Minister and Mr. Long protesting against the virtual annulling of the absolute exemption clause which it implies, and also to its comments upon the distinction between moral and political objections to war.

679B/12

FRIENDS AND CONSCRIPTION

NEW ZEALAND QUAKERS OBJECT TO EXCLUSIVE EXEMPTION

We print below extracts from a statement by Friends in New Zealand published in the "Maoriland Worker," of July 19.

After expressing their appreciation of the manner in which Parliament has, in recognition of the traditional anti-war principles of Friends, the signatories assert that to give the right of exemption to members of their own society while denying it to those others whose views are equally well founded with their own, is to set aside the principles they hold so dear. They state that their belief is forwarded on the Divine guidance of the Holy Spirit in the individual, irrespective of creed or church membership; that freedom from war will be brought about through the faithfulness of those individuals, of whom there are many in that country.

"Pretence of Religious Toleration."

The statement continues :—

Faithful adherence to these beliefs has brought untold sufferings in the past, and we feel that to simply exempt a few descendants of those who won for us the principle of religious liberty and the right to live in accordance with the leading of our consciences, has the effect of denying the principle which was so dearly bought, and makes a pretence of religious toleration which does not exist.

We desire a more just and equitable provision for all those who can rightfully claim a conscientious objection to war and war service.

In this behalf we would earnestly submit :—

(1) That there are usually many evidences of a true conscientious belief such as an impartial tribunal could accept as proof, but that where any doubt exists, the benefit of such should be given to the applicant—as is held to be the rule in other legal matters (e.g., criminal prosecutions).

(2) That the preservation of conscience as a recognised basis of moral conduct is of such supreme importance to every community that immeasurably greater danger exists from destroying such than from the possibility of a few dishonest applicants gaining exemption under its cloak.

Alternative Service.

In the matter of alternative service . . . we would earnestly make the following representations :—

(1) The individual alone can decide whether it be right for him to accept or reject the proffered service. No organisation can have any right to bind its members in such a matter, and no attempt is made to do so by, or on behalf of the Society of Friends.

(2) It is held by some that men who accept alternative service are genuine conscientious objectors, and that those who cannot do so are mere obstructionists. We submit that such is an absolute misjudgment of the case, and is probably due to an entire misunderstanding of the basis of the objection.

(3) The conscientious objector who takes his stand upon the Christian position in opposing all war cannot logically accept any system of militarism. He cannot be satisfied with merely safeguarding his individual person, far less with acquiescing in the establishment of the Military Service to which he is opposed, or assist in any way in the harmonious administration of militarism for other people.

He is not so much concerned with the actual nature of the service imposed as its final use and purpose. It is not merely killing to which the conscientious objector takes exception, for there are numerous duties which he could take up under such conditions in non-combatant branches of military service, but everyone is now prepared to admit that a man who objects to killing ought also to refuse to kill by proxy.

The Denial of Individuality.

War is not wrong merely because men's lives are destroyed, vital though that consideration is. It is wrong because it is the denial of the worth of the individual ,because it is the one great method by which social betterment has been retarded by engendering in the life of every nation a spirit of domination, of bitterness, and of fear. It places insuperable obstacles in the path of those whose greatest desire is the true welfare and co-operation, not only within the nation, but among the nations.

The Individual and the State.

In time of war it is useless pointing out to the conscientious objector that as a citizen he ought to accept any duty imposed upon him by the State, unless you can afford him evidence that the State has in the past, or intends in the future, to impose duties upon all its citizens for purposes of social reconstruction or peace organisation. To force good works upon men in order to administer militarism is repellent to every conscientious objector. This is so, not merely because it contributes to the establishment of militarism, but is even more deplorable because it denies the spirit of free service. Service to one's fellow-men, if it means anything, implies a spirit of sacrifice which is only worth while because it is freely given.

We have no evidence of a desire by our Government for real National Service other than Military Service, and the only thing attempted so far has been the infliction of punishment for refusal to do what one knows to be wrong.

The natural alternative to Military Service is Civil Service, yet the avenues of Civil Service are deliberately closed to those who cannot take part in Military Work. Under the Defence Act, the natural alternative to training for Military Service would have been training for Civil Service, yet again the avenues of training were deliberately closed against those boys who objected to militarism, even though their work and energy had gained for them right to free places in secondary schools.

Of Inestimable Value.

We claim that the life service of every conscientious man in his ordinary avocation is of inestimable value to the nation; that to remove him from such work as he has taken up from a sense of vocation or special fitness and placing him in some other sphere for the sake of punishment for right-doing is a most disastrous policy.

Lord Roberts, speaking in the House of Lords on July 6, 1914, referring to the soldiers and men of Ulster, said : "It is useless at such a juncture to invoke the authority of the constitution, to raise fine points of law, or to threaten pains and penalties. Such things matter not one jot when men's consciences are aroused."

Surely if such an eminent militarist can recognise claims of conscience as supreme in a political issue of that nature, such claims in matters of basic religious principles held by Christians for nineteen centuries cannot be ignored.

Signed at Wellington on behalf of Auckland, Wellington, Hawkes Bay, and Taranaki Friends (10/7/1916): ALFRED GOLDSBURY, Clerk, Wanganui; JOHN HOLDSWORTH, Swarthmoor, Havelock North, H.B.; MARGARET HOLDSWORTH, ERNEST H. WRIGHT, Auckland; EDWARD H. DOWSETT, Birkenhead, Auckland; E. J. FLEWELLYN KING, Grey's Road, Hastings; WILLIAM H. GILLIVER, Urenui; EGERTON GILL, Auckland; JOHN RIGG, Wellington.

THE CONSCRIPTIONIST ETHIC.

The Morning Post very candidly reveals an interesting element of the doctrine which attaches to the Conscriptionist ideal. The Belfast correspondent of the journal states that a recruiting rally in Ulster has met continually with the demand for conscription, and adds that this undoubtedly represents the thoughts of many young men throughout the district, and is the genuine demand of the vast majority of eligible men. He not only quotes instances of individual men who say that they would join if the other men would, but also states that Ulster as a whole would do better in recruiting if the other three provinces would do their share. Presumably, then, it is not inconsistent with the "patriot's" philosophy that you need not do your duty unless your next door neighbour does his. The correspondent admits that in an ideal world this way of looking at things would not exist, but he thinks that it is sufficiently logical and excusable to justify the establishment of militarism in Ireland.

Why Don't Those Irish Enlist?

The "Morning Post" states that Sir Edward Carson has lately frequently urged the extension of compulsion to Ireland, and that the exclusion is causing increasing anger on this side. That journal also observes that because there is no compulsion, Irish regiments have to be filled up very largely from England and Scotland.

Other people, not on the staff of the "Morning Post," might be able to suggest some other reason why Irishmen do not rush in their thousands to the English flag.

"I tell you there is something splendid in the man that will not always mind. Why, if we had done as the kings told us five hundred years ago we should have all been slaves. If we had done as the priest told us we should all have been idiots. If we had done as the doctors told us we would all have been dead. We have been saved by disobedience. We have been saved by that splendid thing called independence, and I want to see more of it, I want to see children raised so that they will have it."

—INGERSOLL.

"He that loses his Conscience has nothing left that is worth losing."—Izaak Walton (Essays).

Printed for the No-Conscription Fellowship, 8 Merton House, Salisbury Court, Fleet Street, E.C., by the National Labour Press, Ltd., 74 Swinton Street, London, W.C.; and at Manchester

Birmingham Post. 21/1/16

Daily News & Leader. 5.10.16

679 B

POINTS BEFORE THE TRIBUNALS.

WOMEN WORKERS ON THE LAND.

At the Mid-Staffordshire Appeal Tribunal at Stafford, yesterday, the question of employing women workers on the land was raised in the case of a farmer in the Stafford district, whose application for the retention of a man of military age, the only one employed on the farm, was adjourned at the last sitting of the Tribunal in order that he might apply to Mr. J. C. Rushton, the County Council instructor in agriculture, who was associated with the War Agricultural Committee, for a woman to assist him on the farm, and thus release the man for military service.

A letter was read from Mr. Rushton, stating that the women who had undergone training at the Harper Adams College had specified the kind of work they wished to do on farms. The others whose names were on the list had not had any experience, but were anxious to take a course of instruction. About 150 women who had given their names to the village registrars of the Women's Farm Labour Sub-committee could only be looked upon as willing to perform supplementary labour in their own districts, and in many cases they could only spare a few hours a day occasionally. In some districts, he added, the women who promised to work on farms when the canvass was made refused to do so when the necessity arose.

The case was further adjourned for a month, to enable the farmer to make further enquiries.

Brighton Advertiser. 7.10.1916

BETTER THAN NOTHING."

Women and Farm Work.

WHAT CHAILEY TRIBUNAL THINKS.

"I don't say that women are as good as men, but they are a good deal better than nothing," remarked Mr. E. C. Knight to the employer of Frank George Mainwood, 31, market garden labourer, of Newick, when his claim for exemption was heard at the Chailey Tribunal on Monday.

The employer had stated that he had occasionally employed women on his 5-acre market garden, but there was hard work which they could not do. He himself was 70 years of age and could do very little.

"You will have to employ women if your man goes," observed Mr. Knight.

The Tribunal disallowed the claim.

WHAT EMPLOYERS MUST DO.

In the case of Dennis Arthur Elphick, 18, station delivery hand and churn washer, Fletching Common, employed by the Mid-Sussex Dairy Company, of Sheffield Park, the manager, Mr. F. Watson, stated that Elphick was engaged to replace two men who had joined the colours, and the present depleted staff was helped out by casual labour in the evenings—including two plateplayers. Elphick had to handle 40 churns of milk—each weighing 2 cwt.—daily. He added that the youth was the only one of three sons left at home to support his widowed mother, the others being at the Front.

Captain Ash suggested that a man could be procured on applying to the Discharged Soldiers Committee.

Answering questions, Mr. Watson admitted that he had not advertised for a man, and Captain Ash retorted, "I maintain that employers must advertise, so that these young sters, who should be doing military service might be replaced."

The claim was disallowed, the military agreeing not to call the man up until November 2

BARCOMBE FARMER'S CLAIM.

Mr. Harry Geering, of Barcombe, sought exemption for Robert George Moulds, 18, carter, Godley's Green, North Common, Chailey, who was, he said, one of two carters on two farms, where the work was very much behind.

The case was adjourned till January 29 next, by which date Moulds will be 18 years 7 months old.

FARM WORK IN ARREARS.

Captain Wright, of Chailey, asked for the cancellation of the words "non-renewable" on the certificates of temporary exemption held by two employees—Arthur Turner, carter, and Thomas Elphick, farm labourer—urging that the shortage of labour was seriously affecting the work of the farm, crops being late and poor in quality, and that the land was full of weeds and thistles.

It was agreed to withdraw the word "final," and to allow the employer to renew his application, the men meanwhile to go before the Medical Board.

THE ONLY TWO LEFT.

In the case of Joseph Smith, 33, carter, Trevor Gardens, Beddingham, the employer, Mr. H. Moore, said he had only this carter and his son left on a farm of 100 acres. His other sons were fighting in France.

Three months' temporary exemption was granted.

WOULD HAVE TO SELL UP.

Conditional exemption was granted [illegible]

THE DEMAND FOR MORE MEN

TIGHTENING THE TRIBUNALS.

Report of Man-Power Distribution Board.

The Man-Power Distribution Board have heard evidence tendered on behalf of the Board of Admiralty, the Army Council, the Ministry of Munitions, and certain other Government Departments.

It has been proved to the Board that fresh supplies of men are urgently needed for the armies and munition factories, in order to maintain our forces in the field at the numbers already fixed for them, and, at the same time, to maintain the supply of munitions essential for their equipment and proper utilisation.

The Board reserve for further consideration the questions of agricultural labour and of the excepted and certified occupations.

The present report deals only with other industrial and non-manual workers.

The Board direct:

(1) That no badge certificates shall be issued to men:

- (a) Who have already been de-certificated by a Government Department;
- (b) Whose cases are pending before Tribunals;
- (c) To whom Tribunals have refused exemptions;
- (d) To whom Tribunals have given temporary exemptions;
- (e) Already under notice to join the Army.

(2) That where a certificate has been withdrawn, the date of withdrawal and the number of the certificate should be endorsed on the man's registration card.

(3) That all men made available for the Army in pursuance of these decisions should be enrolled as soon as the law permits.

CLAIMS OF MUNITIONS.

(4) As there is urgent need for highly skilled men of certain trades, it shall be open to the Ministry of Munitions to claim the services of men of these trades included in the above order. On receipt of such a claim from the Ministry of Munitions, the military authorities shall at once transfer the men claimed to a special class of skilled men, unless they are immediately required for service in an equally skilled capacity in the Army, provided always that the men so transferred undertake while in this special class the obligation already voluntarily undertaken by the War Munition Volunteers to work under civilian conditions in whatever place the Ministry requires their services.

(5) The Board draw the attention of all Tribunals to these decisions. They desire to impress on Tribunals that they should:

- (a) Continue to give the most careful consideration in every case before granting exemptions;
- (b) Avoid extending (except in cases of urgent necessity) the existing temporary exemptions, of which there are at present nearly 400,000 in existence; and
- (c) Expedite the settlement of outstanding applications and the hearing of appeals, of which 200,000 are pending.

IMPERFECT DILUTION.

(6) The Board observe that the process of dilution has been very unequally carried out in different districts and in different works. They have directed the special attention of the authorities concerned to this subject. The Board regard the carrying forward of this process of dilution as of the utmost importance. It is the only method by which an extension of the age for compulsory service can be avoided. The Board have requested the Board of Trade and the Labour Adviser to his Majesty's Government to confer with employers and trade union leaders as to the extension of the practice of dilution to firms engaged wholly or partially on private work so as to set free skilled men thus engaged for munitions work. It is essential that a large part of the labour now engaged on private work should be diverted to Government orders or released for the Army.

(7) The Board have under consideration further steps to secure the release of young men and for the better organisation and extended use of women and men over military age.

(8) The Board have also under consideration further measures for the release of men of military age in Government Departments.

By order of the Board,

[illegible] SANDFORD FAIRCHILD.

SIR W. ROBERTSON STATES THE CASE.

We Shall Want All Who Can be Spared.

The unveiling of a village cross at Dalderby, Lincolnshire, which has sent 72.7 per cent. of its eligible manhood to the Army, provided the occasion for an arresting and confident speech by Sir William Robertson, Chief of the Imperial General Staff. He began by complimenting the village on having established a county record, and referring to the fact that he was himself a Lincolnshire man.

He went on to describe from what small beginnings our present armies had developed. He spoke of the splendid six divisions who fought at Mons, Le Cateau, and turned from the Marne to thrust back the enemy to the Aisne. Their story would go down through history for all time. By all the rules of war they were beaten divisions a few days after they came in contact with the enemy. But they were not beaten, and never had been. Let them think of the number of divisions we had now put in the field, brought into being solely and entirely through the energy and foresight of that great soldier, Lord Kitchener, who had done as much as any man to win the war for the Empire.

NO NEED FOR ANXIETY.

"From whatever point of view you look at the situation to-day," added Sir William Robertson, "you can do so without anxiety. (Cheers.) Not only have we got men—I do not say enough—but thanks to the men and women of this country we have got artillery and ammunition. The Army thanks the men and women of this country for what they have done in this respect. We have got guns and ammunition—plenty of the big ammunition that is known at the front as 'Lloyd George's specials.' (Cheers.) I think we can look forward with every confidence. I do that also because of the splendid spirit that prevails at the front, where you must go for the best judges of our prospects of winning.

"Notwithstanding this, in order not to create a false impression, I would like to add a serious note of warning. The end is not yet. We must be prepared to go on for a period of time which it is impossible to estimate. 'Prepare for the worst and hope for the best' is a good motto. We have yet a long way to go, and we must be ready to go all the way. 'Fight to a finish' is the order. (Cheers.)

"Therefore there must be no slackening off; on the contrary, there must be a great tightening up. We have adopted the principle of national service in theory; we must see to it that we put that principle into practice. We have done a lot, and I think we can do more. We want men, more men. We want them now, and in due course we shall want all men who can be spared. That is a very difficult question to settle. This war is not purely a military business. There are many considerations which enter into the case. This is of course a Government question.

EVERY MAN AND EVERY WOMAN.

"It would be improper for me to discuss it, but I am entitled to say that we are not justified in expecting to win this war unless the services of every man and woman in this country are utilised to the fullest possible extent. (Cheers.) A full day's work is demanded from every man and woman, old and young, on the farm, in the factory, wherever you like, in order to liberate as many men as possible to go out and support those gallant fellows at the front. For this I look to women to help. I have great faith in the women. I will not advise them how to do it, because they know their own business best. The women by universal consent have done splendidly in this war, and have shown splendid fortitude in times of anxiety, sorrow, and bereavement, and they have worked hard, too.

"We are also dependent to some extent on employers of labour and on local authorities to send us men. I hope that they realise their responsibilities.

"I would urge them and all concerned to see to it that the Army does not fall short of the men it needs in order to win this war in such a way as will secure to us such a peace as will compensate us, so far as that is possible, for the great sacrifices which have been so readily made by the fathers and mothers, sons and daughters, of our Empire.

"I have stated the case, and I leave it in your hands. This cross which has been so deservedly won must be a great incentive to further practical and personal

Leighton Advertiser
7.10.1916

BETTER THAN NOTHING."

Women and Farm Work.

WHAT CHAILEY TRIBUNAL THINKS.

"I don't say that women are as good as men, but they are a good deal better than nothing," remarked Mr. E. C. Knight to the employer of Frank George Mainwood, 31, market garden labourer, of Newick, when his claim for exemption was heard at the Chailey Tribunal on Monday.

The employer had stated that he had occasionally employed women on his 5-acre market garden, but there was hard work which they could not do. He himself was 70 years of age and could do very little.

"You will have to employ women if your man goes," observed Mr. Knight.

The Tribunal disallowed the claim.

WHAT EMPLOYERS MUST DO.

In the case of Dennis Arthur Elphick, 18, station delivery hand and churn washer, Fletching Common, employed by the Mid-Sussex Dairy Company, of Sheffield Park, the manager, Mr. F. Watson, stated that Elphick was engaged to replace two men who had joined the colours, and the present depleted staff was helped out by casual labour in the evenings—including two plateplayers. Elphick had to handle 40 churns of milk—each weighing 2 cwt.—daily. He added that the youth was the only one of three sons left at home to support his widowed mother, the others being at the Front.

Captain Ash suggested that a man could be procured on applying to the Discharged Soldiers Committee.

Answering questions, Mr. Watson admitted that he had not advertised for a man, and Captain Ash retorted, "I maintain that employers must advertise, so that these young sters, who should be doing military service might be replaced."

The claim was disallowed, the military agreeing not to call the man up until November 2

BARCOMBE FARMER'S CLAIM.

Mr. Harry Geering, of Barcombe, sought exemption for Robert George Moulds, 18, carter, Godley's Green, North Common, Chailey, who was, he said, one of two carters on two farms, where the work was very much behind.

The case was adjourned till January 29 next, by which date Moulds will be 18 years 7 months old.

FARM WORK IN ARREARS.

Captain Wright, of Chailey, asked for the cancellation of the words "non-renewable" on the certificates of temporary exemption held by two employees—Arthur Turner, carter, and Thomas Elphick, farm labourer—urging that the shortage of labour was seriously affecting the work of the farm, crops being late and poor in quality, and that the land was full of weeds and thistles.

It was agreed to withdraw the word "final," and to allow the employer to renew his application, the men meanwhile to go before the Medical Board.

THE ONLY TWO LEFT.

In the case of Joseph Smith, 33, carter, Trevor Gardens, Beddingham, the employer, Mr. G. Moore, said he had only this carter and his son left on a farm of 100 acres. His other sons were fighting in France.

Three months' temporary exemption was granted.

WOULD HAVE TO SELL UP.

Conditional exemption was granted Ernest Dennis, 33, farmer, of Court Gard Farm, Ditchling, who said he farmed a owned 200 acres, and that to be called up wo mean that he would have to sell his crops a stock, because there was no one he co leave in charge

AWAITING A CERTIFICATE.

The case of Frederick William Paris, farm carter, Firle, was adjourned for the duction of a medical certificate, the em having written that since the previous cation the man had been medically rej

The members present at the Tribuna Mr. Harry Scarlett (in the chair), th H. S. Musgrave, Major Towers Clark, Mi Knight and Mr. J. Woolland, with Patrick (clerk). Mr. A. Wadman represented the Board of Agriculture, and the military representatives were Captain Selby Ash, R.N., and Mr. F. W. Rubie.

The present report deals only with industrial and non-manual workers.

The Board direct:

(1) That no badge certificates shall be issued to men:

(a) Who have already been de-certificated by a Government Department;

(b) Whose cases are pending before Tribunals;

(c) To whom Tribunals have refused exemptions;

(d) To whom Tribunals have given temporary exemptions;

(e) Already under notice to join the Army.

(2) That where a certificate has been withdrawn, the date of withdrawal and the number of the certificate should be endorsed on the man's registration card.

(3) That all men made available for the Army in pursuance of these decisions should be enrolled as soon as the law permits.

CLAIMS OF MUNITIONS.

(4) As there is urgent need for highly skilled men of certain trades, it shall be open to the Ministry of Munitions to claim the services of men of these trades included in the above order. On receipt of such a claim from the Ministry of Munitions, the military authorities shall at once transfer the men claimed to a special class of skilled men, unless they are immediately required for service in an equally skilled capacity in the Army, provided always that the men so transferred undertake while in this special class the obligation already voluntarily undertaken by the War Munition Volunteers to work under civilian conditions in whatever place the Ministry requires their services.

(5) The Board draw the attention of all Tribunals to these decisions. They desire to impress on Tribunals that they should:

(a) Continue to give the most careful consideration in every case before granting exemptions;

(b) Avoid extending (except in cases of urgent necessity) the existing temporary exemptions, of which there are at present nearly 400,000 in existence; and

(c) Expedite the settlement of outstanding applications and the hearing of appeals, of which 200,000 are pending.

IMPERFECT DILUTION.

(6) The Board observe that the process of dilution has been very unequally carried out in different districts and in different works. They have directed the special attention of the authorities concerned to this subject. The Board regard the carrying forward of this process of dilution as of the utmost importance. It is the only method by which an extension of the age for compulsory service can be avoided. The Board have requested the Board of Trade and the Labour Adviser to his Majesty's Government to confer with employers and trade union leaders as to the extension of the practice of dilution to firms engaged wholly or partially on private work so as to set free skilled men thus engaged for munitions work. It is essential that a large part of the labour now engaged on private work should be diverted to Government orders or released for the Army.

(7) The Board have under consideration further steps to secure the release of young men and for the better organisation and extended use of women and men over military age.

(8) The Board have also under consideration further measures for the release of men of military age in Government Departments.

By order of the Board,
E. A. SANDFORD FAWCETT,
Secretary.

Sept. 29, 1916.

Approved and ordered to be published.
By order of the War Committee,
M. P. A. HANKEY, Secretary.

Oct. 3, 1916.

WOMEN'S WAR WORK.

Its Extension Essential for Victory.

The multifarious occupations in which women are now serving in order to liberate men for the Army are indicated in a remarkable publication issued by the War Office for the information and guidance more especially of military representatives and chairmen of Tribunals when they have to decide on questions of "indispensability."

The value and interest of the book are enhanced by a series of illustrations of women at work in agriculture, in the factory, on munition work, in the shipbuilding yard, on the road, and in the retail shop, some of which have already appeared in "The Daily News." Among them are photographs of women in a shipyard working on a propeller, others handling long steel bars and heavy rods and pipes. One shows a woman stoker at the furnace mouth of a large factory in South London.

The Adjutant-General speaks of the "impossibility of forecasting in any degree the extent to which the resources of the Empire may be taxed before the war is brought to a successful conclusion. It is only by amplifying and extending the scope of women's usefulness," he says, "that our country can hope to emerge victorious from a struggle without parallel in her history." The book is offered as a tribute to the effective contribution of women to the common cause as well as an indication of the way in which man-power may be released for its most effective use.

sions a few days after they came in contact with the enemy. But they were not beaten, and never had been. Let them think of the number of divisions we had now put in the field, brought into being solely and entirely through the energy and foresight of that great soldier, Lord Kitchener, who had done as much as any man to win the war for the Empire.

NO NEED FOR ANXIETY.

"From whatever point of view you look at the situation to-day," added Sir William Robertson, "you can do so without anxiety. (Cheers.) Not only have we got men—I do not say enough—but thanks to the men and women of this country we have got artillery and ammunition. The Army thanks the men and women of this country for what they have done in this respect. We have got guns and ammunition—plenty of the big ammunition that is known at the front as 'Lloyd George's specials.' (Cheers.) I think we can look forward with every confidence. I do that also because of the splendid spirit that prevails at the front, where you must go for the best judges of our prospects of winning.

"Notwithstanding this, in order not to create a false impression, I would like to add a serious note of warning. The end is not yet. We must be prepared to go on for a period of time which it is impossible to estimate. 'Prepare for the worst and hope for the best' is a good motto. We have yet a long way to go, and we must be ready to go all the way. 'Fight to a finish' is the order. (Cheers.)

"Therefore there must be no slackening off; on the contrary, there must be a great tightening up. We have adopted the principle of national service in theory; we must see to it that we put that principle into practice. We have done a lot, and I think we can do more. We want men, more men. We want them now, and in due course we shall want all men who can be spared. That is a very difficult question to settle. This war is not purely a military business. There are many considerations which enter into the case. This is of course a Government question.

EVERY MAN AND EVERY WOMAN.

"It would be improper for me to discuss it, but I am entitled to say that we are not justified in expecting to win this war unless the services of every man and woman in this country are utilised to the fullest possible extent. (Cheers.) A full day's work is demanded from every man and woman, old and young, on the farm, in the factory, wherever you like, in order to liberate as many men as possible to go out and support those gallant fellows at the front. For this I look to women to help. I have great faith in the women. I will not advise them how to do it, because they know their own business best. The women by universal consent have done splendidly in this war, and have shown splendid fortitude in times of anxiety, sorrow, and bereavement, and they have worked hard, too.

"We are also dependent to some extent on employers of labour and on local authorities to send us men. I hope that they realise their responsibilities.

"I would urge them and all concerned to see to it that the Army does not fall short of the men it needs in order to win this war in such a way as will secure to us such a peace as will compensate us, so far as that is possible, for the great sacrifices which have been so readily made by the fathers and mothers, sons and daughters, of our Empire.

"I have stated the case, and I leave it in your hands. This cross which has been so deservedly won must be a great incentive to further practical and personal effort to continue the prosecution of this war, which for the sake of the Empire, for the sake of our gallant Allies, and in the interests of humanity and civilisation we are bound to carry through. With God's help and with unswerving determination on our own part we can, and we will, carry it through to a victorious end." (Cheers.)

Sheffield Independent.
11.10.16

L[illegible] REQUIREMENTS.

Doncaster Tribunal Decisions in Agricultural Cases.

Doncaster Rural Tribunal, yesterday, Mr. W. H. Chambers presiding, heard 18 applications for exemption, and nine by the military for review. The Clerk (Mr H. M. Marshall) drew attention to the circular from the Local Government Board, intimating that the calling to the colours of men employed on agriculture is deferred to 1 January, or to 1 April in cases of men whose time is necessary for the maintenance of milk production.

Regarding men in agriculture whose temporary exemptions will expire before 1 January, Captain Featherston, the recruiting officer, pointed out that not only had such men an opportunity of appealing again, but of appealing within seven days of receiving their calling-up papers if still in a certified occupation.

Farm Hands' Exemptions.

The Tribunal granted exemption to 31 December to all men engaged in farm work, except in two cases, where conditional exemption was allowed.

A house painter and decorator who asked for a further exemption for two men said he had a lot of work in hand, including some which had been waiting since 1914.

Captain Featherston: What is to hinder them waiting until after the war? It is not work of national importance, is it?—No, it is only temporary.

Captain Featherston: The war is only temporary, and the sooner we get the men the sooner we shall be able to finish it.

The application being refused, the man remarked that some of his neighbours had single men who had not been touched. A Member: We'll touch them up.

Woman's Possibilities.

The youngest of four brothers who work a farm appealed, and the Clerk said this was one of those cases that people talked about in the market place, saying the Tribunal let four brothers off on one farm.

Applicant said they were behind with their work, and were engaged practically night and day. Given to 31 December.

Among the cases for review was that of an assistant overseer and clerk to a parish council, who, it was claimed, was indispensable. He put in two days a week, it was said, as assistant overseer, and collected the rates, and attended six meetings of the parish council in a year.

Captain Featherstone asked whether it was not possible for a woman to do the work, and on receiving a reply that "it would take some doing," said it was being done in hundreds of parishes. It was admitted that no provision had been made to fill the position. The exemption was withdrawn.

The Tribunal in other cases confirmed their decisions, and Captain Featherston remarked that some of them would be taken to the Appeal Tribunal.

ADMISSION OF WOMEN AS MILL TWISTERS.

At the Accrington Tribunal yesterday, when a cotton manufacturer asked for exemption for a twister and drawer, aged 19, the view was strongly expressed by members of the Tribunal that the men's union should permit women to learn the work. Hitherto the union had rigidly excluded women.

Captain Harwood, the military representative, stated that in American mills all twisting was done by women. Final postponement to the end of January was granted.

Yorkshire Observer.
24/10/16

WOMEN TRAM DRIVERS AT KEIGHLEY

At a sitting of the Keighley Tribunal yesterday Mr. J. Longton presided, and Mr. J. F. Greenwood represented the military authorities in the absence of Mr. J. W. Morkill, who is indisposed.

The Borough Electrical Engineer (Mr. Harry Webber) applied for exemption for a clerk in the Electricity Department who had twice been rejected. He did the whole of the clerical work at the Electricity Works, it was stated, with the assistance of a girl and a boy. One clerk who was quite fit had joined the Army, and it would be very difficult to replace the man without serious extra work on the Engineer's shoulders. Exemption was given until January 1.

Mr. Webber also appeared to support the applications for five drivers employed by the Tramways Committee. Asked if it was impossible to find substitutes, Mr. Webber said he was convinced that they could train women for this work, but they would have the same trouble they had had in London when women drivers were put on. The men went on strike. The society was "dead against this."

The Chairman: Will that apply in Keighley?—Mr. Webber: If we could get the union to agree we should start women drivers.

Mr. Liddemore: You cannot be sure that these men will come out on strike.—I am only instancing what the union is doing.

Canon Russell: How long would it take you to train women as drivers?—About a fortnight. Keighley is the simplest place in the country in which to run a tramcar.

The cases were adjourned in order that the men might have an opportunity to present personal claims.

In one case Mr. Foster (secretary to the military representative) suggested that Mr. Liddemore, as a practical engineer, should visit one firm in order that the tribunal could ascertain the nature of the work being done by particular men.

Mr. Liddemore suggested that an engineer from outside the district should come to Keighley, and a Keighley man make the inspection elsewhere. He did not quite like the idea of having it said that he was responsible for a particular man being made a soldier.

On the motion of Canon Russell it was decided that Mr. Liddemore, Mr. Murgatroyd, and Mr. Redman, three members of the tribunal with experience in engineering, should make the inspection.

Grocer Review.
21/11/16

Women in Grocers' Shops.—Mr. Henry Brierley, the Registrar of the Wigan County Court, and military representative, when exemption was asked for the manager of a grocery shop, said he did not think it was in the national interest that a man should be kept in a grocer's shop at all, adding that grocers should get women. The tribunal thought differently and granted exemption until February 10.

1B

15

Birmingham Post
30-1-17

OBJECTION TO WOMEN LABOUR IN SALT TRADE.

At Droitwich Tribunal yesterday there were several cases in which the military appealed for the withdrawal of the certificates of saltmakers in the employ of the Salt Union. In the course of the hearings Captain Glanfield remarked that years ago women were employed in salt pans, and suggested that the practice might be revived.

Mr. Tom Young (manager of the salt works) explained that to do the work it would be necessary for the women to work stripped to the waist, and although the practice prevailed up to thirty years ago, his directors felt that they would be prepared to close down the works rather than the practice should be revived. The Factory Acts prevented the employment of women on the night shifts.

The Tribunal granted conditional exemption for the men pending substitution.

Financial Times
3.2.17

WOMEN AS TEA TASTERS.

Harrisons and Crosfield and Twining appealed yesterday at the House of Commons Tribunal for permission to retain the services of a tea blender and taster.

Mr. Frampton, who appeared for the company, mentioned that they had originally three men employed in this work, but one had been called up, the second was over 55, and the man for whom application was made was 34 years of age and classified B1.

The Chairman (Mr. Donald Maclean, M.P.) pointed out that it was difficult to grant exemption in the case of a man so young and classified B1. He admitted that his retention was a matter of some interest to the public, but the Tribunal were bound to balance the conflicting interests of the public and the Army, and in the present case the balance was with the Army.

As illustrating the long training which was required for the work, a member of the firm mentioned that the taste of tea varied with the waters used.

Mr. Maclean: Yes, we unfortunately know that.

A member of the Tribunal suggested that women might be employed in the work, but the director said he had never heard of one in the trade. They might be successful as tasters, but a very long experience was required for blending.

Mr. Maclean: Very well, we will give you an opportunity of trying, and grant you a postponement in this case till 1st April.

Yorkshire Post
13-4-17

FEMALE LABOUR: DARLINGTON MAYOR'S WARNING.

Yesterday, at the Darlington Tribunal, attention was drawn to the advisability of engaging female labour wherever possible. "I want it to be thoroughly understood by those who come here," said the Mayor, "that unless some attempt is made to get woman labour it must be a factor when we give our decision that this has not been done." During the hearing of an application in respect of a market gardener of 18 the father admitted that he had no woman in the garden, and that he had not attempted to get one. The youth was ordered to join up.

Daily Mail
23-6-17

WOMEN COMPOSITORS.

A TRIBUNAL QUESTION.

At the Somerset County Tribunal yesterday Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons, printers, Bath, appealing for a monotype keyboard operator, said they had been informed that the Typographical Society objected to women in the composing-room.

Mr. Tanner, a member of the tribunal and head of a printing firm at Frome, said this was eminently women's work. "Has the society," he asked, "threatened to remove the men if girls are allowed to do this work?" The manager said that was so.

The military representative said it would be quite as reasonable for the Army to strike because women are employed behind the lines. He regarded such a threat as a criminal offence on the part of trade unionists.

Case adjourned to enable the military representative to report to the authorities.

Manchester Guardian.
31. 8. '18

679

A Hard Sentence.

A NINETEEN-YEAR-OLD girl clerk in the employment of the Stepney Tribunal has been sentenced to a month in the second division on a charge of forging the signature of the clerk to the tribunal to exemption forms. The "forgery" consisted in picking up a rubber stamp which was left accessible, and with it stamping forms which lay loose in large quantities in the office. The girl was cajoled into this disastrous folly by presents of chocolate from young men anxious to evade the army. Prosecuting counsel mentioned the youth and inexperience of the girl and the excellence of her record in other respects, and suggested that imprisonment was too hard a sentence. Justice would have been better served had the magistrate agreed with him. The war has compelled the employment of a great number of young girls in responsible posts. There has been little complaint of their earnestness or capacity, but obviously a special responsibility for supervision falls on their employers. It would appear in this case to have been gravely lacking. The forms and stamp were left unguarded, and though the girl was warned of the danger of encouraging the overtures of applicants, no systematic attempt seems to have been made, until too late, to conduct the office business on reasonably safe and efficient lines. A month's imprisonment is an oppressive punishment for an offence committed by an inexperienced girl for which the carelessness of her seniors seems in large measure to blame.

Machinery Market
16. 5. 19.

679

* * *

An interesting point relating to the remuneration of women workers arose recently in connexion with an arbitration claim. Before the signing of the armistice, women were employed by a Manchester firm on the soldering of tin tubes for six-pounder case shot, their total weekly wage being 37s. 6d. On the completion of the Government contracts in December notices were posted at the works that the firm was compelled to give notice to their employees, and that application might be made for re-engagement on civil work. The women were all discharged, and about twenty were, after an interval, re-engaged. The work now carried on is tin box-making for commercial purposes, which the firm claimed before the Arbitration Court is less exacting and required less skill than munition work. The rates of pay for this work vary from 23s. 10d. to 30s. a week of 47 hours, the firm having paid the minimum rate fixed by a trade board for this class of work. The Court decided that the prescribed rate of pay for the workpeople concerned is that fixed under orders of the trade board for the tin box trade.

Iron & Coal Trades Review
Jan. 30. 1920

Women on Repetition Work.

The Halifax Munitions Tribunal has given its decision in the case of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers against Messrs. Smith, Barker & Willson, machine tool makers, of Ovenden, Halifax, who were summoned for breaches of the Restoration of Pre-war Practices Act by continuing to employ female labour in turning, fitting, and slotting operations, which before the war were done by skilled labour or apprentices. The main defence was that the practice of employing women was not in consequence of the war, but owing to standardisation making the work of a repetitive character. The tribunal consider that the former practice was departed from in consequence of the war, but, believing that the respondents acted in good faith, they imposed a modified penalty of £50. Notice of appeal was given.

Iron & Coal Trades Review
5. 3. 20

Women in Engineering Works.

Mr. Justice Roche, sitting in the King's Bench Division, on Friday last, delivered his reserved judgment in the Munitions Tribunal appeal of Messrs. Smith, Barker & Wilson, machine tool manufacturers, of Halifax, against a decision of the Halifax Tribunal in favour of A. Taylor, district organising delegate of the Amalgamated Society of Engineers.

His Lordship said the complaint was that the appellants employed women to do work done before the war by men, thereby, it was alleged, infringing the Pre-War Practices Act, 1919. The local Tribunal held that the only evidence that could be considered was that which related to the appellants' own establishment, finding on the facts that during the war the appellants were employing women, and were still doing so, and they therefore found the complaint established. The appellants said the words used, "rule, practice, or custom obtaining before the war in any industry or branch industry," were only intended to describe the rule, practice, or custom of some general application.

His Lordship arrived at the conclusion that the decision under review could not be supported, and must be quashed. For the respondent the argument put forward on Sub-Section 2 of the Act was ill-founded. Objection was taken before the Tribunal that respondent was not in order, because he produced no written authority to act. But the Tribunal were satisfied with his evidence, and the point was not seriously argued to the contrary. There was a more substantial point. It appeared that no member of the A.S.E. was at the time of the complaint in the appellants' employment, and that therefore the union was not affected and had no locus standi. He was satisfied from other findings of the Tribunal that the A.S.E. was concerned in this matter by reason of the general interest of its members. This judgment did not dispose of the matter which was put before the Tribunal. It merely quashed the order made, and the matter would be remitted to the local Tribunal for further hearing and determination.

Mr. Carr (for the appellants) asked for costs, but under the circumstances his Lordship refused.

Women's Leader
12. 3. 20

The Status of Sewing Machine Workers.

The Glasgow Munitions Tribunal has decided that the women working in Singer's sewing machine factory are eligible for the rise of five shillings per week awarded to "women workers in engineering shops and foundries." In their opinion "the nature of an establishment is determined not by the class of people who work in it, but by the nature of the work done in it." This should do something to check the common tendency to give low rates for work, not because it is unskilled or light work, but because women do it. The complaint which called forth this pronouncement was made at the instance of Mr. Robert Climie of the Workers' Union, on behalf of the female workers of Singer's.

Pall Mall Gazette 6/2/16.

COMPULSORY SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

MANY SUPPORTERS FOR MISS MAY BATEMAN.

We have received a number of letters from correspondents with reference to Miss May Bateman's article which appeared in Saturday's "Pall Mall Gazette" on "Compulsory Service for Women," from which it is evident that she has the support of a considerable number of the members of her sex.

Among the communications are the following:—

To the Editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette."

True Sacrifice.

Sir,—Having advocated compulsory service for men, surely we should not expect to be exempt when our turn comes, and I warmly endorse Miss Bateman's article on compulsory service for women if necessary, not so much because women are unwilling to serve their country, but in the hope that an organized scheme for apportioning work suitable to individuals might result in the employment of vast numbers only too willing to work for the nation's good, but for whose energies nothing seems forthcoming.

Method on the lines suggested by Miss Bateman would rake in hands now folded in compulsory idleness. There is scarcely a woman in England of any age who could not do something, if it were only her own housework so far as possible through this time of stress, releasing strong young arms for heavier burdens.

If capable of the more strenuous work vital to England at present, artist, novelist, poet, dreamer, should all be willing to sacrifice themselves, lay their art aside and do anything that will help to win the war.

Women have come forward grandly, but those who are confessedly "having the time of their lives" should remember that that will not count for righteousness, that tram-conducting and ticket-clipping may present more attractions than work on the land, but that true sacrifice for country lies rather in doing what we don't like than what we like, and, moreover, doing it with a smile.

Rose Ch. de Crespigny.

Artillery-mansions, Westminster.

A Great Asset to Woman.

Sir,—After carefully reading Miss Bateman's able article on "Compulsory Service for Women," one feels it must be answered by the womanhood of the nation in a great burst of acclamation.

If this movement can be kept free from any taint of political desires or aims in the future it would be of the greatest value in throwing into a practical form all the overlapping voluntary workers already "doing their bit," and bringing into line their sisters who are not awake to the country's call.

On the land there is little that is beyond the strength of a perfectly healthy woman (given the aid of modern machinery, steam and electric). The old-fashioned plough is too heavy, but what is to hinder any girl with average brains driving a motor-plough or motor-reaper?

The greatest asset to the girl going on the land is the boundless store of health she will gain. In all the other directions indicated in Miss Bateman's clarion call to women there is that rarest of all commodities in our sex—common sense.

(Miss) Vida R. Sinclair,
Hon. Press Sec., E.V.A.C., Empress Club.

Scheme Not Difficult.

Sir,—I quite agree with Miss Bateman as to compulsory service for women. As we have all been registered, there should be no difficulty in finding out those who are really capable of working.

M. Wilton.

33, Chesham-place, S.W.

System Wanted.

Sir,—The interesting article raises a question which many women will be glad to see discussed.

That they are willing to work and to make the minor sacrifice of their leisure and comfort for their country, in addition to the greatest sacrifice of those they hold dearest, has been amply proved in the last eighteen months.

Surely the time has come when some system should co-ordinate and direct the workers, and when it should be made possible for each and all to contribute of their best to the commonwealth.

Efficient women have not yet realised that the days of strenuous competition are over, and that now their work is often at a premium. They consequently still hesitate to relinquish posts in which less competent workers could replace them, while they in their turn

The Pall Mall Gazette 4/2/16.

COMPULSORY SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

SOME PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS AND CRITICISMS.

We append to-day a further series of letters on the subject of Compulsory Service for Women, raised in Saturday's "Pall Mall Gazette" by Miss May Bateman. The suggestion that women should be organized on systematic lines for national service has aroused serious interest, and a demand is made in most of the letters we have published for immediate action in this direction.

An Imperative Necessity.

To the Editor of the Pall Mall Gazette.

Sir,—I am glad to see from an article on Compulsory Service for Women in your paper to-night that the Press are beginning to realise the imperative necessity for the immediate organization of the feminine element of the nation to carry on the work of the nation.

The Government should be forced by public opinion to begin to organize and settle this big subject of women's service. Let the organization for compulsory service be started by all means, but although women have no votes let the Government treat them at least as well as the men.

Let them first be organized under a Derby scheme, and let it be clearly understood what they are required for. Let the patriotic side of the scheme be emphasised, and let it be understood that women are required to replace every single man between the ages of eighteen and forty to allow those men to go and fulfil a man's duties in the war zones, not necessarily the front trenches. Let that be the ideal. Let women educated as lawyers, doctors, engineers, clergy, etc., if any such there be, practise these professions and send the men out.

It is said there are 1,600,000 women skilled in industry and still unemployed; good, if all those women are free to work and are not entitled to claim exemption, then they should most certainly work and release 1,600,000 more men, and if after being canvassed in a thorough and businesslike manner they are not willing to work, then the compulsory organization can set to work.

Emphatically let the organization of the machinery of the Derby scheme and of the compulsory system be started at once, on business and thorough lines. The committees of Society ladies now scattered about the country won't do any harm, but the majority of them probably can't run their own homes in an economical manner, and they are certainly not doing this work in a thorough and businesslike manner. Put the business in the hands of business women. Possibly, as your correspondent May Bateman suggests, the various Women's Leagues, with the assistance of the Organization for Women's Work for Labour Exchanges, would be the best people to work it.

Let the whole kingdom be divided into districts, as much as possible on the political lines, and let the women be canvassed, for which the National Register should be invaluable. Let the committee work out the rules and regulations, the groups, the ages to be canvassed, the wages, the reasons for exemption, the housing question, the means of education, etc., etc., and let them have the literature distributed.

Oh! for another Lord Derby or a woman with most of the capability and the majority of the qualifications of Lord Derby to work out this scheme for the women and help them to find themselves! The women's work should have been started hand in hand with the men's scheme, and not later than a year ago, but, once more in this, as in every other national scheme since the war began, we can only say the fatal words "too late."

M. A. H.

Bury St. Edmunds.

The "Home Duties" Problem.

Sir,—I am much interested in Miss Bateman's article counselling compulsory service for women.

I gather her idea is to draw in the girl slackers, not to encroach upon the married women, and those who already have their hands full with home cares.

This point will naturally bring up the question as to how far "home cares" may be used as a shield from work necessary to the country's welfare. That such would be the case is proved by the story of a friend of mine who, when the National Register was being taken to avoid being called upon to work, gave as her occupation "household duties," although she is of independent means, of good health, and with no own housework so far as possible through the time of stress, releasing strong young arms for heavier burdens.

If capable of the more strenuous work vital to England at present, artist, novelist, poet, dreamer, should all be willing to sacrifice themselves, lay their art aside and do anything that will help to win the war.

Women have come forward grandly, but those who are confessedly "having the time of their lives" should remember that that will not count for righteousness, that tram-conducting and ticket-clipping may present more attractions than work on the land, but that true sacrifice for country lies rather in doing what we don't like than what we like, and, moreover, doing it with a smile.

ROSE CH. DE CRESPIGNY.

Artillery-mansions, Westminster.

A Great Asset to Woman.

SIR,—After carefully reading Miss Bateman's able article on "Compulsory Service for Women," one feels it must be answered by the womanhood of the nation in a great burst of acclamation.

If this movement can be kept free from any taint of political desires or aims in the future it would be of the greatest value in throwing into a practical form all the overlapping voluntary workers already "doing their bit," and bringing into line their sisters who are not awake to the country's call.

On the land there is little that is beyond the strength of a perfectly healthy woman (given the aid of modern machinery, steam and electric). The old-fashioned plough is too heavy, but what is to hinder any girl with average brains driving a motor-plough or motor-reaper?

The greatest asset to the girl going on the land is the boundless store of health she will gain. In all the other directions indicated in Miss Bateman's clarion call to women there is that rarest of all commodities in our sex—common sense.

(MISS) VIDA R. SINCLAIR,
Hon. Press Sec., E.V.A.C., Empress Club.

Scheme Not Difficult.

SIR,—I quite agree with Miss Bateman as to compulsory service for women. As we have all been registered, there should be no difficulty in finding out those who are really capable of working.

M. WILTON.

33, Chesham-place, S.W.

System Wanted.

SIR,—The interesting article raises a question which many women will be glad to see discussed.

That they are willing to work and to make the minor sacrifice of their leisure and comfort for their country, in addition to the greatest sacrifice of those they hold dearest, has been amply proved in the last eighteen months.

Surely the time has come when some system should co-ordinate and direct the workers, and when it should be made possible for each and all to contribute of their best to the commonweal.

Efficient women have not yet realised that the days of strenuous competition are over, and that now their work is often at a premium. They consequently still hesitate to relinquish posts in which less competent workers could replace them, while they in their turn could devote their energies and talents to more responsible work. These—and they are many—would, I am sure, welcome compulsion.

Tact and discrimination would be required for this vast scheme. Will they be forthcoming?

E. F.

The First Step.

SIR,—If such a scheme is to be considered seriously the first step should be a call on the part of the Government for volunteers.

When it can be proved that women have not come forward in sufficient numbers to replace men, then compulsion might be necessary. But a lead from the Government is essential—not a policy of "You run, and I follow"—and I believe that, given such a lead, there would be no necessity for compulsion.

(Mrs.) ALICE PERRIN.

12, Cadogan-court, S.W.

The Voice of Man.

SIR,—Now that a woman, and, judging from her well-known writings, a womanly woman, has written to you regarding the compulsory service of women, it seems to me that the voice of man might be heard upon the subject, into which it might have been unseemly for him to intrude without the feminine lead.

Women have taken a lead in so many matters since the war began and acquitted themselves so admirably that, while compulsion is not as evidently necessary as with men, yet if it could be brought into action without too much red tape and administered in great part by women, then the State would be the gainer.

Woman will take a place which the gradual march of civilisation, domestic development, and labour-saving machinery have released her for, and men will, as a result, lead better lives.

WM. REED-LEWIS.

Bexhill-on-Sea.

have no votes let the Government treat them at least as well as the men.

Let them first be organized under a Derby scheme, and let it be clearly understood what they are required for. Let the patriotic side of the scheme be emphasised, and let it be understood that women are required to replace every single man between the ages of eighteen and forty to allow those men to go and fulfil a man's duties in the war zones, not necessarily the front trenches. Let that be the ideal. Let women educated as lawyers, doctors, engineers, clergy, etc., if any such there be, practise these professions and send the men out.

It is said there are 1,600,000 women skilled in industry and still unemployed; good, if all those women are free to work and are not entitled to claim exemption, then they should most certainly work and release 1,600,000 more men, and if after being canvassed in a thorough and businesslike manner they are not willing to work, then the compulsory organization can set to work.

Emphatically let the organization of the machinery of the Derby scheme and of the compulsory system be started at once, on business and thorough lines. The committees of Society ladies now scattered about the country won't do any harm, but the majority of them probably can't run their own homes in an economical manner, and they are certainly not doing this work in a thorough and businesslike manner. Put the business in the hands of business women. Possibly, as your correspondent May Bateman suggests, the various Women's Leagues, with the assistance of the Organization for Women's Work for Labour Exchanges, would be the best people to work it.

Let the whole kingdom be divided into districts, as much as possible on the political lines, and let the women be canvassed, for which the National Register should be invaluable. Let the committee work out the rules and regulations, the groups, the ages to be canvassed, the wages, the reasons for exemption, the housing question, the means of education, etc., etc., and let them have the literature distributed.

Oh! for another Lord Derby or a woman with most of the capability and the majority of the qualifications of Lord Derby to work out this scheme for the women and help them to find themselves! The women's work should have been started hand in hand with the men's scheme, and not later than a year ago, but, once more in this, as in every other national scheme since the war began, we can only say the fatal words "too late."

M. A. H.

Bury St. Edmunds.

The "Home Duties" Problem.

SIR,—I am much interested in Miss Bateman's article counselling compulsory service for women.

I gather her idea is to draw in the girl slackers, not to encroach upon the married women, and those who already have their hands full with home cares.

This point will naturally bring up the question as to how far "home cares" may be used as a shield from work necessary to the country's welfare. That such would be the case is proved by the story of a friend of mine who, when the National Register was being taken, to avoid being called upon to work, gave as her occupation "household duties," although she is of independent means, of good health, and with no home of her own.

BRENDA GIRVIN.

Ashbourne, Sydenham, S.E.

Woman's Hatred of Discipline.

SIR,—I cordially agree with Miss May Bateman that the need for some sort of compulsory service for women is great, perhaps even momentous.

My only doubts are how such compulsion could ever be enforced. Woman, even the most ordinary woman, is a subtle bundle of complexities, and it seems to me that the pyschological difficulties would be almost insurmountable. Man falls easily into discipline and grows to love it.

Woman, deep down in her souls resents nothing on earth so much. Women, as May Bateman knows and says, will shrink from no self-sacrifice, however great, but I fear that in the depths of those same paradoxical souls they would never cease to resent its enforcement.

5, Cresswell-gardens, S.E. ROSALIE NEISH.

A Danger?

SIR,—One can have nothing but praise for the spirit of Miss May Bateman's article on compulsory service for women, but the wholesale employment of female labour is a very serious question. It is bound to lead to a decrease in the rates of the labourer's remuneration, and might be responsible for an economic upheaval after the war. By all means let women do women's work and save us from ever again seeing healthy young men behind the counter selling women's frills and furbelows, but there are limits to woman's effort which no amount of patriotic zeal will remove without serious results ensuing.

Miss Batsman will, I hope, forgive me for saying that her desire to be conscripted reminds me of the lady who demanded that her husband should "knock her abaht" as a tribute of affection.

LOUIS VINCENT.

100, Great Portland-street, W.

The Dunoon Advertiser
7/3/16

Compulsion for Women.

Everything points to the fact that very soon there will be a very clamant call all over the country for women to come forward to take their places in the industrial life of the nation. The great sweep of the Derby net continues, and soon the Military Service Act will be bringing in its thousands. Not only in vital industries, such as agriculture, but in almost every trade, the shortage of labour will be more acutely felt as time goes on, and the official announcement from the Board of Trade to employers yesterday is really in the nature of a preliminary warning of the difficulties that lie ahead. To-day the first active step in securing recruits from the ranks of women for the farm army was taken at an inaugural meeting of the Women's Land Service Corps held at Grosvenor House. With the personal support of Mr Walter Long and Lord Milner, the corps can go forward with confidence, and it was also satisfactory that it launched its campaign with the blessing of the Prime Minister, who wrote welcoming the movement. There are abundant signs that we are at the beginning of a vigorous campaign for recruiting of women for our industries, and already there is talk in London regarding compulsory service for women. It is quite evident that there are many who favour the application of Derby methods to such a campaign for the industrial army, but there seems little room to doubt that when the fiery cross is sent round the women will be found ready and willing to take a still greater share in the national struggle.

The Yorkshire Observer
1.3.16

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Compulsion of Women?

At a meeting in Montgomeryshire on Tuesday, Mr. Lomax, the county recruiting officer, made a statement that ought to challenge investigation. He said that one of the principal War Office recruiting officers had told him that before long, when women and boys had trained themselves, the men would be taken from the land. The crisis, he added, was so important that it was not merely a question of women offering their services—they would have to go. One questions whether the War Office would confide its intentions to a recruiting officer, but the statement as it stands would seem to warrant a question in Parliament. The prospect of the denudation of practically all but elderly men engaged in agriculture and their replacement by women will alarm some farmers, especially those who have been exclaiming against women as "no good" for farm work. One protesting agriculturist told a local tribunal the other day that when his cow broke its leg the women were frightened and ran away. Needless to say, that if women are to be introduced to all kinds of farm work they will require a stronger nerve than that. But against this one has to remember that some of the best farms in the country are "run" by women.

The Pall Mall Gazette 10/3/16

To the Editor.

COMPULSION FOR WOMEN.

SIR,—"Door-mats" I call those women who suggest added indignities and struggles for the self-sacrificing and forgiving sex, cruelly denied all political rights and safeguards in peace time, and yet, "Oh, for woman's charity—toe help and save th race!" Our sacrifices we will still offer, but never by compulsion. Where are our "Antis" with their "Woman's place is the home?" Don't all speak at once.

EDITH E. PORCH.

1, Warwick-chambers, Pater-street, Kensington.

SIR,—Before a general election can take place some change in the existing register must be made, in order that men returning from the front may not be disfranchised on account of the present period of qualification.

It is to be hoped that the Government will take this opportunity of dealing with the whole question of franchise reform, and remove at least one of the anomalies and injustices of our electoral system by enfranchising women.

Women have been called upon to perform their full share of the nation's work, and it is universally acknowledged that their response to the call has been satisfactory. What reason is there for continuing to deny them the full status of citizens?

Every one realises by now that the question of women's suffrage will have to be settled very shortly. Since some measure of franchise reform will have to be passed before the end of this Parliament—for an election on the present register is recognised to be impossible, and any Bill which alters the register will be actually, even if not technically, a Franchise Bill—the wisest and most statesmanslike course the Government can pursue is to introduce a measure which, while it ensures that the men now at the front shall not lose their right to vote, at the same time extends that right to women.

No one can wish for a return to the state of things prevailing before the war.

BERTHA BREWSTER.

27, Chancery-lane, W.C.

The Pall Mall Gazette 7/3/16 679c

COMPULSORY SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

SOME PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS AND CRITICISMS.

We append to-day a further series of letters on the subject of Compulsory Service for Women, raised in Saturday's "Pall Mall Gazette" by Miss May Bateman. The suggestion that women should be organized on systematic lines for national service has aroused serious interest, and a demand is made in most of the letters we have published for immediate action in this direction.

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

An Imperative Necessity.

SIR,—I am glad to see from an article on Compulsory Service for Women in your paper to-night that the Press are beginning to realise the imperative necessity for the immediate organization of the feminine element of the nation to carry on the work of the nation.

The Government should be forced by public opinion to begin to organize and settle this big subject of women's service. Let the organization for compulsory service be started by all means, but although women have no votes let the Government treat them at least as well as the men.

Let them first be organized under a Derby scheme, and let it be clearly understood what they are required for. Let the patriotic side of the scheme be emphasised, and let it be understood that women are required to replace every single man between the ages of eighteen and forty to allow those men to go and fulfil a man's duties in the war zones, not necessarily the front trenches. Let that be the ideal. Let women educated as lawyers, doctors, engineers, clergy, etc., if any such there be, practise these professions and send the men out.

It is said there are 1,600,000 women skilled in industry and still unemployed; good, if all those women are free to work and are not entitled to claim exemption, then they should most certainly work and release 1,600,000 more men, and if after being canvassed in a thorough and businesslike manner they are not willing to work, then the compulsory organization can set to work.

Emphatically let the organization of the machinery of the Derby scheme and of the compulsory system be started at once, on business and thorough lines. The committees of Society ladies now scattered about the country won't do any harm, but the majority of them probably can't run their own homes in an economical manner, and they are certainly not doing this work in a thorough and businesslike manner. Put the business in the hands of business women. Possibly, as your correspondent May Bateman suggests, the various Women's Leagues, with the assistance of the Organization for Women's Work for Labour Exchanges, would be the best people to work it.

Let the whole kingdom be divided into districts, as much as possible on the political lines, and let the women be canvassed, for which the National Register should be invaluable. Let the committee work out the rules and regulations, the groups, the ages to be canvassed, the wages, the reasons for exemption, the housing question, the means of education, etc., etc., and let them have the literature distributed.

Oh! for another Lord Derby or a woman with most of the capability and the majority of the qualifications of Lord Derby to work out this scheme for the women and help them to find themselves! The women's work should have been started hand in hand with the men's scheme, and not later than a year ago, but, once more in this, as in every other national scheme since the war began, we can only say the fatal words "too late."

M. A. H.

Bury St. Edmunds.

The "Home Duties" Problem.

SIR,—I am much interested in Miss Bateman's article counselling compulsory service for women.

I gather her idea is to draw in the girl slackers, not to encroach upon the married women, and those who already have their hands full with home cares.

This point will naturally bring up the question as to how far "home cares" may be used as a shield from work necessary to the country's welfare. That such would be the case is proved by the story of a friend of mine who, when the National Register was being taken, to avoid being called upon to work, gave as her exemption "household duties," although she be impossible, and any Bill which alters the register will be actually, even if not technically, a Franchise Bill—the wisest and most statesmanslike course the Government can pursue is to introduce a measure which, while it ensures that the men now at the front shall not lose their right to vote, at the same time extends that right to women.

No one can wish for a return to the state of things prevailing before the war.

BERTHA BREWSTER.

27, Chancery-lane, W.C.

---

and let it be clearly understood what they are required for. Let the patriotic side of the scheme be emphasised, and let it be understood that women are required to replace every single man between the ages of eighteen and forty to allow those men to go and fulfil a man's duties in the war zones, not necessarily the front trenches. Let that be the ideal. Let women educated as lawyers, doctors, engineers, clergy, etc., if any such there be, practise these professions and send the men out.

It is said there are 1,600,000 women skilled in industry and still unemployed; good, if all those women are free to work and are not entitled to claim exemption, then they should most certainly work and release 1,600,000 more men, and if after being canvassed in a thorough and businesslike manner they are not willing to work, then the compulsory organization can set to work.

Emphatically let the organization of the machinery of the Derby scheme and of the compulsory system be started at once, on business and thorough lines. The committees of Society ladies now scattered about the country won't do any harm, but the majority of them probably can't run their own homes in an economical manner, and they are certainly not doing this work in a thorough and businesslike manner. Put the business in the hands of business women. Possibly, as your correspondent May Bateman suggests, the various Women's Leagues, with the assistance of the Organization for Women's Work for Labour Exchanges, would be the best people to work it.

Let the whole kingdom be divided into districts, as much as possible on the political lines, and let the women be canvassed, for which the National Register should be invaluable. Let the committee work out the rules and regulations, the groups, the ages to be canvassed, the wages, the reasons for exemption, the housing question, the means of education, etc., etc., and let them have the literature distributed.

Oh! for another Lord Derby or a woman with most of the capability and the majority of the qualifications of Lord Derby to work out this scheme for the women and help them to find themselves! The women's work should have been started hand in hand with the men's scheme, and not later than a year ago, but, once more in this, as in every other national scheme since the war began, we can only say the fatal words "too late."

M. A. H.

Bury St. Edmunds.

The "Home Duties" Problem.

SIR,—I am much interested in Miss Bateman's article counselling compulsory service for women.

I gather her idea is to draw in the girl slackers, not to encroach upon the married women, and those who already have their hands full with home cares.

This point will naturally bring up the question as to how far "home cares" may be used as a shield from work necessary to the country's welfare. That such would be the case is proved by the story of a friend of mine who, when the National Register was being taken, to avoid being called upon to work, gave as her occupation "household duties," although she is of independent means, of good health, and with no home of her own.

BRENDA GIRVIN.

Ashbourne, Sydenham, S.E.

Woman's Hatred of Discipline.

SIR,—I cordially agree with Miss May Bateman that the need for some sort of compulsory service for women is great, perhaps even momentous.

My only doubts are how such compulsion could ever be enforced. Woman, even the most ordinary woman, is a subtle bundle of complexities, and it seems to me that the pyschological difficulties would be almost insurmountable. Man falls easily into discipline and grows to love it.

Woman, deep down in her soul resents nothing on earth so much. Women, as May Bateman knows and says, will shrink from no self-sacrifice, however great, but I fear that in the depths of those same paradoxical souls they would never cease to resent its enforcement.

5, Cresswell-gardens, S.E. ROSALIE NEISH.

A Danger?

SIR,—One can have nothing but praise for the spirit of Miss May Bateman's article on compulsory service for women, but the wholesale employment of female labour is a very serious question. It is bound to lead to a decrease in the rates of the labourer's remuneration, and might be responsible for an economic upheaval after the war. By all means let women do women's work and save us from ever again seeing healthy young men behind the counter selling women's frills and furbelows, but there are limits to woman's effort which no amount of patriotic zeal will remove without serious results ensuing.

Miss Bateman will, I hope, forgive me for saying that her desire to be conscripted reminds me of the lady who demanded that her husband should "knock her abaht" as a tribute of affection.

LOUIS VINCENT.

100, Great Portland-street, W.

The Pall Mall Gazette 8/3/16

COMPULSORY SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

SOME MORAL AND OTHER CONSIDERATIONS.

We give to-day a further selection of letters from our readers on the subject of Compulsory Service for Women, which was raised in Saturday's "Pall Mall Gazette" by Miss Bateman. In spite of some doubts and hesitations the tendency of the correspondence is in favour of a proper organization of women's work on more or less compulsory lines.

To the EDITOR of the PALL MALL GAZETTE.

The Moral Aspect.

SIR,—I have been reading your correspondence about compulsory service for women, and it seems to me that the question should be treated as well from a moral as a practical point of view. Strength of mind and of character are the great powers which are going to carry us through this war to victory, and the surest way we know of to attain these qualities is continually to force ourselves to do things which we do not like.

Miss de Crespigny has realised this when she says that clipping tickets may be more pleasurable than working on the land, but she has not carried her speculations far enough. I should prefer, for the reason which I have already suggested, to get everybody to do something which is more or less distasteful to them. By a simple investigation by the authorities it should be possible to find out every woman's idea of a pleasant piece of war work, and then set her to do something entirely different. Such an organization would often produce admirable practical results, but even if these were not always perfect, the beneficial results to national character would be tremendous.

But one group of women should, I think, be exempted, to preserve the best and highest ideals of femininity quite intact. For we must always remember that however much we should make ourselves capable of bearing man's burdens, our primary object is to bear our own, which we can never do with proper success if we ever give ourselves the chance of forgetting our sex.

CHRISTINE FRANCES.

Oriel College, Oxford.

The Object of the National Register.

SIR,—Surely compulsion is not called for from the point of view of compelling the women to come in; yet a complete local register, such as Miss Bateman suggests, would have many practical advantages. I myself have just been seeking a woman gardener, with the help of various London agencies, and by a happy chance have secured one living scarce a mile from my country cottage. But there is no local organization by which we could have been brought in touch with one another. Miss Bateman's register would remedy this.

Again, vast numbers of women are working, but that is not to say that they are working at the things most vital to the nation, and many little soft jobs might be exchanged for sterner ones if an official organization could bring judicious pressure to bear. Finally, with what other object, save to use us to the best purpose, were we originaly included in the National Register?

(Mrs.) V. M. CRAWFORD,
Catholic Social Guild.

1, Victoria-street, S.W.

Conserve the Women.

SIR,—Miss May Bateman proposes to call up the women and to oblige them to work on the farms and in the offices when they are not engaged on productive work. Women always being ready for self-sacrifice, she doubts not that they will be ready to sacrifice themselves now.

Miss Bateman is right when she says women are always ready to sacrifice themselves. Now it is proposed to encourage them to sacrifice their health, while still many men in full vigour are working in munition factories in order to be exempted from military service.

Thousands of young women will be found ready to drag themselves to pieces ploughing, digging, looking after cattle, straining organizations delicately adjusted to the work they are fitted for, and destroying their own constitutions and the health of the next generation.

Of course, many of the women will be the first to say that what a man can do a woman can do. She can. But if this is permitted in physical work it will be at the expense of her children. We know that many women do not, some cannot, and others will not, marry. But the large majority of young women are, or will be, mothers.

Now, girls are always ready to overdo things. They will work in the field, they will keep up, like the men, hours, till they drop. Therefore their physical work [illegible]

The Pall Mall Gazette 8/3/16

COMPULSORY SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

NEW SPHERES OF LABOUR.

We give to-day a final selection of letters on the subject of Compulsory Service for Women raised in Saturday's "Pall Mall Gazette" by Miss May Bateman. The correspondence has proved that there is a real demand from women that the services they can render to the nation should be organized on definite lines, and that some form of compulsion would be necessary for this purpose.

New Spheres for Women.

SIR,—I do not for a moment doubt that compulsory service for women will prove entirely practicable should it become necessary, but I thoroughly endorse the sentiment expressed in your able leader that method must prepare the ground before female labour on any large scale can bring effective relief to our conomic necessities.

It is not only on the land that the aid of women can be of immense value. There is an immense opening for educated women in trade, and as a business man I am anxious to bring all my weight to bear on its importance. If we are to crush German trade we shall not have merely to produce our own goods, but also spread their existence far and wide by means of judicious advertisements and clever travelling representatives.

It is a matter of real regret to me that with splendidly paid positions of this description now going begging, so many women of ability, for want of a better understanding of what a travelling representative really signifies, are engaged in work for which they are quite unfitted, and are not only often keeping someone else out of a billet, but failing themselves to find the niche for which they are obviously intended.

THOMAS DIXON.

193 and 195, Oxford-street, W.

A Sufficient Sacrifice.

SIR,—For those women who have not had—nor will have—to give their husbands, sons, or any very dearest to this war, and who yet live in idleness, and even reap benefit by the sufferings of us others whose all is wrenched from us—yes, certainly. But if another ounce be demanded from those women whose lives are being wrecked wholesale, and their hearts torn to pieces because men of all nations have refused in the past to give their women, mothers of the race, power to have any say in things, a great revolt of women will be the result.

EDITH ARCHDALE.

A Call for Volunteers.

SIR,—When it is remembered how many hundreds of women hastened to register at the Labour Exchanges for war work—far in excess of any machinery available to tabulate their qualifications—it seems fairly clear that what is needed in the present economic stress is, not the fashionable panacea of "compulsion," nor merely the picturesque "call for volunteers," but a general readiness on the part of the employing classes to make good their shortage of men by employing women at men's rates of pay for men's work, and an efficient machinery of organization for fitting the supply of women to the demand.

(Mrs.) E. M. WHITE.

Women's University Club, 4, George-street, W.

An Alternative Suggestion.

SIR,—I cannot share Miss Bateman's desire for compulsory service for women. So far there has been no lack of voluntary workers, only a lamentable lack of ability to organize them.

I am of opinion that there would be a marked increase in the quality and supply of voluntary women workers if a double shift system were introduced into such callings as admit of being carried on in this way. The shifts could be arranged on very elastic lines:—

(a) Shift I.—The first half of every day.
Shift II.—The second half of every day.
(b) Shift I.—The first three days of the week.
Shift II.—The last three days of the week.
(c) A Box-and-Cox arrangement—two women undertaking to do a full week's work between them, and dividing the week's wage.

Arrangement (c) would be quite feasible in the educational field, and in many departmental offices, and it is certain would make available a large amount of unutilised energy and capacity.

ADA HEATHER-BIGG.

14, Radnor-place, W.

Votes First!

SIR,—This scheme demands that English women, contemptuously denied the rights of citizenship, shall be herded up as cattle, or chattel, with never a "by your leave," their wages, hours of labour, and status fixed by some quasi-military organization, [illegible] ing after cattle, straining organisations adjusted to the work they are fitted for, and destroying their own constitutions and the health of the next generation.

Of course, many of the women will be the first to say that what a man can do a woman can do. She can. But if this is permitted in physical work it will be at the expense of her children. We know that many women do not, some cannot, and others will not, marry. But the large majority of young women are, or will be, mothers.

Now, girls are always ready to overdo things. They will work in the field, they will keep up, like the racehorse, till they drop. Therefore their physical work should always be carefully regulated. Let them have plenty—ju-jitsu, fencing, dancing, gymnastics, swimming, all you like. But never let such work be left to themselves as to extent or amount.

Once let women have the idea that they are serving their country and helping the men in the trenches by taking up farm work, and they will work themselves to death, without complaint, joyfully.

And all the while what of the men in the munition factories, in the Civil Service, in the schools and shops? What of the conscientious objector? What of the thousands of German prisoners who would be glad of work to do but who lie in idleness? Could they not be employed on farms in the inland counties of England? Is it troublesome and expensive to use them? It will be far cheaper than using our young women, in whom we conserve the future hope of the country.

C. Cowdroy.

Crouch End High School and College, N.

A Half-Time Compromise.

Sir,—In reference to the subject of compulsion for women, may I ask if it has been suggested that half-time service might be a form of compromise? Many women are physically unfit, owing to lack of training, from working a number of hours at a time. Working a full day, too, means breaking all social ties.

The shift system might be employed in cases where one man's work could be divided up between two women. Women are showing a magnificent spirit, but, all said and done, they might be let down gently—but perhaps "pulled up" is the better expression.

Enid Dinnis.

36, Milton-road, East Sheen.

Arrangement (c) would be quite feasible in the educational field, and in many departmental offices, and it is certain would make available a large amount of unutilised energy and capacity.

Ada Heather-Bigg.

14, Radnor-place, W.

Votes First!

Sir,—This scheme demands that English women, contemptuously denied the rights of citizenship, shall be herded up as cattle, or chattel, with never a "by your leave," their wages, hours of labour, and status fixed by some quasi-military organization, these poor dumb make-shifts passively accepting their slavehood. As our American friends would say, this is "some" Prussianism. Women have had enough of these one-sided sacrifices: if the nation wants the help of its women, let the Government put the English woman on the same political level as her Australian sister. National necessity does not involve the economic exploitation of its women, and that is all the scheme amounts to.

7, Victoria-street, W. E. Rogers.

Mobilise the Women.

Sir,—I was much interested in Miss Bateman's able article, and I fully endorse all she says. The time has come when the women must mobilise in real earnest, and it must be done with some kind of system—this is absolutely essential if good is to accrue. It is plainly a case for organization, and the one thing to avoid is overlapping. All women are wishful to help and all are wanted; but let each be enlisted in their right place where their special aptitude will be of most value to the country.

Could they not roughly be divided up into four sections? I think this would simplify matters very materially. Let Munitions be one; the Red Cross another; the Women's National Land Service the third; and my own Corps, the British Service Corps, the fourth. The two former need no introduction; but the two latter are probably not yet known to the general public. The Women's National Land Service Corps is doing yeoman work, under the Government, putting the right woman on the land to help our second line of defence, and the British Service Corps is a fully recognised Corps, working under the War Office, supplying the need for service work on the military side to fill the places of men going on active service.

W. M. Willis-Swan,
O.C., British Service Corps.

Buckingham Palace Hotel, S.W

The Times.
3. 8. 16.

MORE WOMEN WANTED.

NEED OF A LIVING WAGE.

(FROM A WOMAN CORRESPONDENT.)

A state of war has given rise to many unexpected conditions, and one of the most surprising is the present position in regard to the employment of women. There seems no doubt that for the moment the demand exceeds the supply, a situation almost incredible to a generation brought up to talk glibly of "more than a million superfluous women."

It is a little difficult to readjust our standpoint, for the change has come so suddenly. A few months ago women were tumbling over each other in their eagerness to do their bit for the country, and there was nothing like enough work to go round. They registered by the hundred at the Labour Exchanges and at bureaux set up by numerous associations, and grew heart-sick as weeks went by and they were still unemployed. Now, however, things have changed, and in every direction the cry is, "We want more women." From the headquarters of the Red Cross Society comes an urgent appeal for more V.A.D.'s; from the Labour Exchanges a demand for more women clerks for Government work; and from several directions at once a call for any number of women for work on the land. Perhaps the first is the most unexpected, for until quite recently the despised V.A.D. has been a drug in the market. In the early days of the war there was a great rush of women to qualify themselves for Red Cross work, and thousands must have obtained the necessary certificates. Then for a time it seemed as though there were a dozen V.A.D.'s for every job. Those who were really anxious for regular work soon grew tired of the hot competition for the privilege of performing the smallest hospital duty, and found some other occupation; while the rest became slack as the first excitement wore off, and began to think that "doing the washing list" once a week at the nearest hospital was enough in the way of war work. Now we are told there is a shortage of nurses, and apparently almost anyone is welcome. Even the first aid and home nursing certificates, which were a fetish at first, are not essential now.

NOT ENOUGH TO LIVE ON.

The position with regard to the scarcity of women clerks is rather different. The majority of the posts vacant now are junior clerkships in Government offices, with salaries of from 20s. to 25s. weekly. For the type of work required, for which no special training or qualifications are necessary, the pay is perhaps sufficient, but it is not enough for middle-class girls to live on in these days of high prices.

The ordinary sources of supply of women clerical labour have been used up for some time—girls living at home in London and the suburbs have been glad to earn a guinea a week; and in addition to these a number of well-to-do girls have come up to London with allowances from home to eke out their salaries. Now, however, it seems that this supply has also come to an end, and if there is in actual fact a real dearth of women clerks, the Government must either raise the general standard of wages very materially or provide hostels where their employees can live decently on what they earn.

There are not many girls who care to spend at least 30s. a week on uncomfortable lodgings and unappetizing meals in order to earn 25s., however keenly they may desire to be patriotic. The easier way is to remain at home in the country with plenty of fresh air and good food and time for golf and tennis, and appease conscience by putting in occasional work at the local hospital, war depôt, or canteen.

The various associations engaged in recruiting women for work on the land are confronted with the same problem—the impossibility of the worker living on the wages she earns. In cases where the absent labourer can be replaced by one of his own womenfolk who has a separation allowance in addition to her earnings the matter is simple enough, but where girls of a different class are brought from a distance and housing and feeding have to be considered the whole question is fraught with difficulty and it is not surprising that girls hesitate to come forward.

It would seem that all those who want to work and can afford to are now fully employed, and the remainder are either unable to live on the pay they can command or frankly do not want to work. There is no doubt there are thousands who come under the latter heading, the Flag Day sellers, for instance. It is fre-

Daily Mirror.
13. 9. 16

COMPULSION FOR WOMEN?

SHOULD WOMEN AND GIRLS BE CONSCRIPTED FOR WAR WORK?

MORE WOMEN NEEDED.

THERE is a growing demand for female labour—and, in the opinion of many, this demand will not be satisfied unless some system of conscription is instituted for the women and girls of Britain.

What do your readers think?

There is no need to tell how splendidly Britain's women have come to the front, how valiantly they have taken up all manner of work. Yet there still remain many thousands of single women who are doing nothing at all for the nation. Also, there are numbers of married women of leisure who still seem to think of little else but social pleasure. Should there be compulsion for women and girls? F. F.

Hanover-square.

THE BRAVER SEX?

DOES the moment of peril more readily discover the hero or the heroine? I was speaking to two women at a lonely farm, which was certainly within eighty yards of an immense bomb-pit that rapidly was becoming a pond. They were not prostrate with nerve strain after the Zeppelin raid.

When I recall the heroism of Joan of Arc, Grace Darling, Stewardess Rogers (who went down with the Stella on the Manacles twenty years since), Nurse Cavell, Mlle. Moreau, the nurse whom the King recently decorated, and countless others unchronicled who have rescued from drowning, or fire, or other deadly danger—then I want to ask the question, which is this: Which is (not the sterner nor the stronger), but the braver sex?

AN INQUISITOR.

Daily Chronicle.
13. 9. 16.

WE WANT MORE WOMEN.

ORGANISATION AND COMPULSION.

By MABEL BEATTY,
Commandant W.R.A., The Green Cross Society.

It is more than a year ago since the mind of every woman in the United Kingdom was stirred to a realisation of the seriousness of affairs, by the establishment of a national register. The Government was at last awake to the fact that a large proportion of its population might be turned to account, and patriotic women who had not needed this reminder that their help was required by their country, heaved sighs of relief at the thought that at last their idle sisters would be brought to book.

The demand for female labour grew, women became clerks in banks and Government offices where hitherto they had never been employed, they became railway officials, bus conductors, liftgirls, commissionaires, van-drivers, window-cleaners, bakers, farmers, market gardeners; in fact they established themselves in all suitable and even unsuitable branches of labour, wherever the lack of men created the demand. The business instinct was probably at the root of nine-tenths of this development, and it is perfectly right that it should be so. Woman's labour and wages have been vexed questions for many years, and it is natural that she should seize the unique opportunity now offered of giving her services at a better rate of pay and in a more varied theatre of activities, sometimes perhaps to the detriment of certain established trades for women, textile fabrics for example.

The Voluntary Worker.

So much for the ordinary working and business classes; but—and here the thinking woman pauses—what about the women of the middle and upper classes? This brings us to the plane of the voluntary worker—of whom, praise be, there are many; women who have gladly placed their time, ability, money, health and energy entirely at the disposal of allowance in addition to her earnings the matter is simple enough, but where girls of a different class are brought from a distance and housing and feeding have to be considered the whole question is fraught with difficulty and it is not surprising that girls hesitate to come forward.

It would seem that all those who want to work and can afford to are now fully employed, and the remainder are either unable to live on the pay they can command or frankly do not want to work. There is no doubt there are thousands who come under the latter heading, the Flag Day sellers, for instance. It is frequently stated in the Press that 10,000—sometimes 20,000—ladies were selling flags in the streets of London for such-and-such a cause. Where do they all come from? Some perhaps manage to arrange their usual work in such a way as to allow of an occasional free day, but the great majority must be young, unemployed women.

Some Suggestions.

It has only just begun to dawn on the authorities that there is some capacity for useful work left in the average woman even after her 40th birthday—V.A.D.'s may now be 48, and the Civil Service Commissioners have nominally removed all age limits, though actually very few posts are given to women of over 40.

Would it not be possible to devise some method by which more use could be made of the part-time services of older and married women, and thus release the younger ones for other work? In the country particularly, much of the local "war-work" is being carried on by middle-aged women who are only able to give part-time services, but it is noticeable that in the large munition centres many young girls are employed in canteen work which could be perfectly well undertaken by their elders.

Why should not the National Register—which, it may be remembered, registered women as well as men—be used for the purpose of conscripting women on somewhat the same lines as the Military Service Act? Every woman, or at least every unmarried woman, between the ages of 18 and 40 could then be called upon for work of national importance, unless she is granted exemption, and in many cases her place could be filled by an older woman. Much has been said about the male slacker—now become the conscript—and much about the excellent work rendered by the women of the nation, but there are women slackers, too, though fortunately not very many, and they ought to be rounded up.

of pay and in a more varied theatre of activities, sometimes perhaps to the detriment of certain established trades for women, textile fabrics for example.

The Voluntary Worker.

So much for the ordinary working and business classes; but—and here the thinking woman pauses—what about the women of the middle and upper classes? This brings us to the plane of the voluntary worker—of whom, praise be, there are many; women who have gladly placed their time, ability, money, health and energy entirely at the disposal of some excellent organisation in which they learn at any rate to take their share of the heavy burden of their country; whereby the Government is less harassed, the fighting man helped, comforted or encouraged, and the whole tone of womanhood raised by force of example.

"How well the women have come forward" is a phrase on many lips to-day, and unfortunately there are too many willing to rest on that assumption who do nothing themselves, but who, by repetition of this catch-phrase, hypnotise themselves into the belief that it applies to women as a whole, their own petty idle personalities included; quite a number of women are undertaking the lighter forms of paid work to add to their pocket-money, really believing they are "doing their bit." There are others whose contribution to the sum of war-work consists in fleecing the latest joined young subaltern.

In Piccadilly the other afternoon I saw a woman in a neat khaki uniform with touches of green. She walked shoulders well back, head erect, as though she had an object in life. Two girls with a very new 2nd Lieutenant stared at her in supercilious amusement—their costumes hardly consorted with one's idea of modesty, and one wondered what they were really like under their mask of cosmetiques. "Fancy dressing like that creature," remarked one. "Tosh," drawled the very new officer, both of whose hands were in his pockets. I was amused, for I know that khaki woman had left her home about 6.30 that morning to get breakfasts, make beds, clean and wash-up in a big soldiers' home; that, moreover, she had been doing so day after day for many months, as a voluntary worker.

Advertisement on public hoardings has played a curiously prominent part in this war; "More Men are Wanted," "Enlist Now," "Your King and Country Need You," "To Dress Extravagantly in War Time is Unpatriotic," &c., &c. Do they strike home, one wonders? Why not a few more? "We Want More Women," "Idle Women are a Disgrace to Their Country." No, no, we want stronger measures. When the general public was busy protesting against the male slacker, did it never think of the female? The male slacker probably did, and felt that Nature had played him a scurvy trick in giving him the outward semblance of a man, while no one worried his lazy sister, because she was a woman.

The Woman Worker's Question.

Women who think, women who read, women who count the cost, women who have given unsparingly of themselves, who for nearly two years have borne the burden and heat of the day, who understand the ideal of Imperialism; these women are getting restive: they know their strength will give out one day; their one apprehension is "suppose I cannot last out the war, who will take my place?" We have talked too lightly about no one person being indispensable; in these times every man and woman worth their salt is indispensable, and the women workers of to-day are entitled to demand a measure of Government support. After all, the nation will suffer if one by one the worker droops at her post. A walk through the West-End at any hour of the day is a depressing sight, with its crowd of smartly dressed, shop-loving, healthy young women: it is calculated to give us pause, for what kind of children will these potential mothers bring into the world? Imperialists, patriotic men, wise women, or will they not reproduce the emptiness, pettiness, stupidity, and parasitic qualities of their own characters?

Let the prominent women of all movements, organisations, and societies meet together and resolve to demand a Government scheme of compulsory service for every woman and girl in the land. Let them make good use of the National Register; let them establish tribunals to inquire into the distribution of paid work and voluntary work, so that no one who can well afford to work for nothing gets a paid post unless specially adapted for it by previous good training. Let all the voluntary workers be uniformed and disciplined, for only by this means can the maximum of work be obtained by a minimum of time and energy. Let those, of whom there are a great number, who would give their time in exchange for just meals and travelling expenses, work in canteens, for canteens should provide these allowances, they could well afford it.

Not a day should be lost. The child cannot read the delights of the fairy book until you have forced him to learn the alphabet; the boy cannot appreciate the sea until you have made him swim. Cherchez la femme. Compel this oversexed, shallow, undeveloped creature to work, and then perhaps she will become a real woman, with some self-respect and a soul of her own; but you will want the State behind you. Organise the demand—we want compulsion for women.

The Queen 19.8.16. 679.C. 679c

COMPULSORY SERVICE FOR WOMEN.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

RUMOURS START ON THEIR TRAVELS without anyone being able to fix their place of origin. Not long ago a rumour journeyed my way which was as definite and circumstantial as the Russians-in-England story. It was to the effect that quite certainly and at once every unmarried woman between the ages of eighteen and (I think) thirty-five would be enrolled by the Government for compulsory service of some kind. The young women who heard this dictum expected to be obliged to give up the work, whatever it might be, in which they were then engaged, and awaited immediate commands with anxiety. But days passed and nothing happened. And nothing, indeed, of this sweeping and imperious character has occurred.

There are women, I know, who will assure me that if such a high command were to go forth it could not possibly be carried out for the reason that there now are no unemployed women. I shall be told what is happily quite true, that there are women by the hundred thousand who are making munitions, running canteens, making clothes for the miserable victims of war in Russia and Serbia, nursing in hospitals, driving motor-cars for war-time uses, acting as clerks, as cooks, as letter carriers, as dairymaids, as fruit gatherers, as harvesters, as everything almost that a useful person can be.

There are other people who will tell me a different story, and one which is equally true. They will tell me that when in 1915 the Labour Department of the Board of Trade made a great appeal to women to volunteer for war service, the appeal was enthusiastically answered by women, crowds of whom flocked to Westminster to set down their names and qualifications for work. They will remind me—these chroniclers of modern social history—that many offered to do national work and that only quite a small handful actually were provided with employment. It was a depressing episode which did much to damp the spirits of the willing. A little later came the National Registration of men and women. The registration of the men meant business, but the registration of the women seemed only to mean a compliment. This view of the matter is also true. And from yet a third quarter we may learn that many women want work and are quite unable to find the occupation for which they are suited, since the war has annihilated demands for certain classes of labour.

Yes, all these several accounts must be accepted as correct. But it may be worth while to notice unpleasing facts in the hope that by thinking about them some means may be found for making them less unsatisfactory.

The prime fact is that the nation wants a great deal of help. Other facts must be adjusted so that more help may be rendered. Notwithstanding all the splendid efforts which women are making on behalf of their country—efforts which have made many slow-thinking men suddenly realise that women cannot be left outside the nation's active life—there does remain a very considerable residue of youngish unmarried women. Go the rounds of the seaside places and what do you find? A procession of smartly dressed girls walking up and down the esplanade, gossiping and listening occasionally to the dance music of the band. There is a rivalry in the matter of transparent stockings and light shoes, completed in the evening by opulent fur coats. (In Scarborough a fur coat of Petrograd warmth and a broad Yorkshire accent invariably go together.) Some of these girls are having holidays and some are perhaps recovering from illness. But their number is quite out of proportion to that of the men, most of whom, as we know, are pledged not to make holiday during this time of tremendous pressure. Among the advertisements in the North Country papers are many demands for women to work in munition factories at rates of wages which, though low, are much better than women's factory wages used to be. I may be told that many middle-class girls are not very strong, and that they will get headaches and become knocked up if they put in a regular day of factory labour. But what about British men who are not merely knocked up, but knocked out? It seems to me that we may be too gingerly in our treatment of women's health. We may do too much saving and "bottling" for the future. It is not clear that health which is persistently spared is sure to be good and available at a distant future date. I used to read that if you cut a fresh rose and put sealing wax at the end of the stalk, it would remain lovely for an indefinite time. I never tried the experiment, so I offer no opinion on this plan of bottling up the rose's charm. But a woman's utility cannot be thus preserved. If her health is not worn by work at the end of twenty years, the chances are that it will be weakened by rheumatism or neuritis or by loss of memory or (worst of all) by the loss of the working method. Life should be used when it is at its best, and by use its faculties will be developed.

Many people have been quite surprised to discover that women can do regular work with positive benefit to their health when they are paid enough wages to enable them to be well fed and when the hours of work are not excessive. But the results of this discovery are not applied widely enough. People appear to think in a very muddled way when they turn their thoughts to the employment of young middle-class unmarried women. Persons of a certain way of thinking demand that these girls should look ornamental and do extremely little. They are content if the girls go to an occasional working party or put in a few hours a week at a canteen. Folk of a rather different type are eager that the roughest jobs should be done by girls of the highest education. They want girls to cut short their college education and do charing in the hospital wards. If they asked that greater facilities should be given to such girls to become engineers, chemists, doctors, Civil servants, or municipal officers, I should think them quite right. But they sometimes appear to wish women to step down in the scale of service for the stepping down's sake.

We shall not, I imagine, get a system of compulsory employment for unmarried women, and this for many reasons, the foremost of them being that the wishes of women could not be expressed through their Parliamentary representatives, since they have none. We can only hope for a stiffening of public opinion on the subject—such a stiffening as may make girls feel uncomfortable to be seen loafing about the streets for hours during the working part of the day. We must also hope that more systematic efforts will be made to train girls for skilled employment. Many branch [illegible] may learn that many women want work and are quite unable to find the occupation for which they are suited, since the war has annihilated demands for certain classes of labour.

Yes, all these several accounts must be accepted as correct. But it may be worth while to notice unpleasing facts in the hope that by thinking about them some means may be found for making them less unsatisfactory.

The prime fact is that the nation wants a great deal of help. Other facts must be adjusted so that more help may be rendered. Notwithstanding all the splendid efforts which women are making on behalf of their country—efforts which have made many slow-thinking men suddenly realise that women cannot be left outside the nation's active life—there does remain a very considerable residue of youngish unmarried women. Go the rounds of the seaside places and what do you find? A procession of smartly dressed girls walking up and down the esplanade, gossiping and listening occasionally to the dance music of the band. There is a rivalry in the matter of transparent stockings and light shoes, completed in the evening by opulent fur coats. (In Scarborough a fur coat of Petrograd warmth and a broad Yorkshire accent invariably go together.) Some of these girls are having holidays and some are perhaps recovering from illness. But their number is quite out of proportion to that of the men, most of whom, as we know, are pledged not to make holiday during this time of tremendous pressure. Among the advertisements in the North Country papers are many demands for women to work in munition factories at rates of wages which, though low, are much better than women's factory wages used to be. I may be told that many middle-class girls are not very strong, and that they will get headaches and become knocked up if they put in a regular day of factory labour. But what about British men who are not merely knocked up, but knocked out? It seems to me that we may be too gingerly in our treatment of women's health. We may do too much saving and "bottling" for the future. It is not clear that health which is persistently spared is sure to be good and available at a distant future date. I used to read that if you cut a fresh rose and put sealing wax at the end of the stalk, it would remain lovely for an indefinite time. I never tried the experiment, so I offer no opinion on this plan of bottling up the rose's charm. But a woman's utility cannot be thus preserved. If her health is not worn by work at the end of twenty years, the chances are that it will be weakened by rheumatism or neuritis or by loss of memory or (worst of all) by the loss of the working method. Life should be used when it is at its best, and by use its faculties will be developed.

Many people have been quite surprised to discover that women can do regular work with positive benefit to their health when they are paid enough wages to enable them to be well fed and when the hours of work are not excessive. But the results of this discovery are not applied widely enough. People appear to think in a very muddled way when they turn their thoughts to the employment of young middle-class unmarried women. Persons of a certain way of thinking demand that these girls should look ornamental and do extremely little. They are content if the girls go to an occasional working party or put in a few hours a week at a canteen. Folk of a rather different type are eager that the roughest jobs should be done by girls of the highest education. They want girls to cut short their college education and do charing in the hospital wards. If they asked that greater facilities should be given to such girls to become engineers, chemists, doctors, Civil servants, or municipal officers, I should think them quite right. But they sometimes appear to wish women to step down in the scale of service for the stepping down's sake.

We shall not, I imagine, get a system of compulsory employment for unmarried women, and this for many reasons, the foremost of them being that the wishes of women could not be expressed through their Parliamentary representatives, since they have none. We can only hope for a stiffening of public opinion on the subject—such a stiffening as may make girls feel uncomfortable to be seen loafing about the streets for hours during the working part of the day. We must also hope that more systematic efforts will be made to train girls for skilled employment. Many largish towns, for example, are still without any good commercial classes for girls and are equally unable to offer their girls a thorough training in dressmaking, gardening, dairy work, or poultry management. Hospital training has become much more generally accessible since the establishment all over the country of V.A.D. hospitals, which give girls an opportunity of testing their aptitude for a professional nurse's life. But if professional, commercial, and agricultural training could be more extensively offered to girls by local bodies—an "if" which depends largely on the election of women members to the town and county councils—we should find ourselves far on the way towards utilising the work of our female unemployed.

UNWANTED WOMEN.

A "SLACKER'S" REPLY.

A writer in "The Daily Mail" on Monday, in paying tribute to the splendid war work of the majority of women, indicted a minority of "unsplendid women," including those who give themselves a good time under the pretext that they are "giving the boys a good time," unoccupied educated women in the homes of well-to-do parents, and single women living aimless lives in boarding-houses.

Here is the other side of the story, as presented by a woman "slacker":

Take my own case.

At first, like many another, I did not realise that the grip of war was going to tighten so relentlessly on our country. But when I did realise it I took a survey of the situation in order to see "where I came in" in the national scheme of things.

I have been a working woman all my life—first as a fully qualified teacher, then as a specialist in certain directions in business. I have known all my life that I have none of the essential qualities of a nurse, and the only part of teaching that was too much for me was the more or less continuous standing.

So it followed logically that I should be useless to my country either as a V.A.D. nurse or as a munition worker or canteen helper because of the constant standing that would be necessary. But I offered my services voluntarily in connection with the details of the particular business with which I was acquainted, and I also, at a later period, offered myself as a voluntary helper in connection with national educational movements which I read were being organised at the time, in view of difficulties after the war.

In both cases my offer was refused. My services were not required.

Now, the question remains: Ought I to have offered my services for nursing or for those other branches of help when I knew perfectly well that I should very soon have been knocked up by them?

* * * * *

I think all reasonable people will admit that I should have been far more bother than I was worth if I had done so. It was surely more sensible for me to make the decision myself than to force it upon the nation.

And I take it that there are others in the same case as myself. We are not doing definite war work because there is no niche for us.

That, our critics will say, is an easy excuse to make. Naturally the work will not come running after us. Unless we look for it and are really keen about it, the nation has no use for us.

Quite so!

But I know of many cases where women have written and visited and inquired and filled up papers about all sorts of different kinds of war work, and still their services have been —more or less politely—refused.

I know of women who have gone to big business establishments and enumerated their different practical capabilities, ending up with the remark, "Now, if you can make use of me in any of these directions, and in so doing release a man, I am willing to work without wages for the duration of the war, so that you can afford to pay his full salary to his dependents." And the answer has been that while the firm fully appreciate the generosity of the offer, they really cannot accept it. They prefer to appoint ineligible men and pay them a salary.

And the woman who has offered her services has seen the justice of this, for so long as there are men at home who are ineligible for fighting, and so long as they can do the work that is required, it is certainly more fair to give it to them and pay them a salary than to employ a woman who does not want the money.

But when, as a result of the refusal of her offer, the woman is left, feeling that her conscience is clear, to go on with the usual routine of her life, it is a little hard on her to be accused of being a slacker.

* * * * *

Then I know many other women who answered the call to work on the land, only to be informed that their services were not required. I know of other women who have offered their services for munition work and been told that there were no more vacancies.

Perhaps that was so at the moment; but surely the businesslike thing for the labour organisers to have done would have been to keep a waiting list and let suitable candidates' names be put down on it so that they could be communicated with when vacancies did occur.

I believe if a census were taken of those women who have been so sweepingly condemned for not doing their national duty, the reason for their apparent slackness would be found to be, almost without exception, one of two—either physical disability (which probably is not apparent to the observer) or rejection for the work they have offered to do.

* * * * *

Naturally, when women come to talk over this constant repetition of the stereotyped phrase telling them that while their offer is appreciated there is no vacancy for them, they wonder what the reason is.

And the majority have decided that it is because there are more women volunteers than the nation knows what to do with. I know that at the present moment there is a cry for more nurses. More girls are asked to begin qualifying for ambulance work and home nursing, so that they can do probationers' work in the hospitals.

I frankly confess that I was astonished when I became aware of this cry during the last month or two. For if the authorities will carry their memories back to the early days of the war, they will remember that it began to be asserted on all sides that they were wailing against the fact that every woman who wanted to "help" immediately seized on the notion that she was a born nurse.

Girls flocked to the ambulance and home nursing classes at the evening schools and polytechnic institutes throughout the kingdom, and the general impression that most women received was that this particular avenue was being overcrowded. We heard of girls passing the necessary examinations and never being wanted anywhere because others had preceded them.

But apparently there was some miscalculation somewhere. As a mere woman citizen I will, of course, refrain from suggesting where that miscalculation lay.

Sunday Times
8. 10. 16

679c/8

679c
Daily News + Leader
3. 10. 16

THE NEED FOR WOMEN WORKERS

IS COMPULSION POSSIBLE?

By HAROLD COX.

Within the last few weeks the public has begun to realise that a good deal of the enthusiastic praise which earlier in the war was being lavished upon women as a body for their patriotic exertions ought to have been more discriminating. It now transpires from careful estimates that there still remain a very large number of women who might be drawn upon for war work and who have not undertaken war work of any kind. Yet the call for women workers is even more imperative than it was in the earlier days of the war. The Army is using up men with increasing rapidity. We must maintain the strength of our regiments in the field and we can only do this by withdrawing more and more of the manhood of the nation from civilian employment. The places of the men withdrawn must either be left empty or filled by women.

WHERE WORKERS ARE NEEDED.

Yet the women do not come forward in adequate numbers. That is the broad fact which emerges from the absence of response to the recently issued advertisement by the Ministry of Munitions inviting application from women for free training as munition workers. This free training is given in some half-dozen centres in London, organised by the London County Council. The Ministry of Munitions called for 1,000 women students a week. At several of the institutions named only two or three applications were received in the first two days after this appeal was issued. It is fair to add that in previous months a considerable number of women had taken advantage of the free training offered by these institutions.

Altogether some 20,000 women have gone through the County Council free training schools for munition workers. But the supply of volunteers seems to have nearly dried up and the urgent question is whether it is possible to discover any means of renewing the supply. Women workers are needed not only in munition works, but also in other forms of industry from which men are being withdrawn. For example, women milkers are badly needed in order to keep up our dairying industry. The importance of that industry to the health of the nation is obvious. Yet unless women milkers can be found it will be necessary for farmers to send to the butcher many of their milch cows.

Again, in Government offices there is an unsatisfied demand for women clerks. Most of the work for which these women clerks are wanted is of an extremely simple character, requiring no previous training, but as very few educated women volunteer for this work the Government is being often compelled to employ incompetent women, who may be relied upon to make blunders over even the simplest work. There is also still a demand for hospital nurses. A great many women workers in the earlier days of the war voluntarily took up hospital work. But it has now become necessary to appoint a committee to consider from what sources more women can be obtained for the absolutely essential work in military hospitals.

THE CASE FOR COMPULSION.

Thus there can be no question of the strength of the demand for more women workers. There may conceivably be many removable obstacles to the employment of women who would be willing to be employed but fail to get into touch with the kind of employment they want. But it is to be feared that beyond this consideration there is a more serious obstacle.

Broadly we have to face the fact that there are a large number of women in the well-to-do classes, and in classes which are only moderately well-to-do, who find themselves adequately supported from outside sources and have not the slightest desire to do work of any kind. It is this great body of unemployed women that somehow or another has to be reached.

The question that naturally arises is why women of this type should be exempt from the compulsion which has been applied to the majority of the men in the country. Those men of military age who refused to enlist voluntarily—happily they were a small minority—have been compelled by law to serve their country in the field. Is there any overwhelming reason why women—and also unoccupied men—who are capable of industrial or clerical work should not be compelled to undertake such work at their country's call? After all, it is a very small obligation in comparison with that imposed upon the men of fighting age.

PRACTICAL DIFFICULTIES.

When, however, we come to the practical question of how compulsion is to be applied multitudes of difficulties arise. One obvious proposal is to place a special tax upon all unoccupied women, to be accompanied by a similar tax on men who are not doing work that directly helps the war. But a little thought will show that such a tax could not be fairly levied except with great discrimination. For example, a woman whose husband is working in a munitions factory and who has to prepare his food as well as to look after two or three children cannot fairly be described as unoccupied although she is doing no direct industrial work.

On the other hand, it may easily happen that the husband gets most of his meals out, that the children are able to look after themselves, and that his wife has very little to do. Many women who find themselves in that position are already working; others are idling. But clearly it is extremely difficult to impose any general tax which would be fair unless accompanied by some searching investigation into the circumstances of each case.

Again, there is the question of the amount of the tax. A tax of 2s. or 3s. a week would be sufficient to compel a woman of the working classes to undertake industrial work, but it would have no similar effect on a woman of the well-to-do classes. A tax to be fair must necessarily take account of the resources of the payer.

It is, however, open to consideration whether it would not be possible to make use of the national register taken last autumn in order to effect the purpose in view. Women as well as men were then registered, but except for a few intermittent inquiries little use has been made of the women's side of the register. It ought to be possible now to make full use of the information obtained. To do so it would be necessary to establish tribunals for women analogous to the tribunals established for men for military service.

Admittedly it would not be possible actually to compel a woman to work as the nation can compel a man to fight, but it would be possible to say to every woman who had no adequate excuse for refusing to work that she must either undertake certain specified work or pay a sufficiently heavy tax to make her leisure costly to herself and productive of revenue to the State. And the same alternative should be given to men who are engaged in money-producing and not in war-aiding occupations.

WOMEN WHO DO NOT WORK.

Conscription for All?

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—Has not the time arrived for the conscription of women of all classes not already employed on women's work, for war work, as a complement to the conscription of men?

Most adult women are already fully occupied on their indispensable duties as mothers and wives, and, say schoolmistresses; and of the remainder, many are voluntary war workers, just as most men had enlisted previous to conscription. What, then, is the need for female conscription? Let us define female conscription. It means that the State can compel a woman to work, and to work not at what the woman wishes or has been used to, but as is most necessary to the State, and consistent with the female conscript's faculties—i.e., that the woman with private means may be made to work, and also deprived of her "lady's maid," who will be set to some more useful work.

Let us recall the arguments for conscription of six months ago, and the results of conscription. It brought in many men who were not shirkers, but who reasoned: "If I am wanted I shall be fetched" and "Why should I go while my neighbours stop at home?" There were logical trade unionists who would not volunteer; but were ready to vote for conscription for everyone, including themselves.

This argument will apply to women also. A girl may say: "Why should I slave at hospital cooking or housemaiding, while my cousin plays or plays at work?" The Countess may say: "Why should I give up my lady's maid? I can pay her more, and she likes it better than munition work"; but the Countess has had to give up her son.

But besides the above argument there are reasons especially applying to women—good, bad, or indifferent—why conscription is necessary. There is the natural shrinking of the quiet, middle-aged woman from publicity and promiscuity, influencing the great mass of the easied classes who cherish those ideals which constitute the delicacy of the English lady. They are "shocked" (I use the word of malice aforethought) at the pictures of more strenuous ladies that appear in the illustrated Press with various titles to distinction and various costumes.

There are thousands of quiet spinsters between the ages of 25 and 55 living sad and lonely lives in boarding-houses and flats who are quite patriotic, and could and would do useful work; but they want to be asked. They are shy to come forward; just as in other days they could not ask a man to love or to marry them. They need to be guided.

Then there is an unhappy class of women who are dependent on some selfish taskmistress, sometimes a malade imaginaire; sometimes a rich relation; and these can only be liberated by the strong arm of the law. Perhaps those who could be most easily spared would be the last to come voluntarily—the most ingenious to find excuses; the solitary shrew, the parasite, the unliveable, the unloveable, the stall-fed, the hypochondriac who always breakfasts in bed.

There is need of a law to say all available women shall work, and shall work in the way best suited to them and the public needs. Apart from the national interest, a far happier destiny may await these—well, drones—if they are made to work.

There are physical limitations and adaptations of work which only conscription can apply, e.g., a woman of forty who has never worked cannot and must not be allowed to instantly do an eight hours' day and seven days a week; but, beginning gently, she can be trained to concert and she must be properly fed. Mocking ridicule has been abundantly poured on women attempting work for which they were at all events in the first instance unsuited, as, e.g., the skilled labour of milking cows and the skilled and heavy work of ploughing. But many a man, both in and out of khaki, is doing, and doing well, work he never practised before Bank Holiday, 1914; and women are, to say the least, as adaptable as men. With legal conscription there can be a regulated organisation and training, whether the conscript woman is to be a nurse, a munition worker, or to replace a soldier days of the war. The Army is using up men with increasing rapidity. We must maintain the strength of our regiments in the field and we can only do this by withdrawing more and more of the manhood of the nation from civilian employment. The places of the men withdrawn must either be left empty or filled by women.

WHERE WORKERS ARE NEEDED.

Yet the women do not come forward in adequate numbers. That is the broad fact which emerges from the absence of response to the recently issued advertisement by the Ministry of Munitions inviting application from women for free training as munition workers. This free training is given in some half-dozen centres in London, organised by the London County Council. The Ministry of Munitions called for 1,000 women students a week. At several of the institutions named only two or three applications were received in the first two days after this appeal was issued. It is fair to add that in previous months a considerable number of women had taken advantage of the free training offered by these institutions.

Altogether some 20,000 women have gone through the County Council free training schools for munition workers. But the supply of volunteers seems to have nearly dried up and the urgent question is whether it is possible to discover any means of renewing the supply. Women workers are needed not only in munition works, but also in other forms of industry from which men are being withdrawn. For example, women milkers are badly needed in order to keep up our dairying industry. The importance of that industry to the health of the nation is obvious. Yet unless women milkers can be found it will be necessary for farmers to send to the butcher many of their milch cows.

Again, in Government offices there is an unsatisfied demand for women clerks. Most of the work for which these women clerks are wanted is of an extremely simple character, requiring no previous training, but as very few educated women volunteer for this work the Government is being often compelled to employ incompetent women, who may be relied upon to make blunders over even the simplest work. There is also still a demand for hospital nurses. A great many women workers in the earlier days of the war voluntarily took up hospital work. But it has now become necessary to appoint a committee to consider from what sources more women can be obtained for the absolutely essential work in military hospitals.

any overwhelming reason why women and also unoccupied men—who are capable of industrial or clerical work should not be compelled to undertake such work at their country's call? After all, it is a very small obligation in comparison with that imposed upon the men of fighting age.

PRACTICAL DIFFICULTIES.

When, however, we come to the practical question of how compulsion is to be applied multitudes of difficulties arise. One obvious proposal is to place a special tax upon all unoccupied women, to be accompanied by a similar tax on men who are not doing work that directly helps the war. But a little thought will show that such a tax could not be fairly levied except with great discrimination. For example, a woman whose husband is working in a munitions factory and who has to prepare his food as well as to look after two or three children cannot fairly be described as unoccupied although she is doing no direct industrial work.

On the other hand, it may easily happen that the husband gets most of his meals out, that the children are able to look after themselves, and that his wife has very little to do. Many women who find themselves in that position are already working; others are idling. But clearly it is extremely difficult to impose any general tax which would be fair unless accompanied by some searching investigation into the circumstances of each case.

Again, there is the question of the amount of the tax. A tax of 2s. or 3s. a week would be sufficient to compel a woman of the working classes to undertake industrial work, but it would have no similar effect on a woman of the well-to-do classes. A tax to be fair must necessarily take account of the resources of the payer.

It is, however, open to consideration whether it would not be possible to make use of the national register taken last autumn in order to effect the purpose in view. Women as well as men were then registered, but except for a few intermittent inquiries little use has been made of the women's side of the register. It ought to be possible now to make full use of the information obtained. To do so it would be necessary to establish tribunals for women analogous to the tribunals established for men for military service.

Admittedly it would not be possible actually to compel a woman to work as the nation can compel a man to fight, but it would be possible to say to every woman who had no adequate excuse for refusing to work that she must either undertake certain specified work or pay a sufficiently heavy tax to make her leisure costly to herself and productive of revenue to the State. And the same alternative should be given to men who are engaged in money-producing and not in war-aiding occupations.

faculties—i.e., that the woman with private means may be made to work, and also deprived of her "lady's maid," who will be set to some more useful work.

Let us recall the arguments for conscription of six months ago, and the results of conscription. It brought in many men who were not shirkers, but who reasoned: "If I am wanted I shall be fetched" and "Why should I go while my neighbours stop at home?" There were logical trade unionists who would not volunteer; but were ready to vote for conscription for everyone, including themselves.

This argument will apply to women also. A girl may say: "Why should I slave at hospital cooking or housemaiding, while my cousin plays or plays at work?" The Countess may say: "Why should I give up my lady's maid? I can pay her more, and she likes it better than munition work"; but the Countess has had to give up her son.

But besides the above argument there are reasons especially applying to women—good, bad, or indifferent—why conscription is necessary. There is the natural shrinking of the quiet, middle-aged woman from publicity and promiscuity, influencing the great mass of the easied classes who cherish those ideals which constitute the delicacy of the English lady. They are "shocked" (I use the word of malice aforethought) at the pictures of more strenuous ladies that appear in the illustrated Press with various titles to distinction and various costumes.

There are thousands of quiet spinsters between the ages of 25 and 55 living sad and lonely lives in boarding-houses and flats who are quite patriotic, and could and would do useful work; but they want to be asked. They are shy to come forward; just as in other days they could not ask a man to love or to marry them. They need to be guided.

Then there is an unhappy class of women who are dependent on some selfish taskmistress, sometimes a malade imaginaire; sometimes a rich relation; and these can only be liberated by the strong arm of the law. Perhaps those who could be most easily spared would be the last to come voluntarily—the most ingenious to find excuses; the solitary shrew, the parasite, the unliveable, the unloveable, the stall-fed, the hypochondriac who always breakfasts in bed.

There is need of a law to say all available women shall work, and shall work in the way best suited to them and the public needs. Apart from the national interest, a far happier destiny may await these—well, drones—if they are made to work.

There are physical limitations and adaptations of work which only conscription can apply, e.g., a woman of forty who has never worked cannot and must not be allowed to instantly do an eight hours' day and seven days a week; but, beginning gently, she can be trained to concert and she must be properly fed. Mocking ridicule has been abundantly poured on women attempting work for which they were at all events in the first instance unsuited, as, e.g., the skilled labour of milking cows and the skilled and heavy work of ploughing. But many a man, both in and out of khaki, is doing, and doing well, work he never practised before Bank Holiday, 1914; and women are, to say the least, as adaptable as men. With legal conscription there can be a regulated organisation and training; whether the conscript woman is to be a nurse, a munition worker, or to replace a soldier in civilian duties.

For those ladies who have no special gifts there is open a position apparently humble but really most useful, and therefore the noblest—the female hospital orderly. Trained nurses are indispensable in a hospital, and a few strong men are necessary to lift the patient to the operating room and elsewhere; but outside this sphere it is a waste to see young trained soldiers or young men fit for soldiers as hospital orderlies when the entire unskilled work of the hospital can be discharged by women.

Lastly, is it fair to make women work? In the name of all that is common sense, women are really the greatest sufferers from a war; and the sooner one brings every effort to bear to bring it to an efficient close the better for women.

W. N. M. G.

London, Oct. 2.

Scotsman. Edinburgh.
3.10.16

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS AND ALTERNATIVE CIVILIAN SERVICE.

MEMORIAL TO THE PRIME MINISTER.

A MEMORIAL has been submitted to the Prime Minister setting out certain considerations with regard to conscientious objectors to military service, who refuse the offer of alternative civilian service. There are 32 names of ladies and gentlemen supporting the document, including those of William Archer, M.A.; Lord Henry Bentinck, the Rev. John Clifford, D.D., B.Sc.; Lord Courtney of Penwith; Samuel Doncaster, managing director of Daniel Doncaster & Sons, Sheffield (controlled establishment), and director of Samuel Fox & Co., Stocksbridge, Sheffield (controlled establishment); P. T. Forsyth, B.D., Principal, Hackney Theological College; Mary Macarthur, J. O. F. Murray, Master of Selwyn.

They say:—"It is not necessary to share the opinions of the men in question (as, in fact, many of us do not share them) to feel an uncompromising hostility to this policy. The men in question may be mistaken, but they are undoubtedly sincere. They have proved their sincerity already by suffering for their beliefs. Such men, whatever they are, are not 'shirkers.' They believe it to be their duty to make their protest in this way against war. Their objection to alternative civilian service is a logical result of their objection to war. If, by civilian service, they release other men for military service, they will, they hold, be sending others to do that which they themselves think it wrong to do. We may be sure that if they consented to do this, they would be accused of cowardly inconsistency, and with reason. On the other hand, if they are left to themselves, they are the kind of men who will make it their main object to serve the community to the best of their ability in ways which their conscience approves.

"The number of these men is not large enough for the issue of the war to be affected one way or the other by their serving or not serving. To shoot them would be to inflict upon them the death penalty not because they have committed any crime, but because they hold certain convictions. They have already been punished for disobedience. It appears, therefore, that their disobedience is to be regarded as a continuing act, and that punishment is to be continued also until they desist from it. Therefore, the more their disobedience is the result of sincere conviction, the more they will be punished for it, so that the offence for which they are to be punished is their conviction itself, and the aim of punishment is to make them recant from that conviction. We believe this to be a precedent of the worst possible omen for the future of liberty in this country."

Daily News & Leader.
3.10.16

PLEA FOR THE MEN OF CONSCIENCE.

Influential Petition to Mr. Asquith.

A plea on behalf of conscientious objectors who refuse the offer of the alternative civilian service has been drawn up in the shape of a memorial bearing the signatures of many influential people and sent to Mr. Asquith. Referring to the position of objectors after their term of imprisonment expires, the petition says:

"It does not appear from Mr. Forster's statement that the men with whom we are now concerned will be regarded as entitled to any further consideration. There is then at least grave risk that they will be condemned to death and shot. . . . Their objection to alternative civilian service is a logical result of their objection to war. If by civilian service they release other men for military service they will, they hold, be sending others to do that which they themselves think it wrong to do. . . . They have already been punished for disobedience. It appears, therefore, that their disobedience is to be regarded as a continuing act and that punishment is to be continued also until they desist from it. We, therefore, respectfully urge that the only course consistent with that policy of respecting conscience which was embodied in the Military Service Act is to give these men the unconditional exemption for which the Act provides and which in fact has been given in other cases where no scruple of conscience is concerned. . . ." The following are the signatories to the memorial:

Mr. William Archer; Councillor Margaret Ashton; Mr. Arnold Bennett; Lord Henry Bentinck; Mr. A. Clutton Brock; Miss Janet Case; Rev. Dr. John Clifford; Lord Courtney of Penwith; Miss Margaret Llewelyn Davies; Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, Fellow, King's Coll., Cambridge; Mr. Leonard Doncaster, Fellow, King's Coll., Cambridge; Mr. Samuel Doncaster, Managing Director of Daniel Doncaster and Sons, Ltd., Sheffield; Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, Vice-Chancellor, Sheffield University; Rev. Dr. P. T. Forsyth, Principal, Hackney Theological College; Sir Edward Fry; Rev. A. E. Garvie, Principal, New College, Hampstead; Rev. R. C. Gillie, [illegible]; Professor A. J. Grant, Leeds University; [illegible]

Daily News & Leader. 679 e
4.10.16
679c/9

"WOMEN WHO DO NOT WORK."

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—Has not the time arrived when the large crowd of busybodies who are wanting to "compel" everybody else should be firmly sat on? If your correspondent "W. N. M. G." will inquire into the way the War Office has treated the V.A.D. nurses and helpers—the very class against whom the new compulsion is to be directed—there will be perhaps more hesitation in recommending the infallible specific: "Conscription."

The idea that the spinsters of 55 want to go into Woolwich Arsenal or some hospital is simply grotesque. As for the pretence that women with selfish taskmistresses need the strong arm of the law to "liberate" them, "W. N. M. G." had better tell that to the women who have been "liberated" by V.A.D. work. Why it is more "liberating" to buy your own uniform and receive no pay in order to be bullied by a hospital matron than it is to be bullied by a "selfish taskmistress" who pays you wages, I have yet to learn.

R S P

Daily News & Leader.
4.10

SHOULD WOMEN BE CONSCRIPTED?

'Slacker' Charges Declared Wholly Unjust.

Some of those in closest touch with the facts are indignant with the correspondent signing himself "W. N. M. G.," who suggested in yesterday's "Daily News" that conscription ought to be applied to women "slackers."

"Perhaps," wrote "W. N. M. G.," "those who could be most easily spared would be the last to come voluntarily—the most ingenious to find excuses; the solitary shrew, the parasite, the unlivable, the unlovable, the stall-fed, the hypochondriac who always breakfasts in bed."

"Does the writer really know what he is talking about?" asked one of the chief organisers of the Women's Service Bureau, which from its offices in Victoria-street, Westminster, has passed many thousands of women into the offices and workshops of the nation. "I don't think he does," she answered, "for our experience is that there are plenty of women volunteers for every vacant job. The whole trouble at the present time is not found in the failure of women to come forward but in the difficulty of training them.

"Hundreds of women anxious for work present themselves at this office every day. Many of them are fairly well educated, but they are entirely unacquainted with the details of any trade or profession. A lot of them are just the sort of 'drones' your correspondent probably has in mind—women who have never done anything much in their lives except play games and travel, and have a good time generally. What we are particularly anxious to do now is to educate them for some occupation. Then there will be no difficulty in their finding work.

"The charges are not only unjust," she added, "but the proposal to apply industrial conscription to women is utterly unpractical. All the Government would acquire would be a huge mass of entirely unskilled labour. What could it do with it? Train it by force? But the whole idea is too visionary for practical discussion."

Special facilities are now available, through the bureau, for training women to become glassblowers, oxy-acetylene welders, dental mechanics, and engineers. There are magnificent openings for women who are willing to take up the mechanical side of dentistry—the making of false teeth, etc.—and those who have gone in for oxy-acetylene welding, which is largely employed in the manufacture of aeroplanes, are doing particularly well. The demand for skilled women in these and other trades is practically unlimited, but their training is naturally a matter of time and effort. The only women whom it is still found difficult to place are quite unskilled women of more than forty years of age.

for the issue of the war to be [illegible] the other by their serving or not serving. To shoot them would be to inflict upon them the death penalty not because they have committed any crime, but because they hold certain convictions. They have already been punished for disobedience. It appears, therefore, that their disobedience is to be regarded as a continuing act, and that punishment is to be continued also until they desist from it. Therefore, the more their disobedience is the result of sincere conviction, the more they will be punished for it, so that the offence for which they are to be punished is their conviction itself, and the aim of punishment is to make them recant from that conviction. We believe this to be a precedent of the worst possible omen for the future of liberty in this country."

Daily News + Leader.

3.10.16

PLEA FOR THE MEN OF CONSCIENCE.

Influential Petition to Mr. Asquith.

A plea on behalf of conscientious objectors who refuse the offer of the alternative civilian service has been drawn up in the shape of a memorial bearing the signatures of many influential people and sent to Mr. Asquith. Referring to the position of objectors after their term of imprisonment expires, the petition says:

"It does not appear from Mr. Forster's statement that the men with whom we are now concerned will be regarded as entitled to any further consideration. There is then at least grave risk that they will be condemned to death and shot. . . . Their objection to alternative civilian service is a logical result of their objection to war. If by civilian service they release other men for military service they will, they hold be sending others to do that which they themselves think it wrong to do. . . . They have already been punished for disobedience. It appears, therefore, that their disobedience is to be regarded as a continuing act and that punishment is to be continued also until they desist from it. We, therefore, respectfully urge that the only course consistent with that policy of respecting conscience which was embodied in the Military Service Act is to give these men the unconditional exemption for which the Act provides and which in fact has been given in other cases where no scruple of conscience is concerned. . . ."

The following are the signatories to the memorial:

Mr. William Archer; Councillor Margaret Ashton; Mr. Arnold Bennett; Lord Henry Bentinck; Mr. A. Clutton Brock; Miss Janet Case; Rev. Dr. John Clifford; Lord Courtney of Penwith; Miss Margaret Llewelyn Davies; Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson, Fellow, King's Coll., Cambridge; Mr. Leonard Doncaster, Fellow, King's Coll., Cambridge; Mr. Samuel Doncaster, Managing Director of Daniel Doncaster and Sons, Ltd., Sheffield; Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, Vice-Chancellor, Sheffield University; Rev. Dr P. T. Forsyth, Principal, Hackney Theological College; Sir Edward Fry; Rev. A. E. Garvie, Principal, New College, Hampstead; Rev. R. C. Gillie; Professor A. J. Grant, Leeds University; Mr. Edward Grubb; Professor C. H. Herford, Litt.D., Manchester University; Rev. Silas K. Hocking; Mr. W. E. Johnson, Fellow, King's Coll., Cambridge; Miss Susan Lawrence; Rev. F. B. Meyer; Miss Mary Macarthur; Rev. J. O. F. Murray, Master of Selwyn; Rev. W. E. Orchard; Earl Russell; Lady Strachey; Professor G. Unwin, Manchester University; Professor [illegible] were right that he bore with some imtience the presentation of another si

He was accordingly betrayed, on sevei

'Slacker' Charges Declared Wholly Unjust.

Some of those in closest touch with the facts are indignant with the correspondent signing himself "W. N. M. G.," who suggested in yesterday's "Daily News" that conscription ought to be applied to women "slackers."

"Perhaps," wrote "W. N. M. G.," "those who could be most easily spared would be the last to come voluntarily—the most ingenious to find excuses; the solitary shrew, the parasite, the unliveable, the unlovable, the stall-fed, the hypochondriac who always breakfasts in bed."

"Does the writer really know what he is talking about?" asked one of the chief organisers of the Women's Service Bureau, which from its offices in Victoria-street, Westminster, has passed many thousands of women into the offices and workshops of the nation. "I don't think he does," she answered, "for our experience is that there are plenty of women volunteers for every vacant job. The whole trouble at the present time is not found in the failure of women to come forward but in the difficulty of training them.

"Hundreds of women anxious for work present themselves at this office every day. Many of them are fairly well educated, but they are entirely unacquainted with the details of any trade or profession. A lot of them are just the sort of 'drones' your correspondent probably has in mind—women who have never done anything much in their lives except play games and travel, and have a good time generally. What we are particularly anxious to do now is to educate them for some occupation. Then there will be no difficulty in their finding work.

"The charges are not only unjust," she added, "but the proposal to apply industrial conscription to women is utterly unpractical. All the Government would acquire would be a huge mass of entirely unskilled labour. What could it do with it? Train it by force? But the whole idea is too visionary for practical discussion."

Special facilities are now available, through the bureau, for training women to become glassblowers, oxy-acetylene welders, dental mechanics, and engineers. There are magnificent openings for women who are willing to take up the mechanical side of dentistry—the making of false teeth, etc.—and those who have gone in for oxy-acetylene welding, which is largely employed in the manufacture of aeroplanes, are doing particularly well. The demand for skilled women in these and other trades is practically unlimited, but their training is naturally a matter of time and effort. The only women whom it is still found difficult to place are quite unskilled women of more than forty years of age.

The Star
4. 10. 16

WOMEN ARE NOT "SLACKERS."

The Female Conscription Suggestion.

Some of those in closest touch with the facts are indignant with the correspondent signing himself "W. N. M. G.," who suggested that conscription ought to be applied to women "slackers."

"Perhaps," wrote "W. N. M. G.," "those who could be most easily spared would be the last to come voluntarily—the most ingenious to find excuses; the solitary shrew, the parasite, the unliveable, the unlovable, the stall-fed, the hypochondriac who always breakfasts in bed."

"Does the writer really know what he is talking about?" asked one of the chief organisers of the Women's Service Bureau, which from its offices in Victoria-street, Westminster, has passed many thousands of women into the offices and workshops of the nation. "I don't think he does," she answered, "for our experience is that there are plenty of women volunteers for every vacant job. The whole trouble at the present time is not found in the failure of women to come forward but in the difficulty of training them.

Anxious for Work.

"Hundreds of women anxious for work present themselves at this office every day. Many of them are fairly well educated, but they are entirely unacquainted with the details of any trade or profession. A lot of them are just the sort of 'drones' your correspondent probably has in mind—women who have never done anything much in their lives except play games and travel, and have a good time generally What we are particularly anxious to do now is to educate them for some occupation. Then there will be no difficulty in their finding work.

"The charges are not only unjust," she added, "but the proposal to apply industrial conscription to women is utterly unpractical. All the Government would acquire would be a huge mass of entirely unskilled labour. What could it do with it? Train it by force? But the whole idea is too visionary for practical discussion."

Special Facilities.

Special facilities are now available, through the bureau, for training women to become glassblowers, oxy-acetylene welders, dental mechanics, and engineers. There are magnificent openings for women who are willing to take up the mechanical side of dentistry—the making of false teeth, etc.—and those who have gone in for oxy-acetylene welding, which is largely employed in the manufacture of aeroplanes, are doing particularly well. The demand for skilled women in these and other trades is practically unlimited, but their training is naturally a matter of time and effort. The only women whom it is still found difficult to place are quite unskilled women of more than forty years of age.

Daily News & Leader
5. 10. 16

679

679

"WOMEN WHO NOT WORK"

—And "Men Who Will Not!"

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—I admire "W. N. M. G.'s" letter on "Conscription for All." I would like it to be for all. He mentions women of between 25 and 55 who would be willing to do useful work. Yes, they are willing; but what about the men of between 41 and 55—plenty of strong, capable men who will not work and at present cannot be made to. They are living lazy, useless lives in these strenuous days, and should be compelled to show that they are doing useful work for their country—not necessarily fighting. We can all do something; and if we do not do it voluntarily, we should be compelled. Certainly let it be "Conscription for All."

PHOEBE GOODWIN.

Highgate, Oct. 3.

"Exploited Women Labour."

Sir,—I have read with interest the letter of your anonymous correspondent on "Conscription for Women." I note that whereas men are conscripted up to the age of 40, it is suggested that women of 40 should be compelled to start work, and work up to the age of 55—a critical period. No doubt this matter could be regulated by a medical board of male doctors, with the brilliant results achieved hitherto in the medical examination of men.

It will not, of course, be necessary to investigate how many thousands of women seeking work are still on the Labour Exchange Registers, nor how many university educated women cannot find work at reasonable salaries, while the Government is at a loss to find educated women at the driving salary it offers. Nor how many women cannot undertake V.A.D. work because they cannot afford to work for nothing, or for the ridiculous gratuity offered.

We have constant appeals for educated women to go on the land and pick hops for 15s. a week—finding their own food, with "allowances" of barns to sleep and do their own cooking in, and straw to fill their own empty mattress cases. And now the glorious vista opens before us of a mighty England conscripting her grandmothers, while her young men in Government offices and factories, in batches of 25, initial documents which are the epitome of fraud and corruption.

It is quite amazing that a vicious sex appeal to penalise "the solitary shrew, the unlikeable, and the unlovable" should be made a ground for conscripting women, and it would be interesting to know how, even with this charming and inspiring docket, women can be forcibly transformed into the drudges which unfortunately so many women have too eagerly and generously rushed to become—so earning for themselves the cynical sneer of a correspondent of the "Times" (Sept. 27) that "with no sense of their own value and a keen desire to make martyrs of themselves," women are also themselves to blame for their circumstances.

B. S. PIGOTT.

Oct. 4.

For Compulsion.

Sir,—"W. N. M. G." is right. It is time that women were called up. There are scores who would like to work for their country, but who do not dare to push themselves forward. I had always hoped that registration was for the purpose of calling up women, as well as men, to serve their country.

It would be the salvation of hundreds of women to be compelled to work. It would enlarge their minds to be forced to mix with others. Work—and proper rations—would improve their health and develop their minds.

As to the age limit, there is no such thing if people would keep themselves fit.

A WOMAN OF SIXTY.

Sheffield Telegraph
11.10.16

DEFENCE OF WOMEN'S WORK.

At the Bakewell Urban Tribunal, over which Mr. A. H. Kerr (agent to the Duke of Rutland's Haddon Estate) presided, a number of cases where men had been passed for sedentary labour and other work abroad, were adjourned.

The master at the Bakewell Workhouse, aged 39, married, who had been passed for home service only, was appealed for by Mr. A. Hawes (clerk to the Board of Guardians), who, on their behalf, stated that he was now the only male officer at the institution, the labour master and porter having joined the army, the former as a reservist.

The case was adjourned.

The Superintendent of an Assurance Company, appealing for an assistant superintendent at Bakewell, married, with four children, observed that he had appointed a few local women to act as collectors and canvassers in the district, but apparently the first thing they did was to "make a muddle of the books."

The Military Representative (Captain W. K. Pritchard): Your sneer against women who are doing their bit is entirely uncalled for. If that is your only objection, it doesn't in my opinion, amount to very much.

The Superintendent: We have to train these women for the work.

The case was adjourned.

The question of two of the Bakewell slaughtermen doing the work for the other butchers in the town was left in abeyance for a time.

It was stated that a woman yeast merchant, whose motor-van driver had been called up, was learning to drive herself.

Mr. C. H. Glossop (a member of the Tribunal): So many people say to us that their employees are indispensable that it is a credit to this woman to find that she is trying to do a lot of the work herself. (Hear, hear.)

Daily News & Leader.
6.10.16

THE UNWANTED WOMAN.

The Case of the Middle-aged.

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—One reason given by "W. N. M. G." for the conscription of women is that the middle-aged woman would have a chance; also that she would be trained gently and gradually by a nice motherly Government.

It sounds all right. But there are hundreds, and perhaps thousands of women, of from 35 to 40 years of age who put their names down at Labour Bureaus at the beginning of the war as willing to be trained for any work; and they are still waiting.

It is not conscription that is required, but a different idea of the value of women's labour by employers. Women have shown conclusively that they can soon adapt themselves to various kinds of labour. But in order to get employment they must be young. Yet we cannot all be from 16 to 19; nor, unfortunately, do we remain at 35.

The woman of 40 has very little chance, however active, willing, capable, or adaptable she may be. She lacks that "smartness" which is considered an essential by employers—"smartness" which would not sit well on a woman of 40 did she assume it. It is a libel on women as a body to say that they require to be conscripted in order to make them work. Gradually women are filling all trades and professions; thousands have been trained during the last two years to take men's places.

Further, I think there is now very little of that shocked feeling of which your correspondent speaks regarding honest work of whatever sort.

A WORKER AT HOME.

Oct. 5.

"Should Women be Conscripted?"

Sir,—Two paragraphs in your issue today leave me in doubt as to which to believe. Under the above title it is stated: "There are plenty of women volunteers for every vacancy; the whole trouble at the present time is not found in the failure of women to come forward, but in the difficulty of training them. Hundreds of women anxious for work present themselves at this office every day."

Lower down, in the same column, you announce that the Ministry of Munitions is asking for women to undergo training at the technical centres in the London district, and elsewhere. What is one to believe?

A SOLITARY SHREW.

Oct. 4.

Daily News & Leader. 679
7.10.16

WOMEN AND WAR-WORK.

The Willing and Unwilling

To the Editor of "The Daily News."

Sir,—Would it not be as well for those women who lay down the law for others and advocate "conscription for all women" to quietly ask themselves whether they are doing all they might to help their country? They are apparently women of leisure, and possibly money, so could find work without conscription in unostentatiously seeking out their less fortunate sisters, whose homes have been broken up, and whose husbands are at the Front; and by rendering them service in many little ways they would still be helping their country.

Women have volunteered willingly to release men for fighting, but one must not overlook the fact that there are many willing enough, but physically unfit to go out every day in all weathers. These, of course, under conscription, need not expect any consideration or exemption from the Medical Board (judging by the treatment already meted out to unfit men), so that when their husbands return from the Front, possibly wounded or chronic invalids, they would find neglected homes and invalid wives to add to their burden. Truly a cheerful prospect!

Conscription for all women would be an economic failure. There would always be slackers, and the usual injustice to others. One can only appeal to women collectively, and try to realise, being ignorant of their circumstances, that they too "also serve who only stand and wait."

(Mrs.) M. MONTAGU SKINNER.

5, Bramshill-gardens, N.W.

"Waiting" Lists.

Sir,—Your correspondents appear to me to write from the standpoint that female labour is unobtainable. My inquiries lead me to the exactly opposite conclusion. I am informed that there are long waiting lists at all the banks, insurance offices and post offices; and in one provincial town there are upwards of 100 applicants for tramcar conductorships and 150 for those on the vehicles (motor and horse) of the local company, and not one vacancy.

J. P. BACON PHILLIPS.

Crowhurst Rectory, Sussex.

Volunteers and Pressed Service.

Sir,—Is the growing freedom of women so irksome to "W. N. M. G." that he must needs agitate for it to be taken away before it has well nigh come?

The voluntary going of women into the nation's workshops is just what is needed to widen their outlook and to give them a more intelligent grasp of the great problems of life and government. If, however, they are conscripted into it the value is gone; for there can be no interest or enthusiasm for self-improvement where it is pressed service.

Again, surely it should be the women who should decide whether there should be conscription for women, and not men.

D. M. M. B.

Derby, Oct. 5.

Women and the War.

Sir,—I fully agree with "W. N. M. G." upon the subject of conscription for women within certain ages. Why men should have to do all the fighting and working I cannot understand.

It is, of course, true that a few women are driving cars about, which could be better done by discharged soldiers, that some are at work in munition works, for which they receive splendid pay, and that some are at work on the land. I cannot, however, see where their patriotism comes in.

Women have more to gain by the winning of the war than men; therefore, if there is conscription for men's lives there should be for women's labour.

M. E. W.

Ilford.

9c/11

NEED FOR WOMEN WORKERS.

SOME REPLIES TO MR. HAROLD COX.

THE DIFFICULTY OF FINDING POSITIONS.

The article by Mr. Harold Cox, published in the last issue of THE SUNDAY TIMES, on the need for Women Workers, has brought us a large number of letters, also the reply, printed below, from Miss Mary Cornwall. A selection from these letters is printed herewith.

A further article by Mr. Hardd Cox will be found on page 7.

MORE WORKERS THAN POSITIONS.

By MARY CORNWAL.

Mr. Harold Cox's article in lat Sunday's SUNDAY TIMES is one which will cause a good deal of amazement, not urnixed with indignation, amongst those women workers who during the last few monthshave either been seeking work or helping others to come into touch with employers of labour.

If the call for women workers is so imperative, how is it that the Labou Exchanges are daily turning away women applicants, educated and otherwise, both fr munition, farm, and clerical work.

BROKEN PROMISS.

To take Mr. Cox's first complaint re the Ministry of Munitions' offer offree training to intending female munition orkers. Mr. Cox admits that "a considerale number of women" took advantage of te free training some months ago, but thatnow only two or three applications a wek are being received. The reason is simple—the girls who took the free training hae not got the posts they were promised. Sme have work certainly, but the majority ae only getting a bare living wage, in may cases 20s. a week, which, under existing conditions in industrial districts, equals about 14s. 6d. before the war. Also, before starting work they have to pay 18s. for ools, etc.

Can girls of limited means be expected to waste their time training and earning nothing if they do not know how long they may have to wait before getting a job, and whether, when they get it, they will be able to support themselves in decency?

CLERKS AND FARM HELPERS.

Mr. Cox's next point concerns the women clerks. A great many educated women have volunteered for these posts, and if we take the State as the model employer what positions do we find offered to them? Educated and highly-qualified women of the university type are offered posts which any young person with an elementary school education plus common sense would be perfectly competent to undertake.

If Mr. Cox will inquire at any bureau of employment which endeavours to "place" the well-educated woman worker, he will find that the supply largely exceeds the demand.

As regards the farmers, they are not by any means pining for women helpers, nor when they do give them a belated and reluctant trial, at the instance of a paternal Tribunal, do they trouble to give them a fair wage and accommodation. Considering the conditions under which the average farm labourer has to live, it is hardly surprising that many of the young women win a reputation for fussiness and over-fastidiousness when they have to labour under the same disadvantages.

WORK WANTED—NOT WOMEN.

No doubt the supply of hospital nurses is running short, but the number of girls who can afford to take up V.A.D. nursing is limited, considering that it is all work and no pay, even uniform and board and lodging in many cases having to be paid by the worker. Perhaps, though, Mr. Cox is a pessimist on the subject of the war and regards it as likely to continue for another three years or so, in which case our female shirker who enters a hospital now will just finish her hospital course in time.

At any rate, the point of my reply to Mr. Cox's article is that there are already more hostel opened free for them while learning. For instance, there are many domestics—refined, clever girls—but they have to live in, as their wage is not sufficient to keep them. Many, too, have no homes to fall back on. Consequently, there is nothing else for them but to continue ignoring their country's call.

NELLIE DOWDELL.

London, W. October 8.

15 10

Where is the Work?

Sir,—Mr. Harold Cox suggests the possibility for compulsion of women workers. Now, compulsion may be possible but I feel sure that our women do not require any step so drastic to get them to work. What they do want is the opportunity.

Let me state my own case, which is by no means isolated. I am a healthy, capable woman, and yet after repeated applications at the labour exchange, after repeatedly advertising and answering advertisements, I am still unable to obtain employment. I have had considerable experience in business, but because I do not know shorthand, typewriting, French, and I nearly said German—I seem to be "taboo" for any kind of clerical work. I have also had some experience in welfare work, but because I am not a trained nurse into the bargain I am for that work also "taboo."

I do not state my age because I do not think it matters. What matters most is that I am physically, and mentally I hope, "fit," very much so, moreover I am anxious to help my country and also help myself, and if Mr. Harold Cox can tell me how to obtain work he will earn the everlasting gratitude of

ONE WHO IS WILLING TO WORK.

Prestwich, Manchester.

War Office Dictum.

Sir—I am a certificated student of Girton and have had experience in tuition, office routine, social and literary work. I applied to the Women's Service Bureau, the Professional Classes Relief Fund, the War Office, Censor's Office, Munition Welfare, and various Libraries. The only two posts offered me were both of a nature requiring about six hours walking daily, which I was unfitted for. The War Office, in its reply to my application, said there were many more applicants than vacancies.

This letter is not meant as a complaint—all labour is probably a question of demand and supply—but merely a statement of facts and to show that women like myself are not wanted at the present moment.

GIRTONIAN.

A Man's Protest.

Sir,—As one of the unemployed men over military age, I wish to protest against part of Mr. Cox's article. He considers it our fault. I am a retired professional man of 60 and was doing social work unpaid the first year of the war. Three of my dividends diminished and three disappeared, and the Registration Act led me to hope some work would be given all who were fit for even sedentary work and under 65.

I applied to the Civil Service Commissioners, the Post Office, Inland Revenue, Local Government Board, and Exchequer, but, except that the first-named put me on their list, have either had no answer or a mere acknowledgment, while in another office a friend failed to get me work, and the Ministry of Munitions, after holding out hopes if I put my name on the Labour Exchange, took no further notice. I have also applied to banks, etc., but have not even had an acknowledgment.

I have written Mr. Walter Long, asking what he had in mind when he registered people of 58 and upwards, and what steps we could take to get work, but, naturally, he lies low and says nothing.

If work were properly organised it would be found we should do sedentary work as well as the present clerks, while younger men could develop their muscles.

A.

"Only Vacancies for Shorthand Typists."

Sir,—I should be glad if Mr. Cox would tell me in which offices this "unsatisfied demand" exists.

Being a trained secretary and book keeper, but out of work, I applied to several Government offices, and at one after calling three

At any rate, the point of my reply to Mr. Cox's article is that there are already more women wanting work than there are posts to fill, and that at the present time compulsion for women would mean a considerable embarrassment for the Government and more particularly for the Ministry of Munitions. When all the women the latter have so generously trained are in adequately paid posts, in cleanly, well-heated, and ventilated factories, it will be time enough to look round for the women shirkers who, I suppose, are lurking somewhere, though personally I have yet to meet one.

A War Office Experience.

Sir,—Mr. Harold Cox seems to think the "educated" women of England are holding aloof in this time of stress. That may be true in some cases, but not in all. My own experience is a case in point. I have been well educated—a thoroughly good English education, with a couple of foreign languages, both learnt abroad—but I am in the fifties. Hearing that the War Office was using lady clerks to release men for active service, and being most anxious to do something to help, I offered myself. I was sent for for an interview at the War Office, answered in French to French, read and translated a German letter, gave three references, and was told that, provided they proved satisfactory, as my German was excellent, and they had for weeks been seeking a good German translator, I might almost consider it settled. Who so delighted as I! Ten days later I received a refusal.

I tried the Admiralty, and every other Department I could—refused everywhere. I know I have not now the strength for munition work, but I am quite healthy in mind and body, and perfectly fit for the sedentary work of an office, and to the ordinary mind a woman of my age would seem quite as fit for Government work as a younger woman.

Mr. Harold Cox reproaches us for not coming forward. How can we give services which are persistently refused?

KATHARINE J. EDMONDS.

Girton House School, Ealing.

Part Time Work Wanted.

Sir,—Many women would be glad to accept a post for a few hours daily, and do that thoroughly and efficiently, who are unable through health, domestic ties, and various other reasons to work the whole day—say, from 9.30 to 6 or 7 p.m.

A friend of mine has lost nearly all her artistic work through war depression. She is cultivated, musical, an excellent accompanist, speaks and writes French easily, and knows a fair amount of German and Italian. She is, unfortunately, not normally strong, and her eyesight will not allow of continuous close work for many hours. She has applied to the Red Cross Society, the London County Council, the Registrar's Office, and the War Office, and only from one was offered an arduous post from 9.30 to 6 p.m., with probability of overtime being often demanded.

Is my friend unusually unlucky, or has she not applied to the proper sources?

MARIE KEANE.

10, Cedars Road, Clapham Common, S.W.

Question of Pay.

Sir,—There are many girls to-day who would gladly take up some work to help the country in its hour of need, but they cannot afford to give their services free, nor can they take advantage of the free training offered them, unless, while training, they are paid or some but out of work, I applied to several Government offices, and at one after calling three times was told to start work on the morrow.

On the first and second days I worked in the Registry; on the third I wasted the whole morning waiting for a job—in the afternoon I was sent up to the attic and given typing to do, although I had stated that I was not a skilled typist. The work I did had to be submitted to someone on the ground floor, which naturally entailed constant journeys up and downstairs (105). On the fourth day I appealed to the official who had engaged me, pointing out that owing to a physical infirmity I was unable to climb an indefinite number of stairs—also, that I was not a typist. I was informed that there was no other work to be done, and I was paid off.

Apparently the only "unsatisfied demand in Government offices" is for shorthand typists. There is seemingly no demand for women secretaries with years of good experience, capable of filling responsible positions, and also willing to do "the simplest work" without mistakes.

A WOMAN WORKER.

V.A.D. Complaint.

Sir,—May I draw attention to a point which Mr. Cox did not touch on, in connection with women's work in war time? I refer to the large number of very well-to-do young women who wish to pose as workers, but are quite determined not to leave their comfortable homes. These find comfortable shelter in the V.A.D. as they exist at present. So far, there has been no weeding out of the purely ornamental members from among those who cheerfully perform the drudgery work of the real hospitals. The Red Cross Society is itself to blame for any lack of women for "essential hospital work." As things are now, the auxiliary hospitals used as convalescent homes seem to be conducted so as to absorb the maximum amount of feminine labour.

In the neighbourhood of my present home there are two of these Red Cross convalescent homes within three miles of one another, and it is the fashion for the daughters of the wealthy houses in the district to motor, or drive, in for part of the day to these hospitals for periods of about a fortnight at a time. Their occupation when there seems to consist mainly of cutting up bread and making beds. One of these homes receives from twelve to twenty absolutely convalescent soldiers, and it is quite the exception for any of them to require the simplest dressing or medical attention. The men help in the rough work of the house and kitchen. The Red Cross staff consists of a "commandant," a "quartermaster," a fully trained and paid hospital nurse, a paid cook, and a paid charwoman, also a male Red Cross worker who comes at odd times to take charge and relieve the staff.

OBSERVER.

Mayfair, W.

Not Too Old at 40.

Sir,—Much of the shortage of which Mr. Harold Cox speaks has arisen from the "no use after forty" fiat. There are very many well-educated gentlewomen above this absurd age limit, only too glad and anxious, like myself, to undertake work. The bureaus are hopeless; one is only met with cold attention, if not absolute curt rebuff. Capability is not considered or even tested.

If there are now possibilities heretofore blocked, perhaps Mr. Cox would be good enough to point out where, how, or to what Government department application for clerical work could be tendered, and for this information I should feel grateful.

A. M. W. EDWARDS.

South Norwood, S.E. October 13.

The Queen
21.10.16

679.C.
679c/13

THE WOMAN-POWER PROBLEM.

By MRS MARGARET HEITLAND.

WHEN IS THE GOVERNMENT going to make use of the National Register of women?

The National Register of men has been used carefully and exhaustively so far as the registered men of military age are concerned, and we shall probably learn before long that the "man-power" of citizens too old to be of much service in the field will be more fully utilised than it is in many cases at present.

This winter, when the country has determined to quicken the pace of the war, the country will have to make a fuller use of its people. These islands are thickly crowded with population, every unit of which must yield its value. Hitherto tremendous value has been yielded by the young men, some of the most indispensable of whom are gone. Beside and beyond them are millions of other people. Of these latter a large portion have their time fully engaged in doing work which is wanted. But there are others, and, speaking now only of the women among these others, I believe that they would welcome some definite direction with regard to the work that they ought to do. For more and more it becomes clear that the best distribution of man-power will not be effected so long as any considerable residue of woman-power is suffered to go to waste.

When, in the summer of 1915, the National Register was taken of everyone in the country between the ages of sixteen and sixty-five, it will be remembered that women who were occupied with the domestic maintenance of their families were directed to describe their employment as "Household Duties." That was quite as it should be. But—and this is a very important but—the women who were doing nothing in particular and were not offering their services in any capacity, these also were instructed to describe themselves as engaged in "Household Duties." To some of us this admixture of the idle with the employed appeared to cast a slur upon the work of family maintenance. Grown-up girls living in a home managed by their mothers, widows and sisters living on private means, and attended by servants—all these when classified by the registration scrutineers had their papers thrown upon the huge "Household Duties" dumping heap, with which nothing so far has been done.

What I would specially urge to-day is that this dumping heap should be overhauled. I should like, of course, to see a full and proper use made of the whole National Register of women. It was in order that it should be so used that many of us pressed for women to be included with men in that great counting of heads.

But the examination of the "Household Duties" women is far the most pressing part of the problem. People are looking uneasily at the badge-day and flag-day women. Observers may or may not mind seeing girls standing, rather sensationally arrayed, as patriotic beggars at street corners. Patriotic begging is not a very pleasant business, especially in bad weather. But the sight of the flag sellers sets people thinking. Most of the flag sellers are registered under "Household Duties." The truth, which is made rather staringly obvious, is that "Household Duties," which mean toilsome days for the working-class mother, do not mean long, serious, unremitting labour for women from servant-keeping homes. If the flag sellers are sufficiently at leisure to come out into the streets to-day they possibly could have been equally free yesterday, and might be so to-morrow. We may perhaps be told that they have made a special effort to give so much time on one day, and that they have set aside many little duties and engagements for this particular cause; also that it is not easy for their mothers to spare them, that the girls are not very strong—and so forth. But portraits of many of the soldier boys reveal to the discerning eye defects of health. They, too, are wanted, often sorely, by old and widowed mothers. But they go, and must go, when everything is at stake. And nobody who believes in the rightness of our cause thinks otherwise.

We are apt in this country to do things bit by bit and to "get a move" on ourselves by groups and sections gradually. We find that plan answers better for us than the systematic clean logically-made sweep. Following this precedent I think we ought now to make a direct patriotic appeal to all the unmarried women registered under "Household Duties" who live in homes where at least one domestic servant is employed, and whose age does not exceed forty-five, or perhaps fifty. These are in the main the girls and women of the flag-seller class. Most of them are partially occupied. That I do not deny. Work in V.A.D. hospitals takes up some of their time. But I think if they are not employed at least forty-four hours weekly in such work, and are not officially stated to be indispensable to the superintendent of the hospital in question, they ought at once to be "combed out" and sent off to do munitions work or whatever other kind of paid work the Government at the time most needs for the successful prosecution of the war. The work, too, should be regular, full-time work.

We all know that there are many difficulties. There are two in particular which make themselves felt. First, there is the curious, long-lingering class prejudice against paid work. The objection, so far as it rests on a solid basis, is the dislike of being under definite control. It is the preference for personal freedom, a laudable preference, but it cannot be indulged by all. It is not indulged by young men of the middle class, who in peace times are paid workers, and now are members of a disciplined manhood in arms. This preference for freedom—for a position outside any contract for service—cannot be indulged by girls of the poorer class. In so far as girls of the middle class try to keep out of the ranks of paid workers they are separating themselves from the poorer women, and they are disobeying the principle of share and share alike, which is so splendidly manifest in the fighting services. The upholding of this class barrier ought to be abandoned if for no other reason than this—that the younger women must offer themselves for munition work in a large body if the work done at home this winter is adequately to strengthen our forces and put a stop to the enormities which have been practised against the civilised world. To get the large additional number of young women who are needed for munition making the girls of all classes must move en masse, as a new Kitchener's Army. For there is this further point to consider. If the well-to-do girls go into the arsenals and factories with the rest they will help the others. If there are any conditions to remedy, the more educated girls will be able to arouse attention to them. One of the few good results of the war would be the creation of this solidarity of feeling and interest between the working women of every section.

The second big difficulty is the difficulty caused by the anomalous political status of women. It is the realisation of this difficulty which has, I suggest, made statesmen and great military organisers slow to command the services of women. They have realised that they were not in the case of women dealing with persons who were committed to their country's decisions by the commitments of their Parliamentary representatives. They might be bound to follow those decisions and to obey them in all their implications. But in the particular way in which men are bound they are not bound. Men can bind themselves politically to obey the laws which their own spokesmen have enacted. Women may, and generally do, obey those laws, but they have not bound themselves to do so in the same way as men, and their obligation is not of the same nature. "We have asked your opinion. You have given it. Now act up to it!" Thus, leaders of the State are entitled to address men; but to women they cannot speak in similar terms, though before long I believe they will be able to do so.

Meanwhile, women, bound or unbound, will, I am sure, press that a more complete use should be made of their powers. The best way to do this is to give the women's papers in the National Register a thorough examination. I submit that the National Register of women contains a store of valuable woman-power, and that it is time to turn it to account.

679c

THE NATION'S CALL FOR A MILLION WOMEN WORKERS.

Where the "Slackers" Are Hiding.

A MILLION more women are wanted for war work now. The country is calling for them. The latest and strongest appeal comes from the munition factories and training centres. They are asking for volunteers at the training schools at the rate of from 800 to 1,000 a week. The training is free and takes at most only six weeks, after which the student or munition apprentice must serve her time in a factory as a wage-earning munitioneer.

The home women, the women who can cook or sew and cut and fit, are well fitted for munition work. Learning to handle with accuracy the raw material for munitions is not difficult, nor is physical strength required. It is a matter of a good eye and a delicate touch, and that is what most women have. The students at the training centres learn to measure and turn and bore, to drill and shape and mill, and go into the factories equipped and efficient.

The principal training centres are at Shoreditch, Battersea, Brixton, and Wimbledon. From these about 500 women a week are sent off to factories. These are not enough. The millions of men at the front demand millions and millions of shells, which the women must provide.

It is a pleasure to go to one of these training centres and see eager, earnest women and girls of all ages and types, clad in blue overalls, bending over their machines, testing gun-sights or finishing shells with an ease and expertness which is astonishing to anyone who realises that only a few weeks ago a sewing-machine was the only machine they could handle.

"We do not wish to take women from important war work," an official at the Ministry of Munitions assured me yesterday. "We want the women who are doing things which do not count so much and have time to spare. Above all, we want the women who are doing nothing at all, to help.

"The great advantage of munition work is that almost every woman can undertake it. The very young woman, the middle-aged woman (we take them from 18 to 45), the untrained woman. All that is necessary is that a woman should be young enough to have the will to do and the strength of purpose to accomplish her task.

"Many months ago Lady Scott laid down her chisel for the munition machine; a little group of painters and art students followed her example. There are women munitioneers who have university degrees, there are women writers, women photographers, and women who have been in domestic service. There is no caste or class in a factory where every woman is working to save some man or many men by providing shells and more shells."

In some of the training centres there are young war widows who find a balm for their sorrow in toiling at the shell-finishing process. There are girls whose sweethearts are at the front and women whose sons are fighting. "Every piece of work I finish," said one of these mothers, "I feel may mean protection for my boy."

THE WOMAN SLACKER.

The woman-slacker can have no excuse for not answering this great stirring call from the country. She has turned and twisted and evaded. She has talked of the things she meant to do and she has not done them. She is either too young or too old; she cannot find her niche. She has a battalion of excuses at her command.

A French writer, who visited us recently, said he did not believe there were women slackers in England. He had been to the munition factories, the workrooms, the hospitals, he had talked to women chauffeurs, ticket-collectors, porters, conductors, engineers, postwomen, policewomen, and many other representatives of the great splendid feminine army of workers.

He could have found the slacker, though, if he had gone to the shopping centres, where she flutters and fritters and bargains as she did in pre-war days. He could have found her in the smart tea-rooms, in the restaurants, in the women's clubs, where she is generally occupied in making excuses for her idleness, and in the bridge clubs, where she goes to play "just one rubber before dinner," or many rubbers after dinner.

"We need more women for home work and for work in the rooms here," said one of the ladies at the Red Cross central workrooms, and this appeal is made from many other work centres. But the women slackers refuse to listen. It is necessary to impress upon them that there is work for every woman to do.

M. R.

WOMEN WORKERS.

Sir,—I can hardly believe that "Watchman" has ever seriously thought or made inquiries about educated women workers. Surely anyone can see how impossible it is for many ladies to give up all their time regardless of remuneration. Does "Watchman" think homes and children, etc., look after themselves? Every woman is aching to do her "bit" and would willingly give some time daily or weekly as her circumstances and finances allowed, but no employer will arrange for work in shifts, and hence the number of women "Watchman" is pleased to call shirkers and slackers.

If educated women were allowed on the committees we should see a vast improvement everywhere. They are far more fitted to organise and arrange than they are for picking fruit at ½d. per hour or washing up dirty dishes frantically at a munition canteen. Instead of railing at educated women as he does, "Watchman" might note how some employers are trying to get the use of brains for nothing.

It is quite true difficulties are manifold in the path of the would-be war worker, voluntary or otherwise. It has taken me till now to obtain permission to work in a canteen for one evening and one morning. Elsewhere all my endeavours were met by the fact that I must either (1) give up all my time, (2) live away from home, (3) buy a uniform, etc., (4) pay so much per week for the privilege of working, (5) buy my own materials, and so on, all of which I can no longer afford to do.

A SO-CALLED SLACKER.

Charing Cross-road, October 22.

Sir,—Allow me as the mother of one of the educated women employed on war work to reply in a few lines to "Watchman." Men of education and refinement may be, and no doubt are, content to receive one shilling a day in the trenches, but they receive that plus clothes, boots, washing, food, mending, and other trifles. My daughter receives £2 a week; her board and lodging cost her 25s., luncheons 4s. a week, washing 5s., leaving 8s., a trifle over 1s. a day for clothes and boots, getting to the office, etc.

Is this a living wage for a First-class Honours Girton graduate, whose education also comprised years in France, Germany, and Rumania?

Many of the women employed on war work use their pay as pocket-money, others invest in War Loan, but the majority have to live and clothe themselves on it. My daughter's occupation was suddenly stopped by the war; before that she earned more than £300 a year.

A WAR-WORKER'S MOTHER.

Sir,—"Watchman" is illogical, for if the former breadwinner is now only earning a shilling a day in the trenches, however cheerfully he may be performing his task, is it not all the more necessary that the woman who is taking his place at home should demand a wage sufficient to keep things going during his absence? It is; and more than this, it is the duty of every woman who is competently filling the place of a man at the front to keep up, as far as lies in her power, the standard of that man's wages, so that when he returns he may not find himself ousted from his post by the woman who has temporarily filled it at half the price.

Circumstances, sad as they are, have given to woman the opportunity of proving her ability. It is neither right nor just that the employer should be the only person to profit by the result. Many present employers of female labour would undoubtedly be delighted if they only had to pay conscription prices.

There is not a woman living who would not willingly forgo the "halfpence" if one who was dear to her could be spared the "kicks." This being impossible, it is her sacred duty not only to herself but in the interests of all our dear ones at the front to see that she gets as many "halfpence" as she is worth.

RITA RUSSELL.

Lyceum Club, October 23.

Sir,—I do think "Watchman" in last Sunday's issue rather overlooks the fact that hundreds of educated women of the professional classes have to face life now with greatly reduced incomes. Can they be blamed if they demand a living wage?

There is not much "safety" or "comfort" going home in crowded trains and through pitch-black streets to servantless houses. Many of these women are unaccustomed to the strenuous, anxious life of to-day and they feel they must look ahead in case they break down, and there is no little nest-egg to help through with the doctor and nourishing food.

God forbid that any of them should grumble when their men are giving their lives for a shilling a day! But I think the burden is equally shared, for often the waiting and the dread is worse than the actual reality.

"Watchman" seems to forget even if there are a few greedy women (with comfortable homes and husbands safe and well, earning their ordinary salaries) who take good posts that ought to be reserved for those women who really need them, on the other hand are there no greedy men who have passed inferior goods of all kinds, food, clothing, even broken-winded horses, thus endangering their country and the lives and the health of many thousands of the brave fellows we all love and honour.

EVELYN MILLER.

Wimbledon. From these about 500 women a week are sent off to factories. These are not enough. The millions of men at the front demand millions and millions of shells, which the women must provide.

It is a pleasure to go to one of these training centres and see eager, earnest women and girls of all ages and types, clad in blue overalls, bending over their machines, testing gun-sights or finishing shells with an ease and expertness which is astonishing to anyone who realises that only a few weeks ago a sewing-machine was the only machine they could handle.

"We do not wish to take women from important war work," an official at the Ministry of Munitions assured me yesterday. "We want the women who are doing things which do not count so much and have time to spare. Above all, we want the women who are doing nothing at all, to help.

"The great advantage of munition work is that almost every woman can undertake it. The very young woman, the middle-aged woman (we take them from 18 to 45), the untrained woman. All that is necessary is that a woman should be young enough to have the will to do and the strength of purpose to accomplish her task.

"Many months ago Lady Scott laid down her chisel for the munition machine; a little group of painters and art students followed her example. There are women munitioneers who have university degrees, there are women writers, women photographers, and women who have been in domestic service. There is no caste or class in a factory where every woman is working to save some man or many men by providing shells and more shells."

In some of the training centres there are young war widows who find a balm for their sorrow in toiling at the shell-finishing process. There are girls whose sweethearts the restaurants, in the women's clubs, where she is generally occupied in making excuses for her idleness, and in the bridge clubs, where she goes to play "just one rubber before dinner," or many rubbers after dinner.

"We need more women for home work and for work in the rooms here," said one of the ladies at the Red Cross central work-rooms, and this appeal is made from many other work centres. But the women slackers refuse to listen. It is necessary to impress upon them that there is work for every woman to do. M. R.

ing, (5) buy my own materials, and so on, all of which I can no longer afford to do.

A SO-CALLED SLACKER.

Charing Cross-road, October 22.

Sir,—Allow me as the mother of one of the educated women employed on war work to reply in a few lines to "Watchman." Men of education and refinement may be, and no doubt are, content to receive one shilling a day in the trenches, but they receive that plus clothes, boots, washing, food, mending, and other trifles. My daughter receives £2 a week; her board and lodging cost her 25s., luncheons 4s. a week, washing 5s., leaving 8s., a trifle over 1s. a day for clothes and boots, getting to the office, etc.

Is this a living wage for a First-class Honours Girton graduate, whose education also comprised years in France, Germany, and Rumania?

Many of the women employed on war work use their pay as pocket-money, others invest in War Loan, but the majority have to live and clothe themselves on it. My daughter's occupation was suddenly stopped by the war; before that she earned more than £300 a year.

A WAR-WORKER'S MOTHER.

Sir,—"Watchman" is illogical, for if the former breadwinner is now only earning a shilling a day in the trenches, however cheerfully he may be performing his task, is it not all the more necessary that the woman who is taking his place at home should demand a wage sufficient to keep things going during his absence? It is; and more than this, it is the duty of every woman who is competently filling the place of a man at the front to keep up, as far as lies in her power, the standard of that man's wages, so that when he returns he may not find himself ousted from his post by the woman who has temporarily filled it at half the price.

Circumstances, sad as they are, have given to woman the opportunity of proving her ability. It is neither right nor just that the employer should be the only person to profit by the result. Many present employers of female labour would undoubtedly be delighted if they only had to pay conscription prices.

There is not a woman living who would not willingly forgo the "halfpence" if one who was dear to her could be spared the "kicks." This being impossible, it is her sacred duty not only to herself but in the interests of all our dear ones at the front to see that she gets as many "halfpence" as she is worth.

RITA RUSSELL.

Lyceum Club, October 23.

Sir,—I do think "Watchman" in last Sunday's issue rather overlooks the fact that hundreds of educated women of the professional classes have to face life now with greatly reduced incomes. Can they be blamed if they demand a living wage?

There is not much "safety" or "comfort" going home in crowded trains and through pitch-black streets to servantless houses. Many of these women are unaccustomed to the strenuous, anxious life of to-day and they feel they must look ahead in case they break down, and there is no little nest-egg to help through with the doctor and nourishing food.

God forbid that any of them should grumble when their men are giving their lives for a shilling a day! But I think the burden is equally shared, for often the waiting and the dread is worse than the actual reality.

"Watchman" seems to forget even if there are a few greedy women (with comfortable homes and husbands safe and well, earning their ordinary salaries) who take good posts that ought to be reserved for those women who really need them, on the other hand are there no greedy men who have passed inferior goods of all kinds, food, clothing, even broken-winded horses, thus endangering their country and the lives and the health of many thousands of the brave fellows we all love and honour.

EVELYN MILLER.

Lyceum Club, October 26.

Norfolk Chronicle
27.10.16

LABOUR ON THE LAND.

SUBSTITUTES MUST BE FOUND.

Mr. Walter Long, addressing farmers at a meeting of the Women's Legion in London, said that in regard to the question of replacing farm labour by women, breathing time was to be given to agriculture, but the men would ultimately have to be taken. We had to send away the fighting men, and it could be done if we had more workers and fewer critics.

Lord Crawford, President of the Board of Agriculture, said departmental conferences had recently decided that no man should be taken from arable farming before January 1st, and no man necessary to maintain the nation's milk supply should be requisitioned before March 31st, unless an efficient substitute was provided. It should be the aim of the Women's Legion and similar organisations to supply and train the substitutes. Those who spoke gloomily of the future of agricultural prospects in this country would do well to remember that the harvest which Germans were now gathering consisted largely of beech nuts, acorns, chestnuts, and nettles, from which to obtain substitutes for making flax. The next few months of war would be critical, and would govern the terms of the victory we hoped to win in 1917. That victory would be won, not on the fields of Flanders alone, but upon our own agricultural land and by our home production of food.

Lord Chaplin said this country need fear no foe save one, and that foe was starvation. There was a time when English-grown corn fed twenty-five million English people, but now the total was something like four millions only. With good organisation this could be improved.

Sunday Times.
5/11/16

WOMAN WOE

Sir,—Your three correspondents who criticised my letter in your issue of October 21 no doubt represent fairly a considerable section of female opinion on the subject of woman's work, but I submit that each one of their letters emphasises the necessity of conscription for women for work during the war.

Women now cannot be allowed to pick and choose their work. Eight to ten hours a day on the land or work of other national importance is not too much to ask when men are risking death and wounds in the trenches.

It is the unattached women who are reaping the golden harvests over this war, and not the married women, who are far better employed on home duties.

There is a great need of female labour on the farms, but the response of appeals for volunteers has been very disappointing, and many of those who have worked in the summer are now giving up owing to bad weather.

This cannot be tolerated, and if women are not patriotic enough to work in safe and comfortable England for soldier's pay voluntarily, there is nothing else for it but compulsion.

"A War Worker's Mother" speaks of the "hardship" of a girl worker with 40s. a week, and who spends 34s. on her board, lodging, and washing, and the ladies of the Lyceum Club complain of the lack of safety and comfort in going home in dark streets and crowded trains.

Are these ladies really serious? If so, let them think of the lot of the men in the firing line, whose places the women are taking.

No one wishes employers to benefit by cheap female labour, but surely the soldier has a right to expect that a portion of the wages earned by the woman substitute should be put aside for his benefit or that of his next-of-kin?

WATCHMAN.

Royal Societies Club, St. James's-street, S.W.

Sir,—The many interesting letters upon women's work never seem to "touch the spot" to my sense of logic. There are numbers of educated women most desirous of doing some of the country's work, but in over two years there has been no adequate method found for placing them.

Labour exchanges are and always have been the most expensive and disastrous fiascos that a long-suffering nation has been called upon to endure, and their usefulness (sic) could be accomplished by lists in free libraries, at smallest cost to the nation. Women should be interviewed by officials capable of understanding how to question them in an appropriate and inoffensive manner.

I am not of opinion that women are doing their part in this war; nothing they can do can possibly equal the work of our men in all the services who offer their lives, the supreme sacrifice. At any rate, women should forgo fine dress, amusements, and luxury, and the Government should help by organising their labour in a sensible and suitable manner. The nation would be better both morally and economically.

(MISS) K. S. BIRNSTNGL

Edinburgh Dispatch
1/11/16

"Women Slackers."

TO THE EDITOR.

In reply to the correspondent whose article, headed "Women Slackers," appeared in the Dispatch on Monday, I should like to say that I consider women slackers are very few and far between. Many ladies who have never before had to do any work are devoting their whole day to war work. I could instance many.

On the other hand, there are many who, though engaged all day at business, are willing to devote their evening hours to war work. They, however, have experienced great difficulty in finding an outlet for their energies. I, personally, have applied to the Red Cross Association, and find that unless I can give up my whole time there is nothing for me to do. I have also spoken to ladies who are engaged in war work of various kinds, and they have been unable to suggest what I could do.

I should therefore advise the writer of the abovementioned article to give matters a little more consideration before he or she makes such disparaging statements. The women of the country have, in my opinion, risen to the occasion nobly. Those who visit picture houses and restaurants are not necessarily "slackers." Our soldiers and sailors are to be seen in large numbers in such places.

I should be obliged if the writer would kindly suggest some work suitable for those whose days are fully occupied, and who are only too willing to do what they can in the evenings. M. C.

Daily Mail.
30/11/16

CALL UP THE WOMEN.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—To girls who are well and strong and longing to do their duty, and yet are held back by considerations which it would be difficult for anyone outside the domestic circle to understand, compulsion would come as a relief and would still the home voices most effectually.

Another reason is the waste caused by the countless activities maintained by voluntary labour. These things are for the most part necessary and magnificent, but surely the physically fit and those who have all their time to give should be combed out of these places. It is piteous to see a sound and healthy girl rolling bandages three days a week as her contribution to the national emergency when her grandmother could do it just as well. One knows that buffet and canteen work is hard, but by working in shorter spells and the introduction of more part-time material drawn from the married and over age it should be possible to work them quite satisfactorily and release a large number of able-bodied girls and otherwise untied women.

M. BERKELEY.

The Cottage, South Darenth.

Daily Mirror.
30/11/16

"WOMAN-POWER."

ALL the women I know who are worth anything are now working hard.

The frivolous type is no use for work. Do not conscript her, for goodness sake! She will only get in the way of good workers.

She will ask questions and flirt with the men. Let her remain outside war work, if she can.

Too many people judge by the standard of numbers in an affair of this sort. It is not so much numbers that tell as quality in workers. We want efficiency, not folly.

MATRON.

Park-lane, W.

Weekly Dispatch.
26/11/16

SHOULD WOMEN BE CONSCRIPTED?

"They Must Do More if the Country is to Win Soon."
—Lady Londonderry.

Should women be conscripted?

Flag days alone have proved that there are thousands of women with plenty of spare time on their hands. Should the State force them to make munitions or do some other work that would release men for the Army?

Women volunteer workers, like the men who joined the Army without waiting to be pushed, have done wonderful work for the country, and many people think that all-round compulsion would be the only fair way of utilising our great reserves of woman-power to hasten victory.

Below are opinions received from well-known women:—

THE MARCHIONESS OF LONDONDERRY.

"I am strongly in favour of conscription for military and industrial service both for men and women. But we must have such conscription in Ireland as well as in England, Scotland, and Wales. Everyone in the British Isles must do his or her share of work now.

"The women have done well, everyone must admit that, but they must do still more if the country is to win soon."

MRS. BELLOC LOWNDES, the Novelist.

"I am strongly against the proposed conscription of women for home service. I consider that the number of Englishwomen who are doing nothing in aid of their country at the present time is extremely small. But whether they are few or many, I do not believe that the wit of man can devise a means by which they can be turned into real, earnest workers.

"I much regret to see the growing tendency to copy German ways and German methods, and I am sorry indeed that our Government, instead of taking a leaf out of the German book, did not at once take several leaves out of the French book.

"There has been no feminine conscription in France; on the contrary, everything has been done to keep life as normal as possible, not only in the myriad trades where women have had to take the place of men, but also in the home. It is quite true that Frenchwomen are now doing an enormous amount of work that used to be done by men, but it must be remembered that this is no new thing in France, where agriculture has always been to a large extent carried on by the wives, mothers, and daughters of the owners of the land."

LADY BYRON.

"I once read 'The only way to treat a bully is to be a greater bully.'

"Had I been Prime Minister I should have taken this ruthless maxim for my motto—and advocated conscription throughout the Empire of every man, woman, and child for war work—for ruthless efficiency can only be conquered by ruthless efficiency, and weakness among ourselves and kindness to our enemies is base blackhearted treachery to the brave men who are fighting for us."

MRS. MARY CAUNT, the Explorer.

"Of course there should most surely be conscription for women. Never before in all its history has this nation realised the value of its women; nobly have they risen to the occasion; well have they seconded their menfolks.

"But when we look at the very best that has been done we must see that because there has been no organisation—no Government or authoritative organisation, I mean—there has been necessarily much overlapping, much waste of energy, much energy not used at all. For there are many women, willing, able and capable, but still a little held back by the conventions that hold so largely among the women of the upper middle classes, and for them no place has yet been found.

"Think what might be accomplished if every able-bodied woman between the ages of seventeen and fifty-seven were set to work of national importance, work that would forward that end which the whole nation has so deeply at heart. Of course there are children to care for, children to be born, old folks and sick to be tended, but these are works of national importance, and proper control of women's labour would see that they were properly attended to.

"But allowing for all this, if the women of the country were organised as the men have been organised, if they were all put to the work for which they are best suited, if those who have never worked except in that amateurish manner which makes for conceit and does not count were taught to work for the national good we should find not only that great strides will be made in the present welfare of the nation but that the physique and the morale of the women will be immensely improved."

MRS. ELEANOR MORDAUNT, the Novelist.

"I am strongly in favour of a form of industrial conscription for women.

"Anyone who goes to the West End shops can get an idea of just how many women there are who are not doing war work or any other work. These are the women who should be organised for industrial service.

"The women who have families to look after or who are earning their living would have to be exempted, but the great number of women with energy and initiative going to waste could be utilised, and I believe these women, far from resenting such a step, would be glad to be industrially organised."

MISS MARGARET BONDFIELD, the Woman Labour Leader.

"I am strongly opposed to conscription, either military or industrial, for men or for women."

MISS ATHENE SEYLER, the Actress.

"I certainly believe in civil conscription, but only as an educational effort to produce real citizens—male or female. As for present conditions, I think that all available useful material among women gives itself voluntarily to war work, and the slackers would be more trouble than they would be worth.

"Imagine Tottie Lightfoot, the revue dancer, conscripted for farm work!"

MISS SYLVIA PANKHURST, the Suffragist.

"To any form of industrial conscription for men or women I am strongly opposed, but it is particularly dangerous for women, because it would take them from their homes and children, and the care of the children is the most important thing in the world.

"The women in the East End of London are working hard to earn their daily bread and are striving to keep their homes together. Some of them have released men for service and are trying to replace them to the best of their ability. As long as this is done voluntarily, well and good; but to force women to do it would mean the collapse of many things we have been striving for so long, and I don't believe women would consent to it."

Daily Express.
18/12/16

CONSCRIPTION FOR WOMEN?

Mrs. Pankhurst has written to the President of the Board of Agriculture stating that before any measure of conscription for women is adopted women will demand proof that the services of the conscripted will be properly used. At present, she says, there are thousands of capable women who—

Have had their proffered services wholly refused, or

Have been put to war work which is totally unsuitable and below their qualifications and capacities.

"As regards agricultural work," she writes, "it is the strong opinion of our union that it is the women of the country districts, the wives, sisters, and daughters of men agriculturists, who must be put to this kind of work."

Daily Mail.
7/12/16

THE WOMEN WANT COMPULSION.

To the Editor of The Daily Mail.

Sir,—Since you printed a letter of mine a few days ago I have received quite a considerable number of letters urging that a form of conscription should be immediately applied to women.

The writers, all women, are wanting to work for the nation, but are held back, either through home influence or from lack of knowledge how to turn their capabilities to the best account.

Says one of my correspondents: "Women and girls, heaps of whom I know, are so willing, but do not know how to start about it, and as soon as one tries . all the unpleasant side of things is brought up to turn them back."

There is nothing like compulsion for removing obstacles, and it is wonderful how easy a thing becomes when you are obliged to do it.

We still read of night clubs, of theatre parties, of dancing and revelling—a state of things which would soon cease to exist if the female element were withdrawn. If a man is a cur who hides from the Services in the munition factory, what is a woman who hides from the munition factory in the night club?

Germany has not included women in her new Bill. Cannot we for once steal a march on her and fit all our women into the machine which is some day going to crush the Hun?

M. BERKELEY.

The Cottage, South Darenth.

Newcastle Journal
4/12/16

SHOULD WOMEN BE CONSCRIPTED?

"A Female Minister for Female Labour."

Should women be conscripted?

A number of well-known women answered this question in last Sunday's "Weekly Dispatch," and we have since received the following letters:—

MRS. FLORA ANNIE STEEL, the Famous Novelist.

"I think conscription of women quite preposterous until some sort of effort, however feeble, to organise female labour has been made. Nothing has really been done on any practical, efficient lines. Men have footled over it as usual. Having failed egregiously they have laid the blame on the wrong shoulders. I know of thousands of capable women waiting at home, impatient for employment which they cannot get.

"At the same time I believe swift organisation absolutely necessary if dilution is to go on as it should go on. Appoint a female Minister for female labour. Give her every one of the advantages given to her male congener, offices, clerks, superintendence—and red tape if you will. Let us for once manage our own affairs unhampered by ignorance, and there will be no fear of the result.

"Our first step would be to secure justice for the woman worker, to see that unskilled male labour should not get £2 17s. 6d. a week while female labour at the same job in the same room gets £1.

"Yet if conscription comes we women will not complain. We are too patriotic to strike!

"Our reckoning will come when peace comes."

Newcastle Journal
5/12/16

WOMEN AND CONSCRIPTION.

North Shields.

Sir,—There is a certain unconscious humour in the letter of "A.W.C." which appears in your issue of yesterday. That exceptionally shrewd and canny young woman, the north country farmer's lass, is to be bribed and coaxed and blarneyed into leaving her well paid and valuable work as munition-maker, van driver, chauffeur, or whatever it may be, by the gift of little badges and buttons and rhetorical appeals to her patriotism, and so lured back to heavy agricultural labour at a wage quite insufficient to support herself, let alone her dependents, unless it is supplemented in some more or less questionable manner. If she does not rise at once to this bait, she is to be "conscripted," though how this is to be done, and who is to do it, "A.W.C." wisely makes no attempt to explain.

Now, conscription of the country's man-power was a perfectly legitimate political move, and the men affected retain the power of expressing their approval or otherwise at the next election. Women, as yet, have not that power; hence the conscription of women is at present not only impracticable, but unthinkable, and would make us the laughing stock of every allied, neutral, or enemy nation. Let the farmers pay their women workers a decent wage, and provide them with decent accommodation, and they will not have to complain of a shortage of labour next year. There is no other way of solving the problem. M.

Daily Mirror.
28/11/16

MORE WOMEN FOR WAR WORK.

Munitions Minister Complains of "Waste of Material."

ARMY v. WORKSHOP.

More women are to be employed in munition factories.

They are to take the place of men who are to be "combed" out for the Army.

This highly important and significant statement was made yesterday by Mr. Montagu, the Minister of Munitions, in the course of a welcome to ten French munition-makers, who are visiting this country.

"We are going to ask more and more women to come to our help (Mr. Montagu declared) to take the place of men who are not indispensable in our munition factories."

"We have many hundreds and thousands of women already working in our workshops," Mr. Montagu went on. "We know the Germans are increasing their ammunition.

"We know that there are numbers of men working in our workshops who could be better employed on the field of battle.

"It is waste of material to keep them in the workshop. It is unfair to them to prevent them going to the field of battle."

"We are going to ask women to come who are skilled, and we are going to ask women who are not skilled to come to our training shops and learn.

"And then," said Mr. Montagu, "when peace is restored, and when almost every woman has found an opportunity of serving her country, it will be a great thing to remember that the German menace has been for ever removed, not merely by the men suffering on the field of battle, but by women working and suffering in the munition factories and elsewhere."

WAITING THE CALL.

"The moment the Government say that conscription for women is necessary there will be an instant and enthusiastic response

That was the view expressed to The Daily Mirror yesterday on the absorbing question of women's conscription by Mrs. Millicent Garrett Fawcett, LL.D., who is president of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, and widow of the Right Hon. Henry Fawcett, Postmaster-General.

Mrs. Fawcett is careful, however, not to commit herself into stating whether or not women should be compelled by the State to engage in war service.

"My only doubt about conscription for women arises from a belief that women are probably already doing voluntarily all that they can do

CONSCRIPTION ALL ROUND.

A strong opinion in favour of women's conscription is expressed by the Marchioness of Londonderry, who, while conceding that "the women have done well, as everyone must admit," urges that "they must do still more if the country is to win soon."

"I am strongly in favour of conscription for military industrial service, both for men and women," she says.

No Faith in Them.—On the other hand, Mrs. Belloc Lowndes, the well-known novelist, expresses just as strongly against any conscription of women.

"I consider," she says, "that the number of Englishwomen who are doing nothing in aid of their country at the present time is extremely small.

number of letters urging that a form of conscription should be immediately applied to women.

The writers, all women, are wanting to work for the nation, but are held back, either through home influence or from lack of knowledge how to turn their capabilities to the best account.

Says one of my correspondents: "Women and girls, heaps of whom I know, are so willing, but do not know how to start about it, and as soon as one tries . all the unpleasant side of things is brought up to turn them back."

There is nothing like compulsion for removing obstacles, and it is wonderful how easy a thing becomes when you are obliged to do it.

We still read of night clubs, of theatre parties, of dancing and revelling—a state of things which would soon cease to exist if the female element were withdrawn. If a man is a cur who hides from the Services in the munition factory, what is a woman who hides from the munition factory in the night club?

Germany has not included women in her new Bill. Cannot we for once steal a march on her and fit all our women into the machine which is some day going to crush the Hun?

M. BERKELEY.

The Cottage, South Darenth

Newcastle Journal
4/12/16

SHOULD WOMEN BE CONSCRIPTED?

"A Female Minister for Female Labour."

Should women be conscripted?

A number of well-known women answered this question in last Sunday's "Weekly Dispatch," and we have since received the following letters:—

MRS. FLORA ANNIE STEEL, the Famous Novelist.

"I think conscription of women quite preposterous until some sort of effort, however feeble, to organise female labour has been made. Nothing has really been done on any practical, efficient lines. Men have footled over it as usual. Having failed egregiously they have laid the blame on the wrong shoulders. I know of thousands of capable women waiting at home, impatient for employment which they cannot get.

"At the same time I believe swift organisation absolutely necessary if dilution is to go on as it should go on. Appoint a female Minister for female labour. Give her every one of the advantages given to her male congener, offices, clerks, superintendence—and red tape if you will. Let us for once manage our own affairs unhampered by ignorance, and there will be no fear of the result.

"Our first step would be to secure justice for the woman worker, to see that unskilled male labour should not get £2 17s. 6d. a week while female labour at the same job in the same room gets £1.

"Yet if conscription comes we women will not complain. We are too patriotic to strike!

"Our reckoning will come when peace comes."

28/11/16

MORE WOMEN FOR WAR WORK.

Munitions Minister Complains of "Waste of Material."

ARMY v. WORKSHOP.

More women are to be employed in munition factories.

They are to take the place of men who are to be "combed" out for the Army.

This highly important and significant statement was made yesterday by Mr. Montagu, the Minister of Munitions, in the course of a welcome to ten French munition-makers, who are visiting this country.

"We are going to ask more and more women to come to our help (Mr. Montagu declared) to take the place of men who are not indispensable in our munition factories."

"We have many hundreds and thousands of women already working in our workshops," Mr. Montagu went on. "We know the Germans are increasing their ammunition.

"We know that there are numbers of men working in our workshops who could be better employed on the field of battle.

"It is waste of material to keep them in the workshop. It is unfair to them to prevent them going to the field of battle."

"We are going to ask women to come who are skilled, and we are going to ask women who are not skilled to come to our training shops and learn.

"And then," said Mr. Montagu, "when peace is restored, and when almost every woman has found an opportunity of serving her country, it will be a great thing to remember that the German menace has been for ever removed, not merely by the men suffering on the field of battle, but by women working and suffering in the munition factories and elsewhere."

WAITING THE CALL.

"The moment the Government say that conscription for women is necessary there will be an instant and enthusiastic response

That was the view expressed to The Daily Mirror yesterday on the absorbing question of women's conscription by Mrs. Millicent Garrett Fawcett, LL.D., who is president of the National Union of Women's Suffrage Societies, and widow of the Right Hon. Henry Fawcett, Postmaster General.

Mrs. Fawcett is careful, however, not to commit herself into stating whether or not women should be compelled by the State to engage in war service.

"My only doubt about conscription for women arises from a belief that women are probably already doing voluntarily all that they can do

CONSCRIPTION ALL ROUND.

A strong opinion in favour of women's conscription is expressed by the Marchioness of Londonderry, who, while conceding that "the women have done well, as everyone must admit," urges that "they must do still more if the country is to win soon."

"I am strongly in favour of conscription for military industrial service, both for men and women," she says.

No Faith in Them.—On the other hand, Mrs. Belloc Lowndes the well-known novelist, expresses just as strongly against any conscription of women.

"I consider," she says, "that the number of Englishwomen who are doing nothing in aid of their country at the present time is extremely small.

"But, whether they are few or many, I do not believe that the wit of man can devise a means by which they can be turned into real, [illegible] workers."

"In this crisis," says one correspondent ("An Englishwoman"), "all women not engaged in the care of children, the sick, the wounded and the old should be helping those at the front by making ammunition or working on the land.

"To be equal to Germany next spring we need thousands more munition workers now.

What It Would Mean.—"Universal war service for women would mean larger stores of ammunition, and starehouses stocked with food; no more shortage of potatoes, nor the need for highly-paid officials to examine potato-peelings!

"There are thoughtless women crowding out tea palaces, restaurants, theatres and shops—there are others eating their hearts out in their desire to help their country. Press the Government to make us all do 'our bit.'"

Daily Express
28-12-16

679c/18

NO NEED TO CONSCRIPT LABOUR.

The suggestion has been made that women should be conscripted for war work, as men have been conscripted for the Army, but those with any inside knowledge of the world of women's labour under present conditions report that there is no need for such a measure as this, as there are any number of women available to take up useful work.

The main difficulty experienced by women workers is to find just where their services are needed and through which channel to apply. Indeed, lay clearly before women (as the "Daily Express" in this "Women and Their Work" column has been doing during past months) full details of the kind of work for which their services are required, and the correct persons to whom to apply for appointment, and it will be seen that the supply of workers is by no means exhausted.

Last week an announcement was made in this column that women were needed as upper and under housemaids for a hostel for munition workers. Close on a hundred applications were received, the majority being fully-trained housemaids anxious to be employed on war work. The vacancies at the hostel are now being filled. The remainder of the applicants will be offered posts in hospitals and convalescent homes for soldiers, where workers of this kind are urgently needed and where great complaint has been made regarding the difficulty in selecting women to fill such posts.

PLENTY OF POSTS.

On the other hand, it is certainly true that there are certain fields of work for which women are required, but in which the supply of workers does not meet the demand. There is an ever-increasing scope for women in agriculture, and there are plenty of posts available for women who are prepared to undertake this kind of manual labour after some training. Many women, however, fight shy of farm work, either thinking they are not physically strong enough, or because it is imperative for them to earn higher wages than those usually available at this employment.

A mistake is made, however, by organisers of women's work in not taking sufficient steps to lay before the public particulars regarding the vacancies they wish to fill, and also through dilatory methods in dealing with applications by letter and in compiling registers of those who have applied. One finds that the labour exchanges, for instance, nearly always have numbers of posts on their books, many of them extremely good ones but women are chary of applying to this organisation, as their experiences have too often been that their names and addresses are taken and nothing further transpires.

There is a system working in the exchanges by which particulars of posts are circulated to every branch, and the difficulties in hearing of work at the local exchange, about which many women complain, must surely be due to carelessness on the part of the clerical staff. The labour exchange system has certainly improved considerably during the last few months, but there is still prejudice against applying through this channel that will take some little while to die out.

Enormous numbers of women are still seeking employment, preferably in occupations bearing on the war, and it is therefore absurd to talk of conscription for women when so many women eager to work are still unsuited.

There are certainly difficulties to be faced in many fields of labour regarding such matters as wages and suitable accommodation, but attention to these details will be a much surer way of securing women recruits than by looking to compulsion to fill the gaps.

The employer of women workers should bear these facts in mind before complaining of the shortage of available staff, and by making known his or her need over as wide an area as possible, and studying the well-being of the workers themselves, a remedy for the difficulty should be speedily found.

COOKS AND WAITRESSES FOR THE ARMY.

A large number of women are wanted to enrol as soon as possible for the constantly occurring vacancies for cooks and waitresses for military convalescent camps, officers' and sergeants' messes, etc. The War Office is ever extending the activities of this branch of the Women's Legion, and it is difficult to keep up a sufficient supply.

It should be understood that the workers are paid by Government while under the supervision of the organisers of the Women's Legion. The pay for both assistant cooks and waitresses is £20 a year, plus laundry allowance of 6d. a week, full rations, and accommodation. The women are also provided free of charge with the uniform of the Women's Legion when they have completed their probationary period, which lasts for one month, and have signed an agreement to serve for twelve months or the duration of the war, whichever is less. Third-class railway fares incurred by the workers on first joining the camp or hospital will be refunded. The age limit is from eighteen to forty-five.

It is possible that the present rate of wage for these posts may be raised in the near future. Almost an unlimited number of women are required. Experience is not necessary, as the duties are simple and are quickly learned under the direction of the superintendents during the month of probation. Good health is, however, a necessity.

Applicants should write to the secretary, Women's Legion, Military Cookery Section, Room 4, Centre Block, Duke of York's Headquarters, S.W., giving full particulars of themselves, their age, previous employment or experience, and stating when they will be free to begin work.

Pall Mall Gazette
23-12-16

679c

COMPULSION FOR WOMEN.

By May Bateman.

A year ago I wrote an article on the above subject for the "Pall Mall Gazette." It evoked a correspondence which lasted for more than a week. Women, socially of widely different classes, politically of widely different opinions, contributed to the discussion. The majority of correspondents was admittedly in favour of the sex, if eligible in point of age and health, being organised to work in the country's service, not merely when and where they wished to do so, but arbitrarily, as in the case of their men comrades.

Within the year—within the last few days even—the situation has changed. Conscription for men has become law. There are gaps now in ranks which it was scarcely possible to believe a year ago would ever be left empty; even Government offices are to-day being depleted of all eligible male employees fit to fight, except those few whose personal work is vital to their department. The psychological aspect of the nation has changed with the turn of the wheel on the material plane. There is very little of the first reckless enthusiasm left; it has solidified into something much more tangible. There is very little rancour; its place is filled by something much more serious for the enemy. Our victories do not inconsiderably exalt us, nor do temporary "throwbacks" unhinge the balance of our will. The soul of the nation has steadied into an unflinching determination to win the war, no matter what further sacrifices may be needed before that issue is quite clear. And the soul of the nation knows that we shall win the war, because if ever there were holy war this is, despite its ravages and horrors.

Work for Educated Women.

To-day's change of scene will be, perhaps, most indicative of all, since the actual declaration of war, of the people's mind.

To prophesy what answer the Allies will make to the Peace Proposals is beyond the province of this article. But if the answer be as we believe it will, to send more men and more munitions to build up the gigantic wall of the Allies' solid power, which will end by proving impenetrable to the enemy, then, too, more women will be wanted here in England to carry on the work which men have had to leave in answer to the immediate call.

Some of us have shown ourselves now to be a national asset. But there is still a percentage of women, inactive or of negligible use, who possibly through diffidence, hold back; whose energies could be used, whose energies must be used, in an hour when wastage of any sort, in any sphere, is no longer foolish, but culpable.

In some instances women of education are doing work which could be done as well by unskilled women. There are still domestic servants who could be released for more important work in factories. In a higher class, women—the names of some have been given to me confidentially in the past few days—do, perhaps, one day's work for the nation when they are free to give the week's work.

Private initiative, example, moral suasion, can do no more. A central bureau in London, backed by Government, is needed, with representative bureaux in every county, to obtain a comprehensive roll showing which women who are not now working are free to be utilised in the country's cause. There are excellent registers of would-be workers available, to simplify the work; in one Government office at least, under a most practical head, it is kept completely up to date, through careful organisation.

Practical Suggestions.

The "willing" would-be workers of each district thus classified and registered and (it is hoped) allotted, the next task would be to deal with the unaccounted for remainder. These would receive notices to attend the local manual labour after some training. Many women, however, fight shy of farm work, either thinking they are not physically strong enough, or because it is imperative for them to earn higher wages than those usually available at this employment.

